The pursuer, who has a house in the Cowgate of Dundee, and a spirit shop at the corner of the Seagate and St Andrew Street, had a shopman of the name of William Taylor, the co-defender. The pursuer was married to the defender in 1862, and apparently they lived happily together until within the last few years, when the co-defender entered the pursuer's service. Improper familiarities from time to time took place between the defender and co-defender, and, if the pursuer is to be believed, before his face. He says no doubt that he has three times dismissed the co-defender from his service on account of these familiarities, but it is a fact that up till the early part of September 1876 Taylor remained in his service. In the middle of July 1876 the pursuer went to St Fillans for the benefit of his health, and it is alleged that during his absence Taylor spent from the night of the 26th to the morning of the 27th of July at the pursuer's house, and that the defender on that occasion committed adultery with Taylor. This statement is not, I think, satisfactorily proved; it rests entirely upon the evidence of Mary Robb, the domestic servant, who says that she saw the defender and co-defender in bed together, but admits that she did not inform the pursuer of the circumstance when he returned from St Fillans on the 4th of August, nor indeed until the 31st August, when the defender and she had a quarrel. But whether the defender or co-defender did or did not commit adultery upon the night in question I have no doubt that during the pursuer's absence at St Fillans the defender and the co-defender were on terms of familiarity. The pursuer after his return from St Fillans, on the 4th of August, took lodgings for himself and his wife at Newport, in the house of Robert Mason there, and they resided together in Newport until the 31st of August, which day, in consequence of the tale told him by Mary Robb, the pursuer left his wife in Newport, and returned to his own house in the Cowgate of Dundee, and since that time he has never resided with the defender. During the three weeks which elapsed between the 31st August and 18th September the defender was frequently visited at Newport by the co-defender, and, in particular, they seem to have spent the greater part of every Sunday together. The defender's lord, Tait, who is a married man, and who appeared to be a person of respectability, and gave his evidence with great propriety, thought that the defender and co-defender were on terms of too great intimacy, though he never observed any improper familiarities taking place between them. On Sunday the 17th of September, the pursuer wrote a letter to his wife, the defender, asking her to come to Dundee to see him. The letter has not been produced, and it is not very clear what was its import, and whether the pursuer really desired to effect a reconciliation with his wife, or what other object he had in view, it is very easy to make out from the evidence. Be that as it may, the defender requested her landlord, Tait, on his return home from his work on the evening of Monday, the 18th of September, to accompany her to Dundee, for the purpose of meeting the pursuer. On arriving at Dundee they were met by the co-defender Taylor, to the surprise of Tait, who, however, soon discovered that the defender and Taylor had arranged this meeting. He left them together at the foot of Trades Lane, and went to the pursuer's shop in the Seagate, in order to inform the pursuer that his wife was waiting for him. The pursuer and he accordingly went to the Trades Lane, where they found the defender alone. A good deal of conversation took place between the pursuer and defender, chiefly with reference to the intimacy with Taylor. The interview must have lasted for a considerable time, because Tait, who was afraid that the defender and he might miss the boat for the night to Newport, which leaves at 10.15, broke up the interview about ten o'clock, and after saying good-bye to the pursuer, he and the defender left in the hope of reaching the steamer before her departure. The boat, however, left before they reached the pier. The pursuer, believing that he would miss the boat, followed them to the pier and joined them there.

"Now, it is an important circumstance, that when the defender and defender reached the pier, they again met Taylor, who entered into conversation with need or contributed to his wife's dishonour.¹ The facts of this case No. 59. disclosed nothing of that sort. It would have been impossible for the

Jan. 25, 1877.

nder. Tait thinks that the pursuer did not see Taylor, who, he says, made off Munro v. Munro.

the moment the pursuer came in sight; but I strongly suspect the pursuer did see Taylor. The defender proposed they should all go to the pursuer's shop, and accordingly the pursuer, defender, and Tait went thither. Taylor appears to have been hovering about the party at some little distance, and the pursuer, if he did not see Taylor, suspected that he was at hand, and accused the defender of leading the way to the shop of looking for Taylor. When the party arrived at the shop, the pursuer says that he invited the defender to go into the shop, and that the defender refused; but in this he is contradicted by his own witness Tait, who says that the pursuer would not allow her to go in. It is proved that the pursuer did go into the shop alone, leaving his wife and Tait at the door. He sometime afterwards came out, and it being about eleven o'clock at night, he offered Tait money to pay for a bed for himself, which offer Tait declined. He did not, however, offer money to his wife to enable her to provide herself with lodging, nor did he offer to take her into his house, or do anything to secure her decent accommodation for the night. In answer to the question, 'What do you expect your wife to do if you offered to give Tait a bed and left her about that offer?' he said, 'I never expected that she would go away. I went into the shop, and coming out, found that she was away. I expected I should see her after I came out. I asked her to go into the shop, but she would not.' (Q.) What did you expect your wife to do, supposing Tait had accepted the offer? (A.) I intended to make her the same offer when I came out. Unfortunately for the pursuer, all this is contradicted by his own witness Tait, who says that the pursuer would not allow the defender to go into the shop, but that the pursuer himself went in, leaving Tait and the defender outside; then he says, 'When we were standing outside, we expected him to come and join us, and he did come out—he then offered me the money.' (Q.) Where did Mrs. Munro go to pass the night? (A.) He said that she looked out for a bed for herself, or something of that kind. She and I went together, and the pursuer went away into the shop, which at that time was shut. Now, I think it is quite plain that the pursuer, by whose invitation the defender had gone to Dundee, and by whom she had been kept in conversation so late an hour that it was impossible for her to return to Newport that night, must, when he offered the money to Tait, and told his wife to look out for a bed for herself, have believed and expected, nay more, desired, that his wife should meet Taylor, and pass the night with him, for he admits that he suspected Taylor was hovering about—I am rather inclined to think that he did it.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock, then, Tait and the defender turned away from the pursuer's shop, and were soon after joined by Taylor, who, in the meantime, had been watching the pursuer's movements. Tait, the defender, and Taylor, walked about the streets of Dundee for some time, and about, or after midnight, the defender and Taylor left Tait, saying they were going to pass the night at the house of Mrs. Lamb, Taylor's aunt. Tait believing by that time that there was something wrong going on between the defender and the pursuer, went to Munro's house to inform him where they had gone to. It was between twelve and one o'clock; but he rang twice, and knocked at the door, and called in vain. The pursuer, who, according to his own statement, had gone home between eleven and twelve, took no notice, and Tait went on and after walking about the streets for some time, took refuge in a stairway in Union Street, about fifty yards from the Waverley Temperance Hotel, where he fell asleep.

The movements of Taylor and the defender after parting from Tait were

¹ Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, Feb. 28, 1745, M. 333; Donald v. Donald, March 1863, 1 Macph. 741, 45 Scot. Jur. 434; Wemyss v. Wemyss, March 20, 1864, 4 Macph. 660, 38 Scot. Jur. 196; Sanchez "De Sancto Matrimonio," disp. 12, sec. 52.

No. 59. husband to have taken his wife into his house for the night, as that would have inferred condonation of the prior act of adultery. She was living

Jan. 25, 1877.
Munro v.
Munro.

peculiar. They walked up and down Union Street for about an hour, the pursuer till between one and two o'clock in the morning, in such a manner as to induce the policeman on the beat to believe that they were waiting the arrival of a mail train from Glasgow, which is due about that time; and it is proved that as soon as that train had arrived they applied at the Waverley Hotel for admission, representing themselves to be married persons, just arrived from Glasgow by train, and requesting to be accommodated with a single bedroom. They were accordingly shewn to a bedroom in which it is impossible to doubt from the evidence that they passed the night together in the same bed.

"But the proceedings of the pursuer are no less remarkable. He says that on going from his shop to his house he retired to bed, but that 'I was wakened up about four or five o'clock the next morning, because I had a suspicion that my wife would be with Taylor. Nobody suggested to me to go to the Waverley Hotel, but I suspected that they would be there, because it was the nearest hotel to the boat.' He also says that on his way he met Inspector Parr, a constable named Gaffney, and told them what he wanted, and was informed by them that his wife was with Taylor in the Waverley Hotel. It is somewhat remarkable that although on his way to the hotel the policeman took him to Tait, who was then sleeping in the stair referred to, and although he spoke to Tait, he says he did not think of asking Tait what had become of his wife, or the evidence of the policeman Gaffney is still more strange. He says that about midnight he saw Tait, the defender, and Taylor walking about the streets, that two men, whom he did not know, came up to him, and, pointing to a woman, told him that she was Munro's wife. He then describes his seeing the defender and co-defender, after they had parted from Tait, walking up and down the street for a considerable time, and ultimately entering the Waverley Hotel. Then he says that at a later hour in the morning the pursuer came to him and asked him about his wife, 'and when the pursuer asked me about her, from the information I had received, I said I had seen her go with Taylor to the Waverley Hotel.' I must say that this appears to me to be a story full of suspicious circumstances, and I am inclined to suspect that the pursuer was not in his house at all that night in question, but that he was on the streets of Dundee, either watching the movements of the defender and Taylor, or causing them to be watched by the two men who addressed the policeman. Now, whether the object in sending for the defender from Newport was to throw her in the way of the co-defender, or whether the idea had occurred to him when he found that the defender could not return to Newport that night (and these are the circumstances which we have no means of solving), I think it cannot be doubted, after a study of the whole evidence, that at the final interview between the pursuer, his wife and Tait the pursuer deliberately resolved that she should wait in the streets of Dundee during that night, and that his expectation was that she might speedily meet Taylor and pass the night with him, and so enable him to establish against her a case of adultery sufficient to entitle him to a divorce. Having been the occasion of his wife leaving her respectable home in Newport and coming to Dundee, and being detained there until it was too late to return to Newport, it was clearly the duty of the pursuer to provide decent accommodation was provided for, or at least offered to his wife, either in his own house or in some respectable lodging. But instead of that, allowing her to hanker after Taylor, and that great and improper familiarity already taken place between them, and believing him to be in the neighbourhood hovering about and watching her footsteps, the pursuer deliberately sent his wife from his door to seek a bed wherever she pleased, and thus thrust her into the arms of her paramour. The case therefore appears to amount to lenocinium on the part of the pursuer, and indeed, to be exactly of the kind stated by Bankton, 1, 5, 130:—'If the husband was guilty of exposing his wife to lewd company, whereby she was ensnared to the commission of adultery, it would bar him from a decree on that head, it being a kind of parate from him, and was a free agent. Both acts of adultery were clearly proved. The fact of the second act following so soon after the first, and the various improper familiarities, served to corroborate the evidence of the first as to the first act.

No. 59.

Jan. 25, 1877.
Munro v.
Munro.

Argued for Mrs Munro;—The offence of lenocinium consisted in the husband neglecting his duty in shielding his wife from temptation if he knew of its existence. In this case he knew, or, at all events suspected, that Taylor was "hovering about" his wife, and he should have deterred her from his solicitations. Contrivance was not necessary to sustain the plea; wilful neglect which conduced to the act was sufficient.¹ The evidence, however, there was some appearance of contrivance on the part of the husband. He wrote to her to come, he detained her on the boat, and then he left her on the street exposed to the advances of her seducer, and for all he knew without the means of going for shelter. The very fact of his searching for his wife in order to find her in Taylor's company shewed what he expected and would happen. There was reason to suspect from the evidence that he dogged his wife all night in order to get proof of her guilt.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have had an able argument.

The case presents some features of considerable interest, and it belongs to a class of which not many appear upon the records of this Court. The ordinary has given great attention to it, and had the advantage also of seeing the witnesses, which in a question of credibility is always of importance. If it were not for the opinion arrived at by the Lord Ordinary, I should not have doubted what our judgment should be.

That the guilt of the defender is clearly proved on two occasions, and that there is no evidence of the pursuer conducing to or conniving at the miscarriage of his wife.

I go over the facts shortly as they appear to me. It is quite plain that the pursuer had reason to complain of his wife and his shopman. This couple had lived unhappily, owing to the levity of the wife's behaviour. The pursuer himself had seen familiarities between Taylor and his wife, although it is left unexplained, it is at least possible that the wife excused herself to the husband, and promised not to give occasion for complaint in future. Matters were in this state when the pursuer went to Stirling for a fortnight, when, according to the servant, Mary Robb, something occurred which left no doubt of the wife's guilt. It is said that Robb's evidence is not to be believed, because (1) she did not at once tell her master what she had seen, and (2) that when she did tell it was because of a quarrel with him, and presumed done of design.' Upon this passage of Bankton the Justice-Clerk (Ingles) observed in the case of Wemyss, 20th March 1866, A. 660—'That is quite in consistency with the law in the present day.' He said that the defender has not, in her pleas in law, stated any defence on the ground of lenocinium, but the averment by her in her defences fairly raised the case, and the facts disclosed in the proof establish these averments. I therefore, that although the defender and co-defender undoubtedly committed adultery on the night of the 18th or morning of the 19th September, the pursuer is not entitled to decree of divorce, seeing that by his treatment of his wife on that night he exposed her to the lewd solicitations of the defender, and was thus the occasion of her committing the adultery. The pursuer will therefore be assoziated, with expenses."

Groves v. Groves and Thompson, July 2, 1859, 28 L. J. Mat. Cases, 108.

No. 59.
Jan. 25, 1877.
Munro v.
Munro.

her mistress. I see nothing suspicious in either of these circumstances. Very often in such cases the servants are unwilling to tell what they have observed, and very often they do tell if a quarrel ensues. But it is also said that her evidence stands alone and uncorroborated. But the testimony of other persons who were witnesses both of previous familiarities and of the subsequent adultery amounts to competent and strong corroboration. These facts throw a light upon the first act as to leave no doubt of the defender's guilt. When Robb told the pursuer what had taken place he left the defender at Newport where they were then living, and went to his house in Dundee, and never returned to her.

After some time, it seems, for some reason—returning affection for his wife—some other cause—he wrote to the defender saying that he wished to see her. We have not that letter here. The pursuer says he merely said in it that he wished to see her, and that he himself meant to go to Newport for that purpose. At all events, she came to Dundee after getting that letter, and I have no doubt she took the opportunity of making an assignation with Taylor. Her husband did not expect her. She took her landlord, Tait—who appears to have been a respectable man—along with her. When they got to the pier the first man they met was Taylor. Tait and the defender and Taylor talked together some time, and then Tait goes for her husband, and Taylor goes away. The husband and wife have a conversation, in which he urged her to go with Taylor, but no satisfactory conclusion was come to. Then a quarter of eight before the last boat for Newport that evening, which sailed from a pier (according to the pursuer, who is the only witness asked as to this), five minutes from the place where they parted, Tait and the wife go off, and the husband watches them to see if they catch the boat. They fail to catch it, and the pursuer again joins them, and the husband and wife, and Tait start to return to the pursuer's shop. On the way there the wife hangs back and looks over her shoulder, evidently looking for some one. The husband noticing this, and seeing whom she is looking for, gets very angry, and a quarrel ensued. The husband went into his shop and left his wife standing in the street along with Tait. She then joined her paramour, Taylor, and went with him to the Waverley Hotel where, at 4 A.M., she is discovered by her husband and other witnesses in a position which left no doubt of her guilt.

This guilty wife now says that her injured husband is not to succeed in getting rid of her, because he connived at her fall, partly owing to his behaviour before that night, but especially in consequence of his not taking her from his own house or otherwise providing for her on that night, and so throwing her into the arms of Taylor, her seducer. We have had a learned argument as to the bearing of these facts. I cannot, however, see anything to indicate that the pursuer ever wished his wife to do anything but what was right and proper.

The behaviour of the pursuer before he went to St Fillans, although peculiar, was after all only remiss and foolish. But at last, finding that his wife, at a very moment when he was trying to persuade her to give Taylor up, was going for him, he grew naturally very indignant.

The idea of the argument for the defender is that he purposely left her in the street, hoping that she would yield herself to Taylor's solicitation. One thing is clear, that he never meant anything of this sort, up to the last moment of the events. It is also clear that he thought she was looking out for Taylor.

could not take her to his own house for the night, otherwise he might have been said to have condoned her former offence. Is it to be said that he ought to have looked out for, and taken her to, suitable lodgings? But he left her in the company of his friend Tait, and had no reason to assume that she could not find lodgings for herself. I cannot, on this evidence, convict him of one of the most sturdily actions of which human nature can be accused.

It was suggested in argument that the pursuer, instead of going home as he says he did, walked about for the greater part of the night watching his wife. I see nothing in the evidence to shew that. It seems to me quite easy to account for all that happened. He may have awakened and felt that he had been treating his wife harshly, and when thinking of her have considered where she was, and becoming jealous when he recollected about Taylor, risen and gone to find them together as he did. There is not a fact in this part of the case which needs to be cleared up. When the pursuer left his wife in the street he was too angry to look after her or to make any arrangement for her.

That being my view of the facts the questions of law do not arise.

With regard to the authorities quoted as to what constitutes such conduct as will found the plea here taken, there can be no doubt that corrupt intention is necessary. There must also be such utter recklessness as to amount to enough to raise the insuperable inference that the corrupting of his wife was in the pursuer's mind.

It must also be kept in view in this case that the parties were living separately, and that in consequence of the previous misconduct of the wife. When she was Dundee that night she was her own mistress.

On the whole matter I cannot say that I can discover in anything that the pursuer did grounds for the plea which has been sustained, or which has a tendency in that direction. I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and pronouncing decree in terms of the libel.

LORD ORMDALE.—Two acts of adultery are libelled in this case, and they are, to a certain extent, to be dealt with separately, but not necessarily without the evidence relating to the second act being looked at in considering the first.

With regard to the first act of alleged adultery there is only one witness who speaks directly to it, and if the case had stopped there I should have been inclined to say, that as, according to our law, one witness was not sufficient, the alleged act of adultery had not been established. But we have not only one witness to that first act of adultery, but also a second act completely and factorily established—indeed, not disputed. Now, where there are two acts of this nature, separated not by a very long time, the Court is entitled to hold that both are established, although there is only one witness who speaks directly of them.

It is Mary Robb, the only witness who speaks to the first act of adultery, who is believed at all? For myself I see no sufficient reason for disbelieving her. Her conduct is subject to observation, and her evidence must be carefully scrutinised. It is true she did not communicate what she had seen for a long time, and only did so when she had quarrelled with her mistress; and accordingly it is suggested that what she then told was out of vindictiveness, and is not to be believed. That is a common observation in such circumstances, and is not always easily to be got over. But here, I think, it may and ought

No. 59.

Jan. 25, 1877.
Munro v.
Munro.

to be got over, having regard to the mass of corroborative evidence which is to support the witness Mary Robb's testimony. That being so, there is good and sufficient evidence in a legal point of view to establish the first act of adultery although there is only one witness who directly speaks to it.

In regard to the alleged second act of adultery and the plea of lenocinium set up against it, it is important to keep in view that the pursuer had left his wife, because he believed, from the information he had received from Mary Robb, that she had been guilty of adultery with his shopman in his absence from Dundee. There is some obscurity as to the way in which the meeting took place between the pursuer and his wife in the course of the evening before the second act of adultery was brought about; but I have little doubt that your Lordship's account of it is the correct one.

The husband being possibly desirous of getting reconciled to the wife, whom he had been married for many years wrote her a letter with that object in view, which has not been recovered. But he says he did not in that letter ask her to come to Dundee. Be that, however, as it may, she did come to Dundee, and stayed at Newport, where she was then living, and found Taylor, the co-respondent, waiting for her on the pier. I must say it seems odd that she, coming to meet her husband at Dundee with Tait,—whom every one seems agreed in calling a respectable man,—should have made an appointment—for she must have done so—with her paramour Taylor to meet her there on her arrival. She soon after her arrival had an interview on the street with her husband, the pursuer, the result of which was not a reconciliation; and he retires to his house. It is said that he shut the door in her face, and that that was wrong, as by doing so he exposed her to the seductive arts of Taylor, and other lewd company. I think if he had done anything else but shut the door on the defender, believing as he then did that she had been unfaithful to him, and about to raise, as he then did, an action for divorce against her on the head of adultery, he would have acted very foolishly and inconsistently. I asked in vain the counsel for the defender what else could he have done in the circumstances. He could not have entered into his house without barring his contemplated action of divorce, and he was not entitled to put her under restraint or to coerce her in any way. She was a free agent, and could go where she pleased. The pursuer's conduct, if it had taken her into his house, would have been founded on against him as a defence to condonation.

So far therefore as the plea of lenocinium can be held to have arisen in consequence of the pursuer's conduct on the occasion referred to I see no ground for it.

A good deal was said in the course of the argument as to what constitutes lenocinium; and the authority of Sanchez was cited in support of the defender's exposition of it. But for my own part I prefer the statement of the doctrine as given by the Lord President (then Lord Justice-Clerk) in the case of W. Munro v. W. Munro. His Lordship in that case took occasion to say,—“It is not necessary to define lenocinium precisely. It is safer to keep to general description; but I think that I have not the least doubt that when a husband is accessory to the commission of adultery by his wife, or is participant in the crime, or is the direct cause of her lapse from virtue, he will be obnoxious to the plea of lenocinium.” This recommendation of itself to me as a fair definition of what constitutes lenocinium as far as anything like a definition of the plea, depending so much, as it necessarily must, upon the particular circumstances of each case in which it is put forward as a defence, can be given. But, taking it as given by the Lord President able to hold that the plea is supported or can be given effect to in the proved facts and circumstances of the present case. Neither can I concur with the Ordinary in thinking that the dicta quoted by him from Bankton can be applied to apply.

No. 59.

Jan. 25, 1877.

Munro v.
Munro

The result is that, as the adultery of Mrs Munro on the second occasion, if the first,—I think on both,—has not only been proved, but so conclusively not to be disputed by her counsel, and as the plea or defence that the husband sinned to her dishonour, conduct than which nothing can be figured more base and contemptible, has not in my opinion been established, the interdict reclaimed against must be recalled, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuer as concluded for in the summons.

LAD GIFFORD.—I have come ultimately and without any difficulty to the same conclusion. I think it necessary to distinguish sharply between the evidence of the adultery and the evidence of the alleged lenocinium. The pursuer must of all establish by sufficient evidence the fact of adultery, the whole onus of which of course lies upon him, and it is only after the adultery has been proved that it becomes necessary to consider the question of lenocinium, which the defender must prove. The onus of establishing the lenocinium lies upon the defender. She must shew that her husband himself concurred to or was to blame for her infidelity. The adultery falls to be proved first. Now, on this point of the case I have no doubt that both the alleged acts of adultery have been fully proved. Certainly the first act rests on the testimony of only one witness, and is supported by very slender corroborative evidence; but then the second act is clearly proved, and, indeed, is hardly disputed, and there is no need to establish also grossly improper familiarities, and these throw a reflex light on what went before, for where there is one witness to a direct act, and a second act and loose conduct is also clearly proved, the first act must be held proved likewise, although, if it had stood alone, the evidence might have been insufficient. But next comes the second question in the case,—was there lenocinium? And it is here alone that there is really any difficulty. In considering this question I cannot help remarking on the absence of the defender from the witness-box. She was a competent and protected witness, not bound to answer any question tending to prove her own guilt. Nay, such questions, if asked to, could not even be put to her. But without approaching her own conduct she might have told of her husband's conduct on which this part of her case is founded, and it is difficult to explain why she was not examined on points as might have tended to establish fault on the part of the husband, as her want of money on that night in Dundee when her husband left her in the street, and whether she had any friend in Dundee to whose house she might have gone for shelter, or what means she took to procure a lodging in Dundee. She would have been the best witness to say whether she was exposed by her husband to temptation. She would not have been obliged to say whether she yielded to temptation or not. But really there is no case at all here against the husband of lenocinium or improper connivance. The worst that can be said of the husband is that he was very lenient—perhaps too lenient and too ready to forgive. He seemed prepared to condone her first offence, and to overlook even those acts of indecent familiarity which he had himself seen. Even on that point in Dundee he seems to have been not indisposed to have taken back his wife and forgive everything. But condonation is certainly not lenocinium, and

No. 59.

Jan. 25, 1877.

Munro v.

Muuro.

it is difficult indeed to read overtures for reconciliation as equivalent to consent to continued transgression. To my mind there is not evidence of lenocinium at all. I do not see what course the husband could have taken in the circumstances excepting that which he adopted. He could not receive her into his house. She was in the very act of communicating with and signalling to her paramour. If she had money to provide herself with lodgings, could her husband be blamed for leaving her to go where she pleased. He could not control her. The argument is that he offered Tait money, but he made no such offer to her. But she did not ask it, and, what is more to the purpose, she does not come to say she had no money. I am afraid whether money had been given her or not, it would have gone with Taylor to the Waverley Hotel, or wherever else he chose to take her. If, then, the questions be, did the husband by his own conduct cause or conduce to his wife's guilt, or did he connive at or consent to it, I have no hesitation in answering these questions in the negative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is here no plea or statement on record which raises this question. I make this remark in order that such an omission may not occur in any subsequent case.

Counsel for Mrs Munro moved for the expenses of her defence. Counsel for the pursuer did not object to the motion being granted, but asked that decree for all the expenses of the action be pronounced against the co-defender Taylor.¹

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor. Find that the principal defender committed adultery with the principal defender on the occasions libelled, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the co-defender liable to pay the pursuer in expenses, as well those incurred by the pursuer himself as those for which the pursuer may be liable in respect of the expenses of the principal defender: Further, find the pursuer to pay the expenses incurred by the principal defender, and to the Auditor to tax the expenses now found due as between agent and client, and to report, and decern."

DEWAR & DEAR, W.S.—DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.

Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

JOHN COLQUHOUN AND ANOTHER (Sir James Colquhoun's Trustees) Pursuers.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Kinnear—Mackintosh.
ARCHIBALD ORR EWING AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Balfour—Moncreiff—Jameson.

Navigable River—Title to Sue—Public Right.—The public have a right to object to any erection being made in the alveus of a public navigable river whether it is proved to be detrimental to the navigation or not.

Navigable River—Obstruction.—A bridge was erected across the river by the proprietor of both banks, two of the piers being built in the water. The river had been from time immemorial navigated by small vessels between Clyde and Loch Lomond. The part where the bridge was built was not affected by the flow of the tide. It was doubtful on the evidence whether one of the piers was or was not an obstruction to the navigation. Held that the river was a public navigable river, that no person had a right to execute any works which would obstruct the navigation, and that at the instance of any member of the public such work might be removed.

¹ Andrews v. Andrews, Feb. 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 401, 45 Scot. Jur. 2.

Navigable River—Tidal River—Alveus.—In navigable rivers, where the tide ebbs and flows, the alveus belongs to the Crown; but where the tide does not ebb and flow, the alveus belongs to the proprietors of the banks.

Navigable River.—Observed, that the right of the public in a navigable river where the tide does not ebb and flow is analogous to a public right of way.

River—Road—Public Place.—A large inland lake surrounded by a considerable population, several villages, and the estates of different proprietors, is a public place in a question of right of way.

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

THIS was an action by the trustees of the late Sir James Colquhoun of 1st DIVISION.
ss against Archibald Orr Ewing and Company, calico-printers, Leven- Lord Ruth-rk, in the county of Dumbarton. The conclusions were for declarator furd Clark.
that the river Leven, throughout its course from Loch Lomond until it B.
falls into the river or firth of Clyde at Dumbarton, is a navigable river, and open to the public; that the defenders have no right to execute any works which will in any way interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof or the free use of its banks, and of the towing-path along the bank of the said river, for the purposes of navigation; and that the defenders have no right to erect any bridges, piers, or other works therewith connected, which will in any way injuriously affect the rights and interests of the pursuers as proprietors of salmon-fishings in the said river Leven and in Loch Lomond; and . . . that the bridge over the said river which the defenders are at present erecting at or near to Dillichip, in the said county of Dumbarton, and the piers or supports thereof, and any works therewith connected, do at present, and will when completed, obstruct the free navigation of the said river, and the use of its banks and towing-path, to the injury of the pursuers, and will also injuriously affect the rights and interests in the salmon-fishings in the said river and Loch; and that the defenders should be ordained to remove the bridge.
The pursuers, who were proprietors of land on the banks of Loch Lomond and of salmon-fishings in the Leven, averred that the pillars of a bridge which the defenders were erecting across the Leven interfered on one side with the towing-path, and on the other side, where the pillars were placed in the bed of the river, that they obstructed the passage of boats: that the erection of the bridge would materially interfere with the transmission of the produce from their farms and of goods to them, which would now have to be carried at greater expense by road or rail.
The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The river Leven being a public navigable river, the defenders have no right to make any erection in the channel of the river; on its banks, or on the towing-path, which will in any way interfere with the free navigation thereof. (2) The pursuers, their predecessors and authors, having by themselves and by their tenants and others hitherto the free use of the river and its banks and towing-path, for the purposes of navigation and floating timber, the defenders are not entitled to do anything which will impede or obstruct the said uses hitherto had in them.

There were also pleadings as to injury to salmon-fishings, but no evidence was offered on that point.

The defenders averred that the river had been dedicated to manufacturing purposes for forty years; that sufficient room was left for a towing-path; that the navigation was not obstructed, because the main span of the bridge was ninety feet, extending over the whole of the water available for boats; and that the pier in the water chiefly complained of was in line with the catch-water wall of an intake or lade a little lower down, so that boatmen would have to avoid that spot at any rate. Further, that James Colquhoun had assented by letter to the erection of the bridge.
The pursuers pleaded that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant. (3) The

No. 60. river Leven having been for upwards of forty years dedicated to manufacturing uses, and the bridge in question being necessary for the proper conduct and enjoyment of the defenders' works, and constituting no interference or material interference with any uses claimed by the pursuers, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (4) Acquiescence. (5) None. The pursuers' interests being injuriously affected by the operations complained of, they are not entitled to sue the present action.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

The following facts appeared on a proof:—The bridge, which was finished shortly after the action was raised, was built by the defenders over a part of the river above the flowing of the tide, and at a point where they were proprietors of the land on both sides, to connect their works at Levenbank with the North British Railway on the opposite side. It was constructed of iron girders laid on four stone piers of five feet diameter. Two of these were on the right bank, and the evidence went to shew that the towing-path, though altered, was at least as convenient as before. The other two were in the river, towards the left bank, the nearest to the channel being nearly in a line with an intake a short distance farther down. There had always been regular navigation, by means of small vessels called scows or gabbarts, between Dumbarton and Loch Lomond. They were towed up, and came down with the stream. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the one pillar was or was not an obstruction to the boats descending. The import of it is sufficiently given in the following opinions. On 14th May 1872, when the bridge was in contemplation, Sir James Colquhoun's factor wrote to the defenders' engineer to say that Sir James "would make no objection, provided his fishing and other interests were not interfered with."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the river Leven, throughout its course from Loch Lomond to where it falls into the river or firth of Clyde at Dumbarton, is a navigable river free and open to the public, and that the defenders have no right to erect any works which will in any way interfere with or obstruct the navigation thereof, or the free use of its banks, and of the towing-path on the bank of the said river, for the purposes of navigation, and declares that the piers recently erected by the defenders in the bed of the said river, near to the east bank, are an obstruction to the navigation thereof: Therefore decerns and ordains the defenders forthwith to remove the said piers: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses subject to modification," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The pursuers ask to have it declared that they have a public right of navigation in the river Leven. The defenders, on the other hand, contend that the river is private, and that no public right of navigation exists.

"It is certain that for a long period of time the river has been navigated by a particular class of vessels called scows or gabbarts. They descend the river by the force of the current; but they are towed up by horse haulage. There is a towing-path on the right bank. It ends about 800 yards from Loch Lomond, after which the boats are poled up to the loch.

"The river has been thus used for the purpose of carrying to the Clyde the produce of the lands on Loch Lomond side, and of bringing to that district the necessaries of life. This use was required by the proprietors and their tenants. An attempt was made in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, unsuccessfully, to shew that the navigation had been carried on for a more general purpose.

"This traffic was carried on to some extent by boats belonging to the proprietors or tenants on Loch Lomond side, but chiefly by boats belonging to persons who kept them in readiness for hire. It was formerly more considerable than it now is. But though it has been diminished by the railways, it is not altogether unimportant. It is probable, however, that loaded boats will not be taken to

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—This was not a public navigable river. That term was applicable only to a river where the tide ebbcd and

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

and that the navigation in that direction will be confined to empty boats, and to bring down a cargo.

The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that a public right of navigation exists in the river Leven. That it is navigable is proved by the fact that it has been used as a natural channel of communication between an extensive tract and the Clyde. It is within the definition of a public or navigable river given by Erskine, 2, 6, 17, and by Bell in his Principles, sec. 648.

The defenders contended that no right of public navigation could exist when navigation could not be carried on in both directions without the use of a horse haulage. For this proposition no authority was cited, and it is not supported by the dicta of the institutional writers. Whether the public have a right to use the bank of a navigable river for traction the Lord Ordinary did not stop to inquire. Such a right has existed for time immemorial in connection with the navigation of the river Leven, and it does not appear to be doubtful whether it depends upon common law or on usage.

The Lord Ordinary is right so far, the next question is, whether the bridge is an obstruction to the navigation. The pursuers make two complaints; first, in regard to the alteration of the towing-path, and, second, in regard to the piers which are placed in the bed of the river. The Lord Ordinary does not think that they have any well founded cause of complaint as regards the former, but the latter, in his mind, presents a very serious question for consideration.

The piers are situated in what must be considered the bed of the river. The defenders do not doubt that the site on which they stand had originally formed part of the bank, which was removed to form the lade of the distillery. But this is at the best no more than a conjecture. At any rate the lade has been in use to flow over the site beyond the memory of man, and the lade had at one time formed part of the bank, it must, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, be taken to be a part of the alveus of the river.

The defenders maintain that the piers do not obstruct the navigation. The evidence on this question is very contradictory. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary prefers that of the pursuers. The witnesses for the defenders give a very intelligible account of the manner in which they have been accustomed to use their boats between the piers and the right bank of the river. One witness, however, is very evident, that in descending the river a boat will have less time to clear the bridge than to clear the obstruction presented by the defenders' catch-water dyke.

The defenders further maintained that they were not encroaching on the rights of the public, even though the piers were to be considered to be an obstruction. They argued that the river had been employed for other uses than navigation, and that, if a reasonable space was left for the exercise of navigation, the public had no right to complain though the navigation might be less convenient than before. They rely on the case of Grant v. Gordon, 1870, where regulations were made for the floating of timber down the river and salmon-fishing by means of cruives.

The Lord Ordinary has not been able to adopt that view. He thinks that the defenders cannot place in the bed of the river any obstruction which materially obstructs the navigation, and that they cannot appeal to what has hitherto been done as any sanction for such an act. It is to be presumed that the uses of the river or its bed has been put do not injure the navigation, or if it is found that the public have lost their right to object. But prior encroachment will not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, justify further encroachment.

The case of Grant is a peculiar one. It related to the regulation of two different rights in the river, the one of floating down timber, and the other of salmon-fishing by means of cruives. It had been previously decided that fishing by means of cruives was a lawful mode of fishing, and it was certain that it had been so for time immemorial. It is true that the pursuers alleged that in

No. 60. flowed. In a public navigable river the alveus belonged to the Crown, and no one had a right to make any erection upon it, whether it was proved to be an obstruction or not. But above the flow of the tide the alveus belonged to the proprietors, like the rest of the soil of Scotland. There was no reason prima facie why they should not erect anything pleased on their property.¹ Accordingly, the Leven not being a public navigable river, any right the pursuers possessed fell under the ordinary ways. It must be a right analogous to a right to use a highway, or a lesser right of a servitude of passage. It was not a highway, because it did not connect two public places. It was not, however, denied that the proprietors round Loch Lomond had a servitude right of passage over the water; but then a servitude must be used in the way least burdensome to the servient tenement, and it was only established by usage. Talis præscriptum quantum possessum. If there was a real obstruction to navigation as formerly used it must be removed; but there was none. The pier was in a line with the catch-water dyke of the intake, and the boatmen had always been obliged to steer out in order to avoid it, and had not to do so more now than before. The ground of decisions such as *Bicket v. Morris*² was that the opposite proprietors had a common intention. Further, Sir J. Colquhoun had consented to the erection of the bridge, and no injury was done to his rights.

The pursuers argued;—A public navigable river was defined as a river on which floats might be carried.³ And the river connected two public places—Dumbarton and Loch Lomond, where Luss and Glasgow had for centuries been market towns. It might be the law of England that the alveus of a navigable river belonged to the Crown only so far as the tide flowed. That was not the law of Scotland, and even if it were the water might be public property, though the soil was private property. And moreover, it was settled by the case of Bicket v. Morris, that even when the alveus was private property, one proprietor was entitled to oblige the proprietor ex adverso making any erection in the alveus, even on his own side, and when no injury or prospective injury could be proved. It was therefore not necessary to prove an obstruction to the navigation. But it had been proved that the pier was an obstruction. The right was not analogous to a servitude road. It was a public right, and there was a great difference between even the lowest kind of public highway, a right of way and a servitude road.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action complain that the defendants in erecting a bridge across the river Leven, at a part of that river where the proprietors on both sides, have built the piers of the bridge in such a way in the alveus of the river as to interfere with the navigation, and also to obstruct and interfere with the pursuers' right of salmon-fishing. As regards the latter recent times alterations had been made on the dykes which impeded the navigation. But with both these co-existent rights the Court could do no more than regulate the possession of both. This does not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, justify the introduction into the bed of the river Leven of a new obstruction to the navigation.

“No case was made as to the alleged obstruction of the passage of salmon.”

¹ Hale, de Jure Maris, App.; Hall on Sea Shore, App. p. 5; Craig, 1, 10, Stair, 2, 1, 5; Angell on Watercourses, 552, 560.

² May 20, 1864, 2 Macph. 1082, 36 Scot. Jur. 529—July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. H. L. 44, 38 Scot. Jur. 547.

³ Ersk. ii. 1, 5, ii. 6, 17; Bell's Prin. 648, 651.

ed injury no evidence has been given at all to support the averments of the No. 60.
 and that part of the case, therefore, is no longer before us.

The first defence which is made—at least the defence which requires to be Jan. 26, 1877.
 considered—is a plea of acquiescence. It is said that the pursuers of this Colquhoun's as representing the late Sir James Colquhoun, are barred from insisting, Trustees v. Orr as he consented to the erection of this bridge, or acquiesced in its being Ewing and Co.
 and therefore if he had been alive now he could not have been here to claim. If I thought that defence well founded of course I should come to a conclusion that the pursuers were not entitled to insist, and that the action to be dismissed. The conclusions which alone the pursuers now insist in conclusions which they maintain as representatives of the public, because it public use of the river as a navigable river that they seek here to vindicate set up. And even if the pursuers were excluded from suing this action, the action were dismissed, it would not prevent any other member of the from taking up the complaint and insisting in it. But if they are not from suing this action by acquiescence, then we must take it that the are here as the proper representatives of the public, and not in any capacity. I am of opinion that there is not sufficient evidence of acquiescence. The letter which has been founded on by the defenders in support of the plea, dated 14th May 1872, by Sir James Colquhoun's factor to some representing the defenders, merely says that, referring to a recent conversation, the writer is directed by Sir James Colquhoun to say that he will make no objection, provided his fishing and other rights are not interfered with. Now, I suppose that by "other rights," as mentioned in that letter, it was not intended to embrace the right of using this river for the purposes of navigation and with all the subjects of the realm; and if it turns out that those rights are interfered with, then no plea of acquiescence can be founded upon it. The other evidence which was attempted to be brought in support of the plea I do not think requires any particular notice. I am very clearly of opinion that the pursuers are not barred from insisting in this action, and that they are entitled to insist in it as members of the public, and as representing the public interest.

That being so, the question is, whether there is here an obstruction or alleged obstruction to the navigable river; for that is the case presented by the pursuers. It has been contended that this is not in any proper sense a navigable river, and our attention has been very properly called to the distinction which exists between navigable rivers of different kinds—between a salt-water river where the tide ebbs and flows and a proper fresh-water river, which is undoubtedly is at the part of the river with which we have to deal.
 The distinction between the two is very important as regards legal principle, where the tide ebbs and flows the alveus of the river is the property of the Crown for public purposes as well as the banks of the river, and in such a case that the rights of the Crown are much more extensive than they can be in a proper fresh-water river. The Crown, acting through the proper department of State, would be entitled to deepen a river where the tide ebbs and flows, and to perform any operation upon the alveus of the river conducive to the improvement of the navigation. Not so with a freshwater river. The alveus of a fresh-water river is the property of the proprietors of the banks, just as the alveus of a stream which is not navigable is the property of the proprietors upon the banks. But notwithstanding of that distinc-

No. 60. tion, which is a very clear one, there may be a public use of a fresh-water river for the purposes of navigation, and although the rights of the Crown for the benefit of the public are not the same there, nor by any means so extensive. Jan. 28, 1877. Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr Ewing and Co. in the case of the estuary of a river where the tide ebbs and flows, you doubtlessly there may be public rights of navigation, and public rights of navigation which are capable of being defended very much in the same way as they would be in any other case. The right of the public over a river of this class is not like a right of way than the right of the public which is protected by the Crown in the case of a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows, and I am very much disposed to deal with this case as if it were just a right of way along a river, by means of this river, where it is fitted for purposes of navigation.

Some reference was made to casual remarks which I made in charging a jury in the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, Dec. 21, 1866, 5 Mac 214, and I am sorry to observe that those remarks were rather loosely made, that they suggested a view of the law in that respect which I am not by any means prepared to maintain,—thinking, on the contrary, that the exposition which I have now given is a great deal more accurate than what I appear to have stated in the course of that trial.

But it seems to be contended further, on the part of the defenders, that there is a very inferior sort of navigation of which the river Leven at this part of it is susceptible,—as if the legal rules applicable to a subject of this kind varied according to the extent to which a river is navigable. But I rather think that if a river is navigable at all, and has been enjoyed and used as a navigable river by the public, the rights of the public must be judged very much according to the same rule, whether the river be capable of being navigated by vessels of one kind or another, by vessels of large or small dimensions. The legal principle which I apprehend, would be entirely the same, and the question therefore comes to whether this is a fresh-water river, at the part of it with which we have to do, which has been used by the public as a navigable river beyond the memory of man. Upon that question of fact I entertain no doubt whatever. I think the evidence upon that subject is perfectly conclusive, and it appears to me that the attempt to represent Loch Lomond as being not a public place is perfectly hopeless. The river Leven affords access to and from Loch Lomond, which we all know is one of the largest sheets of fresh water in this kingdom, and is the boundary between two counties for a long distance—for somewhere, I think, about thirty miles. There are four very large parishes which abut upon its shore, and it is surrounded by the estates of, I think, eleven different proprietors, some of them very extensive proprietors, and others of them small proprietors. There are many inns and cottages upon the banks of Loch Lomond, and there are villages. These villages are said to stand upon the private estates of some of those large proprietors; surely that does not prevent this loch from being surrounded by a considerable population, who represent, and are, in fact, the public of that district of country; and therefore to say that Loch Lomond is a private loch, as much as if it were a small loch in the middle of a landlord's policy, appears to me to be perfectly monstrous. Therefore I do not entertain the smallest doubt that the navigation of the river Leven, having been carried on past the memory of man in the manner which has been described in the evidence, makes the Leven a public navigable river to all intents and purposes, so far as a fresh-water river can be so made.

In these circumstances, it follows that the public having such rights of

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

are undoubtedly entitled, and any one of the public is entitled, to vindicate and protect those rights against any encroachment upon the bed of the river. The Lord Ordinary's findings, I think, are quite satisfactory in so far as they establish that this river is "a navigable river, free and open to the public, and that the defendants have no right to execute any works which will in any way interfere with or obstruct the navigation or free use of its banks, and of the approach along the bank of the said river, for the purposes of navigation;" I need only say, with reference to that last finding, that I should have been inclined to make it a little more extensive than his Lordship has done, because it seems to imply that in order to enable the public to complain they must be enabled to shew that the operations of which they complain do in point of fact, and at the present time, interfere with or obstruct the navigation. I do not think the burden upon the pursuers in an action of this kind is so heavy as his Lordship supposes. On the contrary, it rather appears to me that if any person builds a bridge over such a river as this, fixes its piers in the channel of the river, he is in point of fact committing what is an illegality in itself. No man has no right to build in the alveus of the river. No man is entitled to build in the alveus of a small stream, at least without the consent of all the proprietors who are interested in that stream, and I think, multo magis, no man is entitled to build anything in the alveus of a stream in which the public has a right of navigation. In short, I am inclined to be of opinion that the principle which was firmly established in the case of Bicket v. Morris, 2 Macph. 1 Macph. (H. of L.) 44, is quite as applicable to a river of the description now dealing with as it was to a private stream. The principle of that case seems to be, that where there are other parties besides the party complained of who have an interest in a running water it is illegal to build in alveo. It is not, I think, to say, in defence of the operation complained of, that it does no harm. It may be that at the present moment the injury may not be done, and yet it may occur, because nothing is so wilful and capricious (if I may use the expression) as a stream of running water, and it is almost impossible to foresee what the effect may be of any interference with the navigable channel of such a stream as regards the proprietors further down the stream, or as regards the proprietors opposite to the place where the operation is carried out. In like manner, in the case of a navigable river like this, where there is an abundance of water, and where the deep part of the channel is but narrow, there is nothing to spare in the way of room for navigation, it is very difficult to foresee what the effect of any operation of this kind may be in times of flood or drought, or in various states of the river. The deep water channel of a river like this may shift and vary by the operation of causes with which we are very imperfectly acquainted, and which even experts of the highest skill are unable to foresee. And therefore to put down the pier of a bridge or any building in the alveus of a river of this kind appears to me to be what I call a dangerous operation as regards the navigation, even though it cannot be shewn that at the present moment it constitutes an absolute obstruction to navigation.

I have made these observations because I have some little difficulty in saying that the evidence before us shows the preponderance or weight of the evidence in favour of the pursuers upon the question of fact whether the piers of this bridge at the present moment constitute an obstruction to the navigation. It is not clear to me in that respect, and if the pursuers were under the burden of

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.

Colquhoun's

Trustees v. Orr

Ewing and Co.

proving, as matter of fact, that at the present moment there is an obstruction to the navigation caused by the existence of those piers I should hesitate to assent to that proposition. But then the view which I take of the law is most materially strengthened when I find that men of skill, and men of practical knowledge, well, upon the part of the pursuers, have expressed their strong opinion even as the matter stands at present they consider this to be an obstruction to the navigation. Supposing them to be wrong in that respect, they cannot be so far wrong but that a very slight change in the condition of this river will make that an obstruction to the navigation which at present perhaps is not.

The law upon which I think this case falls to be decided was, as I said, very firmly established in the case of Bicket v. Morris; but it was not, I think, for the first time made the law of Scotland by that judgment. On the contrary, it appears to me that in the two earlier cases which were reported by Lord Kerran—the cases of the Magistrates of Aberdeen v. Menzies, 1748, M. 1. 1. and Farquharson v. Farquharson, 1741, M. 12,779—the very same doctrine was laid down with regard to streams not navigable, and in one of those cases certainly a stream of very considerable size, the river Tay, although at a distance of the Tay not very far from Loch Tay. But that the doctrine itself is well established, and is applicable to a case of this kind, I think may be made very clear by citation of one or two passages from the opinions of the Judges in this case, and in the House of Lords in the case of Bicket v. Morris, and the result being, to my mind, so very important, I take the liberty of closing my remarks with these. Lord Benholme says—"Without my consent," meaning the consent of the proprietor on the other side of the river, "you are not to build your building in the channel of the river, for that in some degree must obstruct the natural flow of the water. What may be the result no human being can with certainty know; but it is my right to prevent you doing it, and when you do me an injury, whether I can qualify damages or not." Lord Brougham says—"Neither can any of the proprietors occupy the alveus with solid structures without the consent of the others, because he thereby affects the use of the whole stream. The idea of compelling a party to define how it will affect upon him, or what damage or injury it will produce, is out of the question." The Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford) says, after quoting these opinions, "These views appear to me to be perfectly sound in principle, and to be supported by authority. The proprietors upon the opposite banks of the river have a common interest in the stream, and although each has a property in the alveus on his own side to the medium filum fluminis, neither is entitled to use the stream in such a manner as to interfere with the natural flow of the water." Lord Westbury, who seemed to think that the case was entirely new, and did not recognise the cases which I have mentioned as reported by Lord Kilgour, in really establishing this doctrine, says—"This is a case of very considerable importance, because, so far as I know, it will be the first decision establishing an important principle that a material encroachment upon the alveus of a stream may be complained of by an adjacent or an ex adverso proprietor, and the necessity of proving either that damage has been sustained, or that it is likely to be sustained from that cause." And he goes on—"I have felt some difficulty upon it, because undoubtedly a proposition of that nature is somewhat at variance with the principles and rules established on the subject by the law. I am, however, convinced that the proposition, as it has been laid down in the Court below, and as it has received the sanction of your Lordships, ordinance, is one that is founded in good sense, and ought to be established by the authority of law." No. 60.

Now, it must be observed that the interest which was there held to be violated by the erection in alveo was the interest of a proprietor on the banks of the stream, and in that respect, but in that respect alone, I think the case there held differs from the present; because here the party complaining has not the interest of a proprietor, but only the interest of one of the public. I do not think that the case of Sir James Colquhoun's Trustees is really based upon the notion that they have a private right here as distinguished from that of any member of the public. But it appears to me that the distinction is one of consequence in the application of the legal principle. The proprietor on the banks of a stream has an interest to prevent an erection in the alveus, because he may interfere with his rights—it may interfere with the flow of the stream and so injure him. But it is not because he is a proprietor on the banks of the stream, but because, being a proprietor on the banks of the stream, he has an interest in the water, that he has a title to complain, and it is because he has a right in this water that they, I think, have a title to complain. The title is not so much that of proprietorship as of interest in a running stream; and in that respect the title of the complainers here and the title of the complainer in Bicket v. Morris are identical in principle.

I am therefore, of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to prevail in those instances of the summons which are directed to the removal of the piers of the river, as an interference with the alveus of a navigable river.

PLEAS.—There are two classes of public navigable rivers, the incidents of which are different—those in which the tide ebbs and flows, and those in which there is either no ebb and flow of the tide, or which have a navigable stream, and where that ebb and flow extends. The Lord Ordinary finds that the River of Leven, now in dispute, throughout its course from Loch Lomond to the mouth of Clyde, is "a navigable river, free and open to the public," but he distinguishes—at least not in express terms—to which of the two classes of navigable rivers he holds the river to belong—whether that portion of the river at or near Dumbarton, where the tide ebbs and flows, or that portion of the river where there is no ebb and flow of the tide, on that portion the works now complained of are constructed. Over the whole course of the river from the sea to Loch Lomond the pursuers have maintained the argument that the character of the right of navigation is one and the same, and that it belongs to them in common with the whole public.

If the character of the right in question were the same above as below, and flow of the tide there could be no doubt at all that the works in question would be illegal, without the necessity of proving that injury to the navigation does or may actually result from them. The alveus of the tidal river belongs to the Crown for behoof of the public, and it is too clear that no novum opus could be lawfully constructed by an individual on that part of the river. Nor does the summons or record really raise any question. The declaratory conclusions, the averments, and the pleas, are all directed exclusively against works which do or are calculated to obstruct or interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the non-tidal part of the river, or the use of the banks and towing-path in connection with that navigation. It may be conceded that the right of navigation in that part of the river

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

No. 60. Leven, where the tide ceases to ebb and flow, belongs to the whole public

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

with the right of navigation in the tidal part of the river. But it does not follow from this that works on the alveus of the non-tidal part of the river are objected to as illegal simply because they would have been illegal if they had been in the tidal part of the river. The public right of navigation in the tidal part of the river is different in its origin and character from the public right of navigation in the other part of the river, and there is a corresponding difference in the incidents of those rights. The right of navigation where the tide does ebb and flow arises from use only, and depends upon the nature of that use. The right where the tide ebbs and flows requires no use or allegation of use. The Crown holds the solum of the tidal part of the river as trustee for the whole public, but in the remaining portion of the river the proprietors of the banks are the proprietors of the solum of the river, and the right of navigation on the part of others requires use to found and support it. In the present case, therefore, I think it incumbent on the pursuers to make out that the works objected to do or may cause obstruction to the kind of navigation which has been prescriptively practised by members of the public; but, on the other hand, I think that the proof sufficiently preponderates in that direction. I do not intend to go into the details of the proof. In some respects it is difficult; but upon the whole I think the burden of the proof is in favour of the respondents there being a certain degree of obstruction at present, and I think that it is events impossible to say that there is no ground for apprehending obstruction in future. Either of these reasons is quite sufficient to entitle any member of the public interested in the navigation to object to such an erection as that here, and consequently to justify the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary arrived.

LORD MURE.—I have felt this case to be one of considerable difficulty in reference to the question of the obstruction of the navigation. Putting aside the question of salmon-fishing, which has been practically given up by the pursuers, it appears to me that the action depends exclusively upon whether the bridge has here been done will have the effect of obstructing the navigation of the river. The object of the action is to have the bridge, which was completed before the action was raised, removed, upon the ground that it obstructs the navigation of a navigable river. In looking at the summons and record and pleadings, I find that that is the special and only objection, apart from the alleged infringement of the right of salmon-fishing, which is taken to the proceedings of the respondents and the interest which the pursuers have is set forth as matter of fact in the summons and the record of the condensation. The bridge, therefore, is not, I think, challenged upon an abstract ground (as I read the record) that the erection of a bridge over a navigable river, the piers of which bridge rest on part of the bank, or on the bed of the river, is in itself an illegal act, to which the pursuers are entitled to object, and which they are entitled to have removed; but the action is now brought to be laid on the ground of actual injury to the pursuers' rights of navigation, and their right of salmon-fishing. In this view it is unnecessary to go upon the question relative to the distinction between the tidal and non-tidal part of a navigable river, as regards the rights of proprietors along the banks of a river to deal with the banks and alveus. I may, however, state that at this point I see no reason to differ from the view of your Lordship and Lord of Session that there is a distinction between the tidal and non-tidal part of a river.

and I am disposed to think that the proprietors of the ground on either side of the non-tidal part of a river would be entitled to do things which the proprietors on the banks along the tidal part would not be entitled to do, and as a distinction not in favour of the pursuers. But the question which is raised is a simple question of fact—Will the erection of this bridge be injurious to the navigation and thereby injure the pursuers' rights? In the condescendence, where it sets forth the interest the pursuers have to raise this question, the most material interest stated is "the effect which the bridge, as it is constructed, will have on the value or return from the estate under their control." The erection of the bridge will, it is said, materially interfere with the production of the produce from the farms, and of goods to them. The action has therefore been laid on very special grounds; and I think the letter to which the Lordship has referred, from the factor of the late Sir James Colquhoun, in 1812, may account for its having been so laid, for that letter, as I read it, sets the case on a somewhat different footing from that in which it would have been had the question been raised by one of the public insisting on the propriety of a pier in the alveus of a navigable river. It appears that so early as 1812 the defenders had in view the building of a bridge at this place, and they had for long been proprietors on the one side and had recently acquired a right of property on the other. They communicated with the factor of Sir James Colquhoun on the subject; and in the factor's letter to them the late Sir James Colquhoun is, I think, given to the erection of a bridge at this place, provided his fishing and other patrimonial rights were not injuriously affected. Now, we have it in evidence that in the course of this river, between Loch Lomond and Loch Lomond, there are five bridges, some of them in the tidal part of the river; so that the mere fact of piers being put upon the banks, or in the alveus, cannot be of itself an obstruction to the navigation. There is, as to a stone bridge at Dumbarton, with several piers in the river; and as regards the others, it is in evidence that the piers are brought down to the edge of the stream, and are even on the alveus of the river—one of the piers, I understand, belonging to Sir James Colquhoun himself. After that, I do not very well see how a person so assenting to the erection of a bridge, the piers of which must to some extent rest on the shore or bank of the river, could seek to have the bridge removed, even if it had been erected over a tidal navigable river, whatever any other member of the public might be entitled to do, unless the person so assenting could instruct a case of interference with his own patrimonial rights, as alleged in the condescendence. In dealing with this case it has been argued on the part of the pursuers, that there is no distinct plea to that effect in the record, that there was no interference with the rights of the public. It is not unimportant, therefore, to keep in mind that every endeavour appears to have been made by the defenders to satisfy the public on the matter, and that long before they began to build the bridge. It appears from the proof that the other two largest proprietors on Loch Lomond, Mr Smollett and the Duke of Montrose, were communicated with,—that the Loch Lomond Steamboat Company, who were also deeply interested, were likewise communicated with,—and that after due consideration no objection was made by any of them to the proposal. The fact that the company had at first some difficulty as to the height of the bridge, and that it was at once removed by the defenders agreeing to raise the bridge to the height required by the steamboat company; and it also appears that when

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

No. 60. some of the boatmen objected to the way in which the towing-path at the bridge was to be formed that objection was also removed; and it was not until Jan. 26, 1877. the bridge had been almost completed, and a great part of the heavy expenses Colquhoun's Trustees v. Orr incurred, and any objection raised on the part of the public given up, that Ewing and Co. pursuers interfered to stop the erection of the bridge, and to endeavour to have it removed.

In these circumstances does the evidence shew that the pursuers' rights have been interfered with? Now, in the first place, it has not been shewn that any damage, direct or consequential, has been occasioned to the pursuers by the bridge; or that the patrimonial interests of any of the proprietors on the banks of Loch Lomond will be injuriously affected. Mr Wylie, who was for many years factor on the estate of Luss, and who only ceased to hold that office in May 1875, when this bridge was in course of formation, is quite distinct on that point. He says it will do no harm to the sale of wood on the banks of Loch Lomond. Mr Murray, factor to the Duke of Montrose, is still more distinct. The Duke is the largest proprietor on the banks of the loch, and the question was deliberately considered by Mr Murray, who consulted the Duke on the subject, and his evidence is that the bridge will not do any harm to property or to the sale of wood. Mr William Edmond, a large wood merchant who makes considerable purchases of wood on the banks of the loch, says he has not the slightest apprehension that the bridge will impede the navigation of the river, or make any difference in the price offered for wood on Loch Lomond. Mr Smollett and Mr Mackenzie, both proprietors on the banks of the loch, say the same thing; and I think that any evidence brought by the pursuers on that point is of very little weight as compared with the evidence of the witnesses for the defenders.

It is, however, alleged that the obstruction to the navigation will indirectly affect the pursuers' rights and the value of the Luss estate, so that the question to be determined just comes back to this: Is there any reason to think that the navigation will be obstructed? Now, in dealing with that question it is important to attend to the condition in which the river was, and to the state of the navigation before 1875, at the place where the bridge was to be erected. The main channel is proved to be from 25 to 30 feet to the west of the pier of the bridge. This is proved by Mr Neilson and various witnesses whose experience was examined for the defenders. Mr Copland, the engineer examined for the pursuers, concurs substantially as to this. He says it is not more than 20 to 25 feet west; some of the witnesses say from 26 to 27; and some say as far as 30 feet. This deep part of the channel is about 16 feet broad, and is proved by one of the witnesses examined for the pursuers. Now, the screw boats which navigate the river are—the largest of them—about 60 feet long, 15 feet wide, and do not draw much water. In that state of matters, and before the bridge was put up, there was a catch-water or intake a short distance below the bridge, which required to be carefully avoided in the course of the navigation. That is distinctly proved by one of the principal witnesses examined for the pursuers, Dugald Macfarlane: "Before the bridge was built many a time found a difficulty with the mouth of the intake at Dill Bridge. There was a risk of running the boat into the lade or upon the catch-water. It was a nasty place for a boat to go down, but still we did it in order to avoid the lade we had to keep the channel. (Q.) If you kept the channel did that keep you clear of the catch-water? (A.) When the water

we had no other place to go than the channel. (Q.) When was it that we had a risk of going upon the catch-water? (A.) When the water was too high. It was the current that took us in there. We kept ourselves clear by putting the boat out into the stream. If we go to the west side of the east piers of the bridge we keep clear of the intake and catch-water. If we steered straight on the piers we would certainly go on the catch-water." Now, that being the position of matters before the bridge was built, it is plain that if, in coming down the river, a scow got into the place where this pier is placed, it would go on into the intake. The witnesses for the defender, Mr Neilson of the steamboat company, George Macfarlane, and others who have taken boats up and down before and since the bridge was built, all concur upon this point. As to the condition of matters before the piers were put up, what has been alleged? The piers, we have it in evidence, come a few feet further into the river than the post which indicates the top of the catch-water wall; but this wall slopes down a few feet into the river, and substantially, I think, the piers are placed in about the line of the catch-water wall, taken as a whole. The state of matters the pier is put down, and it occupies a spot which all boats have avoided before the bridge was built. That is distinctly proved by Mr Neilson, who has been for a very long period connected with the steamboat company and who was consulted by the steamboat company as to whether they objected to the erection of the bridge; by George Macfarlane, John Macfarlane, and other witnesses of great experience examined on the part of the defenders, and who, it is of importance to observe, are the only parties who have gone down the river in charge of boats since the bridge was built. A witness for the pursuers, Walter M'Gregor, who gives evidence to the contrary. He was referred to as having objected strongly to the bridge, but he says: "I cleared the pier on the three or four occasions I have gone up and down since it was built, but I had plenty of water to come and go. If I had not had the water I would have run more risk. I worked past the pier with the helm. (Q.) You did not need to exert yourself very much? Not very much, but I had water to spare. When we have plenty of water we keep further off the pillars. (Q.) You have never had any difficulty in passing off them any time you have come down? (A.) No. (Q.) When you have plenty of water is the whole of the Leven rather dangerous? (A.) There are one or two witnesses for the pursuers who say that if they were to go against this pier with a barge they might get into trouble; but skilful men will take care to keep away from this place. They have avoided it. They have nothing to do but to follow the same course which they have hitherto followed, and avoid a spot which they have all their lives avoided by going down the stream. I ask, therefore, that the pursuers have failed to prove that the erection of the pier at this particular place obstructs the navigation or is calculated to be dangerous in any respect; and there does not appear to be any serious apprehension on the part of those who are interested in the matter that there will be any danger done to the patrimonial interests of proprietors on the banks of Loch Leven in respect of any difficulty in passing down the river, where there will be a water-way between the east and west piers of about 80 feet. On these facts I am unable to come to the conclusion that the navigation of this river is injuriously affected by the defenders' operations. It, on the contrary, appears to me upon the evidence that the navigation will be improved,

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

No. 60. because a pier has now been put down which is calculated to act as a kind of beacon, at a place where there was formerly great danger of boats getting in the intake, and from that danger the navigation is now protected. I have referred to the evidence of the engineers who were examined, because I do not think that they differ materially. Mr Stevenson and Mr Leslie are of opinion that boatmen might perhaps have to pole so as to get into mid-channel 50 feet sooner now than they would have had to do before the bridge was built. But they were not aware that before the bridge was built the boatmen began to begin to pole at the very place where they may have to begin now; and for this reason, that they were afraid of getting into the intake if they allowed the boats to go down to the place where the bridge now stands. Then there is a question as to the towing-path, which was not pressed in argument, and on which the Lord Ordinary appears to be with the defenders. My impression is that the towing-path has been improved by the bridge, for the preponderance of the evidence goes to shew that the horses have greater command over the boats on the river being narrowed at this point, and those who have gone up and down since the bridge was put up say that there is no difficulty in getting past on the towing-path.

So standing the facts, I do not think that the possibility of some future danger entitles the pursuers, on the authority of Bicket v. Morris, to say that the bridge must come down, because whatever an individual member of the pursuers might be entitled to maintain upon that point I do not think that a party who gave a qualified assent to a bridge in 1872, which necessarily involved the participation of, or interference to some extent with, the banks of a navigable river, and never objected till the bridge was put up, can raise any such question. The letter which has been referred to conveys this to my mind, that unless it is proved that there was a direct injurious interference with Sir James Colquhoun's rights of salmon-fishing, or with the navigation in which he was interested as proprietor on Loch Lomond side, he would not object to a bridge being put up. I think the pursuers have failed to prove any such injury, and that they are therefore not entitled to insist upon the application of the principle which was laid down in Bicket v. Morris with reference to proprietors immediately affected by the obstruction complained of. The pursuers, in respect of that letter, and the terms of their own record, have, I think, laid upon themselves the burden of shewing that there would be a direct obstruction to the navigation by the bridge, and that there would also be a direct interference with their patrimonial interest. This the pursuers have, in my opinion, failed to do, and I am therefore compelled to differ from the view which has been expressed by your Lordships. I think that the fifth plea in law for the defenders should be sustained, and that they should be absolved from the conclusions of the action.

LOED SHAND.—I concur generally in the opinions expressed by the majority of your Lordships. I think the finding of the Lord Ordinary, that this is a point of fact a public navigable river, is fully warranted by the evidence in the case. Though the navigation has been always attended with considerable difficulty it is proved that the Leven has been used from time immemorial for the conveyance of goods and merchandise in scows or gabbarts—a peculiar kind of flat bottomed boat used and suitable for the navigation between the Clyde and the banks of Loch Lomond. It rather appears from the old case Colquhoun v. The Magistrates of Dumbarton,¹ which was referred to in use of the discussion, that at the end of last century the river was of that character. That case no doubt had reference to a question of salmon-fishing, the pleadings in the case shew that the river was then treated by both parties as a river in use for public navigation. But, apart from this, I think the proof here shews that this river possesses all the qualities which necessary to make it a public water highway. You have two public rivers,—at one end the river Clyde, with all the public navigation upon it, the town of Dumbarton, and at the other end Loch Lomond, which in the evidence appears to have been from time immemorial navigated by public without objection on the part of any one. There is a large tract of many miles of country along the borders of Loch Lomond, and the boats to which I have referred have constantly resorted to all the different villages and uses on the banks. The river has not only been used by the tenants of particular owners on the banks of the loch and of the river, but there have constantly been persons who obtained their living by keeping boats on the river for use for the transport of goods, using the river not as a favour obtained from any owner, but as a public right, and employing horses which were kept by other owners who made their living by tracking the boats up the river and between various places on its banks.

¹ June 18, 1801, 4 Pat. App. 221.

I have therefore no difficulty in holding with your Lordships that this is in fact a public navigable river. It appears, no doubt, that in later years there has been considerably less use of the river than there was formerly, very much because of the existence of the railway which is now upon its banks; but I think this must be taken as an accidental circumstance, and be disregarded in question like the present. The railway has been there only for a time. It is produced, it may be, a temporary effect. Other causes may operate again to resume the navigation, and therefore I think that is not an element that can be taken into view in this question at all.

While, however, the river is public and navigable, it appears, on the other hand, that the bridge which has been put up by the defenders, and is now completed, is erected at a place at a considerable distance, about a mile and half, I think, above the point where the influence of the tide is known. It is true that the defenders are the proprietors on each side of the river, and thus a right of property in the banks, and this part of the river being free from the influence of the tide they have also a right of property in the river as far as it extends throughout its whole extent. The question that arises between the parties is in this position, therefore, that, on the one hand, the defenders are the proprietors of the river bed, but, on the other hand, the public have a right of navigation throughout the course of the river, including the portion of which this bridge is built. It so happens that this right is beyond question, because it has been established by use; but I should like to say that, so far as I am concerned, I am not satisfied that the public right of navigation of a river of this kind is necessarily dependent upon its past use. On the contrary, my opinion is, that if a river be navigable, and a natural highway between various places, even though it may be that it has not hitherto been used, the public would be entitled to vindicate a right to use it. But that question does not arise here, and is not involved in the decision of this case.

The next question that arises is, Whether there has been here an injury done to the public right of navigation by the erection of this bridge? The injury complained of is two-fold. One complaint is that a towing-path has been

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

advanced to a certain extent into the river bed, to the injury of the navigation the other is, that certain piers have been put down in the alveus, also in the way of the navigation.

In regard to the first of these matters I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Mure and the Lord Ordinary. A proprietor is fairly entitled, in dealing with a servitude right of this kind, to change to some extent the course of a towing-path, provided there is no substantial injury done to the right. He may do so in order to make his own property available. He may not, however, materially or seriously interfere with the public right. But in the present case I think the evidence shews, in the first place, that the change which has been made on the towing-path is one which gives the horses a more direct pull on the boats they are tracking than they formerly had; and again, that even if it were not so the portion of the river bed into which it is said the horses were to go, in order to get the benefit of a full pull upon the boat, is still open, and so I do not think that any injury exists from that cause.

With reference to the river channel certainly a more difficult question arises. The fact is that the east piers of the bridge have been put down in a part of the channel which is deep enough for navigation at many states of the river, and there can be no doubt that the piers would be an obstruction, and create a material and present injury to the navigation of the river, but for the catch-water to which reference has already been made, the existence of which, as I have said, makes the piers no additional obstruction. The piers are about 5 feet in diameter, and are solid blocks of masonry, distant from 36 to 41 feet from the river bank; and there is no doubt they are in a depth of water that would be sufficient for navigation. But then it is said that though they would be an obstruction to a great part of the water-way if there were no catch-water there, they are not in point of fact, because you must take the river as it has existed from time immemorial; and that is, I think, a reasonable contention on the part of the defenders. The catch-water is about 30 feet below the bridge, and extends for some distance in the river to within a few feet of the line in which these piers are; and there is a considerable amount of evidence to shew that many of the boatmen who were in the habit of navigating the river downwards (because these piers are in the way of the navigation downwards, the upward navigation being carried on the other side of the river) took care, in taking the sweep of the river at that part, to avoid the portion of the water upon which the piers now stand. It is worthy of observation that the witnesses speaking to a matter of this kind were dealing with a broad sheet of water, and it is not easy, when a stone pier has been put down in the position in which these piers are, for the men to say with any degree of accuracy that this particular point was a point they did or did not pass over, and I think their evidence must be received with that qualification. They say they did not pass over it, because if they had done so their boats would have drifted into the lade; but I am not satisfied that they can rely upon that evidence to the extent of a few feet either way. The result of the evidence on this subject, as it appears to me, is, that taking the piers as they are, and taking the catch-water as it exists, it has now become necessary that the boatmen shall use greater care,—that they must navigate their boats with greater anxiety than was the case before. I think Mr Leslie is right when he says (and he is one of the defenders' witnesses) that the boatmen will need, as a matter of precaution, to begin to pole their boats higher up, imposing, it may be, a slight burden upon them, but still a difficulty that did not exist before.

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

secondly, I think it a matter of some importance that if boats do not clear space of ground now, they are apt to go against a very dangerous obstacle. And now a solid block of masonry of the size I have mentioned. It appears that now at times when it is navigated sometimes runs at the rate of six miles an hour; and if the river carries down a boat against one of the piers, in consequence of the current, or of the boatman ceasing to pole, or not taking care, the boat will encounter a very dangerous obstacle at this place which was not there before. Taking these elements into account, I am not prepared to agree in the view that there is no present injury to the navigation. It has been suggested by some of the witnesses that the pier is a beacon to warn boatsmen to keep off the intake below. In one sense that is true; but it is one which, if struck by a loaded barge going down at the rate of six miles an hour, will produce much more serious consequences than if the barge had struck upon a wooden pole further down the river. Therefore, upon the whole, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that it has been proved that there is here a material obstruction to the navigation of the river. And that is my opinion on the question of fact, I do not think it in the present necessary, so far as I am concerned, to rest the decision of the case upon that view; because I agree with those of your Lordships who have expressed the opinion that it is not necessary that the pursuers shall make out that there is a present danger to the navigation—a present obstruction of the kind I referred to. There are certain distinctions between that kind of navigable river which is under tidal influence and that which is not under tidal influence. Your Lordship in the chair has pointed out the most material of these. In the first place, a tidal river is under the guardianship of the Crown; the soil of the river is in the Crown, and the public are entitled not merely to pass and repass in navigation, but, it may be, to execute operations upon the river to improve the navigation. It is different with a river that is not tidal; the question of obstruction of the navigation, I do not think there is any difference between the right of the public in the one case and in the other. That the proper party to vindicate the right of the public in a tidal river is the Crown, and the Crown only; but so far as regards an obstruction of a river which is navigable, and which the public are entitled to keep open, in my opinion is that the public right to have it removed is substantially the same, whether the obstruction be within or above the tidal part of the river. As to the nature of that right, I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the principle which was applied in the case of Bicket v. Morris, in which it was only given to what had been settled in three different cases that had previously occurred, really applies here. That case arose between conterminous owners, and it was settled that a heritor is not entitled, even on his own property, to erect any obstruction in alveo, if no present injury does not appear to have been thereby caused. The reason your Lordship has explained, that in dealing with an element like water it is impossible to predict what changes may occur from operations in alveo, or from the course of the river changing from time to time. In that class of cases, there is a different kind of interest from that with which we have here. The proprietors have there what may be regarded as a proper common right in the stream. Here the proprietor has the right of the river banks and bed, and the interest of the public is the right merely to have the stream

No. 60. kept in a navigable condition for their use. But still that is an interest in the water

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

and an interest in a subject of such a nature that if the subject be once interfered with the consequences cannot be predicted. Accordingly, I think that the public interest here is necessarily different from the interest of a conterminous proprietor, the same rule must be applied. The water must not be interfered with in either case, for you cannot tell what injury to the public in the one case or to the conterminous proprietor in the other may arise. Just so in the present case. Suppose this river had should, through the action of a winter torrent, entirely change its course, and that what is now the deep part of the river should become shallow, it would have been of the utmost importance to have had these piers away in order to leave the space useful for the purpose of navigation. Or suppose, as may quite well be conceived, that the catchway in time is removed either wholly or partially, it might then be of great importance to the navigation of the river that there should be no piers, and yet the piers would be there to block the public from the use they would otherwise have had. These are illustrations which occur to one's mind to show that the absence of present injury is not conclusive of a question of this kind. I say that while I observe that Bicket v. Morris decides only the special case of conterminous proprietors, in England its authority has been used as directed applying distinctly to navigable rivers. There were two cases—The Attorney-General v. Earl Lonsdale, May 1868, Law Reports, 7 Equity Cases, 32, in which Vice-Chancellor Malins gave a very full judgment, proceeding entirely upon the Scotch case; and The Attorney-General v. Terry, Law Reports, Chancery, 423, in which I find that the decision of the Master of the Rolls, again proceeding upon the case of Bicket v. Morris, was adhered to by the Court of Chancery, with the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices sitting. I read a passage from the opinion of the Master of the Rolls in that case, showing how completely the case of Bicket v. Morris was considered as applying to the case of the public right of navigation—"I am of opinion that this is a material obstruction to the navigation, and would be indictable at law as a nuisance. It was necessary to rest my decision on that I should have no difficulty in doing so; but I do not think it is necessary, for there is another ground also, a ground of very great importance, upon which I say that the informant is entitled to a decree, and that is this, that no man has a right to put an obstruction in the bed of a navigable river. As I understand the law, it is not an answer to say that at this moment the obstruction is not a nuisance; it may become so. And accordingly some piles that had been put into the river with a view to the building of a wooden pier, though they extended only three feet into a breadth of sixty feet of navigable water, were ordered to be removed. It is true that was within tidal influence, but for the reason I have explained I do not think there is any difference upon this question of obstruction, as to the rights of the public, whether the obstruction be in a part of the river under tidal influence or not."

I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. I may say in reference to one point referred to in the opinion of Lord M'Alister that it appears to me too critical a view of this action to regard it as an action calculated to try only the question whether there is an obstruction in the river which presently impedes or interferes with the navigation. The conclusions of the action are to the effect that the river is a public and navigable river, and the pursuers ask a decree of declarator that the defenders have no right to put up any erections, not "which do obstruct or interfere with the navigation."

which will in any way obstruct or interfere with the navigation," and I cannot read those words, giving them their fair interpretation, as being limited to a case of actual present obstruction. Even if they were to be so read I am of opinion that the proof is sufficient to shew there is actual obstruction, but I think it not to say that I do not read those conclusions in that narrow sense.

In regard to the letter of 14th May 1872, by Sir James Colquhoun's factor, of the alleged acquiescence, I agree with your Lordship in the chair in thinking that the defenders' plea must be repelled. What is it that Sir James Colquhoun said to? He says that he will make no objection "provided his fishing and other rights are not interfered with." The fishing right is out of the case. What are the other rights there referred to? The only other rights that could have been in the mind of the writer of that letter are the rights of navigation. There is no other right suggested to which the expression "other rights" would refer. That right of navigation was not any patrimonial right of Sir James Colquhoun, but a right which he in common with all other members of the public had. It may be, and it is the case, that Sir James having large quantities of wood upon his estate, might require to use this river much more than other members of the public. It was not because of any private right he had, but because this is a public navigable river which he as a member of the public required or might require to resort to frequently that he had rights which he was entitled to have preserved. He says he will be satisfied if those rights are not interfered with. But the bridge is now up, and his trustees allege that his rights are interfered with, and I think this is proved. The proof shews that there is a present material obstruction; but whether that is so or not, if the bridge may at a future time come to be a block in the way of navigation, its existence is inconsistent with the pursuer's present right, for that right is to prevent any obstruction which now impedes, or which may impede, the navigation of the river. I therefore think that the letter founded on does not maintain the present action. I think the right of navigation was reserved to the fullest extent; and if it be shewn to have been injured either by an obstruction which now causes injury, or which causes apprehension of injury, the pursuers are not barred by anything in that letter from maintaining their action to have that obstruction removed.

THE COURT adhered.

TAWSE & BONAR, W.S.—JOHN CARMENT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 60.

Jan. 26, 1877.
Colquhoun's
Trustees v. Orr
Ewing and Co.

E. A. LUCAS AND OTHERS (Beresford's Trustees), Pursuers.—
Lord-Adv. Watson—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
JAMES GARDNER, Defender.—Kinnear—Asher.

No. 61.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

Issue—Fraud—Essential Error.—In an action of reduction of a lease brought by the landlord against the tenant the pursuer averred that the lease had been obtained by the fraudulent representations of the defender's son, who was not for the pursuer, in pursuance of a fraudulent conspiracy between the defender and his son, and that it was signed by the pursuer under essential error, induced by the said representations. The Court held (1) that the pursuer was not entitled to a separate issue of essential error; and (2) that to the issue "Whether the pursuer was induced to execute the lease by fraudulent representation made by the defender" (being the issue adjusted by the Lord Ordinary), he was not to have added the words "or by his son on his behalf."

No. 61.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

1st Division.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
B.

THIS was an action by the trustees of Sir George Beresford, for retention of a lease signed by them of the Ballachulish slate quarries favour of the defender, James Gardner.

The pursuers averred as follows :—In May 1873 the defender, Lady Beresford, one of their number, to give him a lease of the quarry on the expiry of the current lease held by Alexander Pitcairn at Walsbury Sunday 1874, and she agreed to a lease for fifteen years, upon the distinct stipulation that it was to be in the same terms as that held by Pitcairn. (Cond. 13) "In November 1873 George Gardner, agent and solicitor for the pursuers, a son of the defender, produced and requested the pursuers to sign a document, which he represented to be a lease of the quarry in favour of the defender, such as Lady Beresford had agreed to grant above mentioned; and he distinctly stated to the pursuers that it was the same terms as the lease held by Mr Pitcairn, except that it was for thirty years instead of fifteen years. Upon their stating that they would not grant a lease for a longer term than fifteen years he wrote and handed them a letter which he assured them would have the effect of limiting the duration of his father's tenancy to that period. Upon the representations and assurances thus made the said pursuers were induced to sign and did sign the said lease." (Cond. 20) "The execution of the said lease was obtained from the pursuers by the fraud of the defender and of the said George Gardner. The said pursuers were induced to sign and grant the said lease solely by the false and fraudulent representations of the said George Gardner, made by him to the pursuers who were his agents. The said lease was prepared in the terms in which it stands, and the said representations were made by the said George Gardner in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme and conspiracy formed and between him and the defender to obtain by such representations a lease in the said terms. When the said George Gardner made the said representations he well knew that they were false, and the defender, he obtained the said lease and entered into possession under it, well knowing that it had been obtained by such representations, and signed by the pursuers in the belief that it was in the same terms as Mr Pitcairn's lease. The said lease was signed and granted by the pursuers under the essential error that it was in the same terms as Mr Pitcairn's lease. The essential error was induced by the foresaid statements and representations made by George Gardner as to the tenor, and effect of the said lease."

They pleaded ;—(1) The lease libelled having been obtained by the pursuers as condescended on, it ought to be reduced, and decree of removing pronounced against the defender. (2) Separatim, the pursuers are entitled to have the said lease reduced, in respect it was granted by them under an essential error, induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the defender condescended on.

The pursuers proposed the following issues :—" (1) Whether the pursuers, or any of them, in executing the lease dated, &c. were induced by an essential error as to the substance and effect of the said lease, induced by the defender, or by George Gardner, writer in Glasgow, on his behalf. (2) Whether the said pursuers, or any of them, were induced to execute the said lease by fraudulent representation made by the defender, or by the said George Gardner on his behalf?"

The Lord Ordinary disallowed the first issue, and adjusted the second as follows :—" Whether the said pursuers, or any of them, were induced to execute the said lease by fraudulent representation made by the defender?"

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued that there was a case of essential error.

distinct from fraud, but that at all events, the words "or by George No. 61.
 on his behalf" ought to be added in the other issue.

Jan. 27, 1877.
 Beresford's
 Trustees v.
 Gardner.

THE PRESIDENT.—I think there is no doubt that there is only one case presented on record, namely, a case of fraudulent representation.

On the issue of fraud, as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, does not, I think, properly represent the pursuers' case. It is clear that the representations are to have been made by George Gardner and not by the defender, and yet the Lord Ordinary puts it that they are made by the defender. If that means George Gardner's representations must be taken to be those of the defender, I differ. If the defender put forward George, that may make his statement equivalent to those of the defender, though in the construction of such statement even that would be a doubtful question, for I remember a not dissimilar case in which Lord Justice-Clerk Hope ruled that the fraud of the agent did not render the principal liable, and his charge was sustained by the Second Division.¹
 The matter should not be left in doubt, and I think it is sufficient if the representation is here made on behalf of the defender, not on his employment. Therefore I think we should give the issue proposed by

THE DEAS.—There is no case made in the record of essential error, except as to fraud.

As to the phraseology of the issue, it is true that in modern practice, in adjustments for the reduction of settlements, and in various other cases, what is done has been done by the defender includes what is done by everybody else on behalf, and I should be sorry to say anything to disturb that practice.
 The parties stood to each other in a very peculiar relation. The person who was agent for the pursuers is alleged to have acted in the interests of the defender, who was his father. I therefore think that the ordinary practice should have better not been followed in this case, especially as neither party can be at the least disadvantaged from the proposed deviation.

THE JUDGE concurred.

THE LORD SHAND.—I distinguish this case from those in which a separate issue of error has been given, in this respect,—George Gardner only is said to make the representations which induced the pursuers to execute the lease.
 The representations could not have been made in error. If made at all they have been made fraudulently, for it is distinctly averred that George was acquainted with the terms of Pitcairn's lease, and that he procured the pursuers' signature to the lease in question on the false and fraudulent statement that its terms were the same as those of Pitcairn's lease.

There are two possible cases covered by the averments on record. Either the father and son were both guilty of the fraud, or the father may have been innocent of the fraud which it is said the son committed on his behalf, and to obtain pecuniary benefit. The objection to the issue as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary is that the pursuers would only get the benefit of the first of these

I am of opinion that even though the father, the defender, was ignorant of the fraud, the pursuers are entitled to succeed if it be proved that his son committed the deed as alleged; for I think the defender was not entitled to get

¹ Pardon v. Rowat's Trustees, Dec. 1856, 19 D. 206, 29 Scot. Jur. 99.

No. 61.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Beresford's
Trustees v.
Gardner.

or to retain a benefit so procured in his interest, a benefit for which it is alleged that he had stipulated in his agreement with the pursuers, and the pursuers undertake to shew was procured through fraud.

I think, therefore, the words "or by his son, George Gardner, writer in Glasgow, on his behalf," ought to be added to the issue as adjusted by the Ordinary in order to provide for this latter case.

LORD DEAS.—I wish to reserve my opinion on the last point mentioned by Lord Shand, whether, if there was fraud by George Gardner, and his father ignorant of the fraud, the pursuers may nevertheless be entitled to succeed.

THE COURT appointed the following to be the issue in the case:

"Whether the pursuers, or any of them, were induced to execute the lease dated, &c. by fraudulent representations made by the defender, or by his son, George Gardner, writer in Glasgow, on his behalf?"

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ADAMSON & GULLAND, W.S.—Agents.

No. 62.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Alexander v.
Stuart.

JOHN ALEXANDER, Complainer.—Brand.

JOHN STUART, Respondent.—M'Kechnie.

Bill of Exchange—Value—Proof—Mode of Proof.—In a suspension charge at the instance of the drawer of a bill the Court allowed a proof in answer prout de jure, in respect that the charger admitted that the bill was obtained by him in circumstances out of the ordinary course of business.

Bill-Chamber.
2D DIVISION.
R.

JOHN ALEXANDER having been charged on 28th November 1876 at the instance of John Stuart to make payment of a bill for £35, with interest under deduction of £18, 6s. 6d. said to have been paid to account, presented a note in the Bill-Chamber to have the charge suspended.

He averred that he, along with a friend named Roger had, on 14th June 1876, accepted a bill for £35, drawn by Stuart on them, solely on understanding and agreement that the contents of the bill, after it had been discounted, were to be handed to Roger for his own use, under deduction of a sum of £5 owing by Roger to Stuart, and on the understanding with Stuart that he was not to be liable in relief except to the extent of one-half of any sum which Roger might fail to pay. He also averred that he received no value for the bill, and that Stuart discounted the bill but retained the money so obtained for his own uses and purposes, and did not hand any to Roger. He denied that any payment of £18, 6s. 6d. was ever made in respect of the bill as stated in the restricted charge.

Stuart in answer stated that prior to the transaction in connection with this £35 bill he held a bill accepted by Roger for £14, 5s. which had fallen due and had not been retired by Roger. (Stat. 3) "The respondent frequently pressed Mr Roger for payment of the said bill, but was always unsuccessful, being put off by promises which were never implemented. The respondent ultimately threatened Mr Roger with personal diligence upon the said bill, and the result was that, at a market held at Keir on 14th June 1876, Mr Roger met the respondent, and on condition that he should not do diligence against him in the meantime on the said bill, offered him a bill at four months by the complainer in favour of a friend named acceptor. The bill had £35 in the corner, and was signed by the complainer. The respondent, it was proposed by Mr Roger, and ultimately agreed to, was to retain the bill for £14, 5s. This offer was considered by the respondent, and the result was that he agreed to accept the £35 bill, with the complainer as acceptor, only on the condition that Mr Roger should also be an acceptor, (2) that he should retain the £14, 5s. bill until the £35 bill was paid, (3) that he should discount the bill and have the use of the money in the meantime, and (4) that the £14, 5s. bill, with interest, being paid, he should hand over the £35 bill. In point of fact the £35 bill was a collateral security for the £14, 5s. bill, and was granted by the complainer and received by the respondent only on that footing. The complainer was present, and agreed to these conditions. The £35 bill was granted for that sum by Mr Roger, and the complainer, who was really Mr Roger's cautioner, to induce respondent to postpone diligence against Mr Roger, and in consequence of being granted he did postpone such diligence." He explained that deduction of £18, 6s. 6d. made in the charge was the difference between the £14, 5s. bill and interest thereon, and the £35 bill, which hence, he said, he had paid to the bankers who discounted the bill, that neither Roger nor the complainer had made any payments towards it.

No. 62.
Jan. 27, 1877.
Alexander v.
Stuart.

The complainer denied all knowledge of this £14, 5s. bill at the time he accepted the bill for £35.

Respondent pleaded;—(3) In any view the suspender's statements, so far as disputed, can only be proved scripto vel juramento by respondent.

On 14th January 1877 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Adam) refused to do so, with expenses.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued, that the circumstances under which the bill was granted, as they appeared from the respondent's own statement, were such as to entitle him to a proof prout de jure of his rights as to value, &c.¹

And for the respondent;—The complainer's averments could only be proved by writ or oath of the respondent. An admission that a bill had been granted for more than the value received did not deprive the holder of the privilege of having proof limited to writ or oath.²

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—The statements and admissions of the respondent here make this a case for inquiry, and place it outside the rule of law that proof of this nature is to be limited to writ or oath. He has stated that his debt was only £16, 13s. 6d., but he has failed entirely to explain how he came to accept a bill for £35 in payment of a debt so much smaller.

As regards the two cases quoted to us in support of the respondent's contention, I think they were quite rightly decided, but the facts here are much different.

I think that we should remit to the Lord Ordinary to pass the bill, and allow a proof prout de jure before answer.

MR ORMDALE.—I concur. It may, in ordinary circumstances, be a salutary rule of law that no party who appears ex facie debtor in the contents of a bill should be entitled to resist payment of his written obligation on evidence other than the writ or oath of the creditor, but care must be taken that the rule is not turned into an engine of oppression.

Coming to the conclusion that there should be investigation in the present case, I am influenced by the charger's own statements. It is clear from what he has obtained the bill charged on in circumstances entirely foreign

¹ Anderson v. Lorimer, Nov. 21, 1857, 20 D. 74, 30 Scot. Jur. 50.

² Black v. Newlands, Nov. 11, 1863, 2 Macph. 71, 36 Scot. Jur. 38; Mercer

Black v. Livingstone, Dec. 21, 1864, 3 Macph. 300, 37 Scot. Jur. 144.

No. 62.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Alexander v.
Stuart.

to those of an ordinary bill transaction. The suspender exhibited his name on a blank piece of stamped paper, and the charger filled it up for £35, attaching the bill for which he says it was intended to come in the place of a bill of acceptance for only £14, 5s. But although in this way he obtained the bill for £35, the charger also retained the old bill, and discounted the new bill at his bankers. Now, it is clear that if the charger had not taken up, saying he had been unable to take up, the £35 bill, so discounted by him, the suspender could have compelled the suspender to pay every farthing of it, although, on the shewing and admission of the charger, he was in reality debtor in it only to the extent of little more than £14.

On the ground, therefore, that on the charger's own shewing it is clear that the bill charged on was not granted in the ordinary course of business, or of bill transactions, I am of opinion there should be an inquiry before further answer, and that for this purpose the case should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary to try the bill of suspension.

LORD GIFFORD.—I do not differ, as this bill seems to have been obtained in the ordinary course, and when there are circumstances so peculiar as those which are found in the present case, I do not think that the holder of the bill can complain if the facts are allowed to appear in a proof before answer.

But I do not wish to trench on the now recognised rule that it will not weaken the privileges of a bill that the holder admits that only partial value was given for it. The balance will still be held as a proved debt against the drawer and as to this balance the onus will not be changed, and the rights of the drawer or holder will not be impaired, any farther than his own admission.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor and explain of, and remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to pass a note and allow a proof before answer prout de jure of the facts and circumstances set forth by the parties, and decern."

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 63.

Jan. 27, 1877.*
Wallace v.
Fraserburgh
Harbour Commissioners.

1st Division.
Lord Shand.
B.

GEORGE WALLACE AND OTHERS Pursuers.—Trayner—Hunter.
THE FRASERBURGH HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS, Defenders.—Ash—
J. P. B. Robertson.

Harbour—Dues—Wreckage.—The Fraserburgh Harbour Commissioners were empowered by a private Act to levy dues on goods, merchandise, or commodities imported into the harbour, in any ship or vessel out of any ship, coming into the harbour, or landed within the precincts of the regality of Fraserburgh, besides tonnage dues on vessels coming into the harbour. Jurisdiction to determine any dispute regarding the amount of the duties was conferred on the chief magistrate.

A vessel was wrecked in the harbour, and the wreckage partly drawn ashore and was partly brought ashore within the precincts of the harbour. With the exception of a few empty barrels and a small quantity of cargo the wreckage consisted of the materials of the vessel. The harbour commissioners charged dues upon the whole. Held (1) that the chief magistrate had no jurisdiction to determine whether dues were leviable; (2) that the commissioners had no right to exact dues on wreckage.

PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES HOULDSWORTH, Pursuer.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

WILLIAM BAIN AND OTHERS (Alexander Brand's Trustees), Defenders.—

Asher—Moncreiff.

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

Minerals—Special obligation to remove on notice—Reasonable time to effect removal.—The tenants of a colliery were bound to cede possession on receiving intimation from their landlord that he was dissatisfied with the working, and on being paid for their plant at a valuation. The landlord gave intimation on 3d February 1874, but the tenants, holding an erroneous notion of the meaning of their contract, retained possession till 11th November when they were ordained by the Court to remove. It was afterwards held that they were liable to the landlord in damages as for breach of contract for wrongful retention of possession. Held that the tenants were entitled to a reasonable time for making the necessary arrangements for ceding possession, for the closing of their colliery engagements, disposal of surplus stocks of coal, dismissal of employees, and valuation of plant; and in the circumstances, from 3d February to 15th May 1874, was a reasonable time.

Breach of Contract of Lease—Minerals—Measure of Damages.—Estimating the damages in the above circumstances, held (1) that the pursuer should be placed as nearly as possible in the same position as regards the lease would have been had there been no breach of contract; and that with the question as a jury question, on the one hand, the profits lost or might fairly be held to have resulted from the tenant's operations during the period of wrongful possession, and on the other, the loss of the lease, which it might be inferred the landlord would have received if the lease which he might have granted, were to be taken as elements of consideration; (2) that in estimating the tenant's profits allowance was to be made for tear and wear, and interest on cost, estimated generally, not for depreciation in the market value of, their machinery.

Previous report, January 8, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 304.

2D DIVISION.
I.

A part of the agreement between the late Mr Houldsworth of Coltness (the pursuer's father), as proprietor, and the late Robert Brand, as tenant of the Greenhead Colliery on the estate of Coltness, that "in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease, the landlord is hereby empowered, if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery and other subjects of the lease, at a time as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand."

Robert Brand died on 26th January 1873, and was succeeded in the lease of the colliery by his son, Robert Brand junior, who, dying also in 1873, was succeeded by his uncle Alexander Brand.

Alexander Brand died in November 1873 and left the lease of the colliery to William Bain and others, his trustees.

James Houldsworth (the pursuer), having become dissatisfied with the management of the colliery, on 3d February 1874 intimated to the trustees that he had resolved to resume possession thereof in accordance with the power to that effect contained in the minute of agreement between his father and Mr Brand. He also intimated that he had placed the lease in the hands of the arbiters mentioned therein for the purpose of having the plant valued and taken over by him as provided for.

The trustees disputed the landlord's right to resume possession of the colliery as proposed by him, and a litigation ensued, which ended in Mr Houldsworth obtaining decree of declarator and removing against the trustees on May 17, 1875, vide ante, vol. ii. p. 683).

After Mr Houldsworth raised the present action, in which he con-

No. 64. cluded against Brand's trustees for violent profits, and, separatim, damages, for their wrongful retention of possession.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

The Court, on 8th January 1876, found "that the defenders had wrongfully retained possession of the colliery in question after the period at which they were bound to remove, are liable to the pursuer in reparation for such injury as has been thereby occasioned to him; and, to further answer, allow a proof to both parties in regard to the amount of damages thereby incurred: Find the defenders liable in expenses to the date of the interlocutor reclaimed against, reserving in the meantime all other questions of expenses."

Instead of proceeding with the proof allowed by this interlocutor the parties agreed upon a joint minute of admissions and relative states, renouncing farther probation.

These relative states were so constructed as to shew in a tabular form the output, profit, expenses, &c., connected with the colliery at various dates between 3d February 1874 and 11th November 1875. As the Court by their final judgment fixed 15th May 1874 as the date at which the defenders ought to have ceded possession, the result of the states in reference only to that date are given in the following narrative. The defenders did actually cede possession on 11th November 1875.

From the minute and relative states it appeared (1) that the income of the colliery from 15th May 1874 to 11th November 1875 was £17,892, 5s. 9d., and the expenses of working, including materials, fuel, and lordship, £14,981, 18s., leaving nett profit £2910, 7s. 8d.; there were, however, other expenses connected with the carrying on of the defenders' business, which amounted during the same period to £1500 3d., exclusive of wear and tear of machinery and interest on capital employed; (2) that the value of the plant, engine, and machinery of the colliery, as at 15th May 1874, was £4450, and their value at 11th November 1875, when the same were taken over by Mr Houldsworth and paid for by him under the agreement with the late Robert Brand senior £2671, 0s. 8d., conform to valuations made at or about the respective periods by Messrs M'Creath and Frew, mining-engineers, Glasgow; and that the difference in the value of the plant, between these dates, except in so far as attributable to ordinary wear and tear, was caused by the fall in the market; (3) that the pursuer, Mr Houldsworth, let the Greenhead Colliery to Mrs Jessie Brand, widow of the late Robert Brand senior, conform to the offers dated 31st January 1874,* and acceptance dated 3d February 1874.

* "Edinburgh, 31st January 1874.—Donald Beith, Esq., W.S., Clerk of Court.—Dear Sir,—Referring to my interviews with Mr Houldsworth and me as to Greenhead Colliery, I hereby offer on behalf of my sister, Mrs Brand, a lease of this colliery as follows, viz :—

"1st. A lordship of 2s. 6d. per ton of 22½ cwt. (being 1s. 3d. per ton than that fixed in the current lease) on round ell coal.

"2d. A lordship equal to that fixed in the current lease, and 1d. on the dross.

"3d. To accede to the other conditions in the current lease with the modifications and additions stated by Mr Houldsworth.

"4th. To assume all risk and any expense that may be occasioned in running the lease.

"5th. To take all risk of the valuation which falls to be made under the minute of agreement by which Mr Houldsworth has power to resume possession of the lease.

"The proceedings for the resumption to be at Mr Houldsworth's risk and in his name, but at Mrs Brand's risk and expense.—I am, yours very truly,

"J. M. ROBERTSON."

74,* and that she entered into possession thereof on the defenders No. 64.
 ding possession at 11th November 1875, and still possessed the col-ry under this lease; (5) that the lordship payable under this lease Jan. 27, 1877.
 Mrs Brand would have exceeded the lordships payable under the Houldsworth se under which the defenders claimed right to possess the colliery for v. Brand's e period from 15th May 1874 till 11th November 1875 by the sum of Trustees.
 448, 3s. 4d.

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The pursuer was entitled to damages from e date at which his intimation to the defenders to remove was given, 3d February 1874. They might be entitled to a reasonable period effect their removal. But from that date they were accountable to for the profits made. (2) The next question was, on what principle e damage to be estimated? The argument was to be taken on the ting that the defenders had committed a breach of contract in not ting possession at 3d February 1874. By doing so they had wrongly made a profit to themselves and had wrongfully prevented the pursuer from making a profit. The proper estimate of damages therefore was e amount of profit made by the defenders during their wrongful possession. It was maintained on the other side that the pursuer would have let the colliery but for the defenders' wrongful action, and that therefore e was only entitled to such additional lordship as he would have gained from a new tenant, and that the defenders were entitled to retain out's profit. But the consideration of the pursuer's intention was irrelevant. He might intend to relet, and might even have arranged to do so, but with that the defenders had no concern. They were bound to give over to the pursuer the whole profits made, otherwise they would be making a profit by their own breach of contract. Under the law of England it formerly stood a trespasser in such circumstances had to pay the whole value without deduction even of cost of working. The Court in Chancery had recently modified this strict rule in the case of United Edinburgh Collieries Company.¹ In that case the whole prior authorities were reviewed, and the decision fixed (1) that the owner, where the trespasser was innocent, was entitled to the value of the coal at the pit mouth, less the expense of severing and raising it; (2) that no allowance was to be made for the cost of sinking workings, erecting machinery, profit on the coal engaged, trade allowances, &c. In such cases the Court would refuse to go into the question of the capital expenditure of the tenant.
 It, therefore, the pursuer was entitled to was the gross value of the coal, less lordship, wages, and value of materials only, but not interest on capital, wear and tear of machinery, and other expenses incidental to carrying on of the defenders' business.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) A reasonable time must be allowed the defenders to remove before damages could begin to run. (2) Even in such cases there was a difference between innocent trespass and breach of contract. Where there was trespass of any kind there was still a lingering of the older and stricter law. In cases of mere breach of contract a different view was taken. There was no reason why the measure of damages should be different in this particular breach of contract from what it was generally understood to be in ordinary cases of breach of contract.

¹ Edinburgh, 3d February 1874.—Dear Sir,—I duly received your letter of the 1st ult., and, as authorised by Mr Houldsworth, I hereby accept the offer therein contained, and shall forthwith proceed to have the arrangement formally completed. A copy of your letter is subjoined.—Yours truly, DONALD BEITH.
 J. M. Robertson, Esq., Writer, Glasgow.
 November 14, 1872, L. R. 15 Eq. 46.

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

Admitting that the owner was to be put in the same position as if he himself severed and raised the coal, and even that he was to have the benefit of the pit already sunk with the tenant's capital, still he must have paid for machinery. Had he been working on his own account he must have deducted tear and wear, and loss of interest on money sunk in machinery before he could have estimated his profits. The defenders, in estimating the amount they were to pay the pursuer were entitled to a similar deduction. But farther, by delaying to cede possession from 15th May 1874 to 11th November 1875 the defenders had suffered and the pursuer had avoided a serious loss. Had the pursuer taken over the machinery at 15th May 1874 he would have paid £4450 for it. As at 11th November 1875 he, or Mrs Brand for him, only paid £2671 owing to a fall in the market value between these two periods, the difference being £1779. Now, the pursuer could not have made the profit which he claimed without the plant, and he was not entitled to the high price which was made without allowing for the corresponding high price at which the machinery stood at 15th May 1874, or in other words for the loss which the defenders made on their machinery between May 15th and November 1875. He could not take the profit as from May 15th and postpone the valuation of the machinery till November 1875. The defenders were therefore entitled, besides an allowance for ordinary tear and wear and interest, to deduct the depreciation of their machinery between 15th May 1874 and 11th November 1875 from the profit. (3) If this view were not accepted then the defenders were entitled to ascertain if possible what was the true loss suffered by the pursuer in the circumstances. Now, in the present case there existed elements for determining exactly the true damage done to the pursuer. He had actually entered into a new agreement of lease, and therefore his loss was not the difference between the lordship he would have received under the old lease and the lordship he actually did receive. Either, then, the true profit of the defenders or the true loss of the pursuer must be taken as the measure of damages.

At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—The principle upon which the damages in this case are to be estimated or assessed has been, to some extent, already determined. It has been by our interlocutor of 8th January 1876 been determined that the defenders were not liable in the penal consequences denoted by the technical expression "loss of profits," but merely in the damages which it can be shewn the pursuer lost by being detained through their breach of contract, as fully explained in the opinions of the Judges as reported in the 3d volume of the fourth series of Court of Session Cases, 304.

Before, however, entering into the inquiry as to the amount of damages to be necessary to fix the date of their commencement, or in other words, the date at which the defenders' wrongful retention of the colliery is to be held to have commenced,—a point which was left undetermined by the Court when the case was formerly before them, in the expectation that the parties would by this time otherwise have furnished some more certain data than then existed for the Court to make a satisfactory judgment regarding it. The Court must now, however, decide the matter as they best can on the materials before them, just as a jury would do—and the whole matter is of the nature of a jury question.

Two matters of fact are clear, 1st, that the pursuer, in terms of the agreement of 5th October 1869, under and in reference to which the whole dispute has arisen, gave the necessary notice to the defenders that their lease of the

to terminate as on the 3d of February 1874; and secondly, that by the agreement the pursuer was then entitled to get possession of the colliery plant and others connected with the same, including waggons, belonging and leased by the second party, as soon as the value of the latter can be ascertained, and the amount paid to the second party or his representatives—that is, the present defenders. What, then, is to be held as a reasonable time to be allowed the defenders for ceding possession of the colliery plant valued after the pursuer's notice that the lease was to terminate on 3d February was given? They were certainly not entitled to any time which might be pleased to take or might find most advantageous for themselves, in continuing to work out the pursuer's coal; nor, on the other hand, do I think they could at once and immediately on 3d February, when they received the pursuer's notice, be held bound to desist from all further operations to, it may be, their great loss and damage. They were, I think, entitled to a reasonable time in which the necessary and unavoidable preparations for ceding possession of the plant could be made and completed. By their agreement with the pursuer they were to have their plant valued and paid for before ceding possession; but this was a very important matter which required care, attention, and was not satisfactorily accomplished. Neither could the defenders be expected, without some time and opportunity being afforded them for making the necessary arrangements in connection with the discharge of their engagements and closing their colliery engagements, to give up possession. What time and opportunity was really requisite for all this it is difficult for the court to say in the state in which the matter has been left by the parties. I think, however, that to allow the defenders to the term of Whitsunday, the 5th of May 1874, which is little more than three months after 3d February; is unreasonable or such as either party can justly complain of. I am therefore, to hold that the calculation or estimate of the damages ought to be made and to proceed as from the 15th of May 1874 till the 11th of November 1875 when possession was ceded by the defenders, and I have acted accordingly in ascertaining the amount of damages in which the defenders are liable to the pursuer.

The next question is whether the criterion of the damages to which the pursuer is entitled is the lordship which he would have received from Mrs Brand had she proposed lease to her, assuming it had been entered into, as on 15th May 1874, or the profits which have been shewn, or may be reasonably held to have resulted from the defenders' operations from that date till 11th November 1875 when possession of the colliery was ceded by them. I have come to think that the more reliable criterion in the circumstances is the latter, and have accordingly been chiefly guided by it. It is difficult indeed to hold that any lease proposed by Mrs Brand was actually completed. That one might have been completed, and possession of the colliery had been got at Whitsunday 1874 is highly probable, but as matters then stood the lease appears to me to have been left incomplete, and possibly Mrs Brand might have resiled, and been entitled to recover the lease money ever completing it. It is by keeping this in view that I have held that the proper course is to hold that it is chiefly for the damages which have resulted, or may be fairly held to have resulted, from the colliery operations from the 15th of May 1874 to the 11th of November 1875, when they ceded possession, that they must now account to

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

No. 64. Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

the pursuer. At the same time I am not to be understood to have thrown tirely out of view as an element for consideration the gain which, in all circumstances, and having regard to the established facts, it may be inferred pursuer has been deprived of, under a lease of the colliery to Mrs Brand or other party, or from working it himself, if possession had been given up by defenders on 15th May 1874 in place of being wrongfully retained by the a year and a half after that date:

But taking it to be so, there are still some points of nicety and import which must be attended to, and which I have not overlooked, in regard to deductions or allowances to which the defenders are entitled in ascertaining profit or balance for which they are accountable to the pursuer. Although are not to be held liable in "violent profits" or other penal consequences they had by violence or positive fraud held retention of the colliery beyond date when they ought to have ceded possession, they are bound to make to the pursuer the damage or injury he has sustained by the wrongful retention from him of possession of the colliery; or, to put it differently, the pursuer is entitled to be placed in the same position, as nearly as possible as to profits, as he would have been in had there been no breach of contract by the defenders.

Now, the parties have by their minute of admissions shewn the amount output of the coal from 15th May 1874 till 11th November 1875, and the expenditure in producing that output. But whether more coal might have been put out at less expenditure is a different question, and, in point of fact, whether the defenders are, besides the expenditure referred to, entitled to deductions or allowances claimed, 1st, for certain law expenses, 2d, for depreciation and tear of machinery and plant, and 3d, for interest on capital invested, is another question about which the parties are not agreed.

In regard to the first of these claims I have been unable to see any sufficient reason for giving effect to it as in a question with the pursuer.

On the other hand, an allowance or deduction for tear and wear of machinery I think, be resisted by the pursuer, for it is clear, for anything that has been said or shewn to the contrary, that if there had been no wrongful retention of the colliery, and had the pursuer obtained possession of it on 15th May 1874, his machinery and plant must, if made available at all, have been subjected to tear and wear to some extent. And so as regards an allowance or deduction in respect of interest on capital invested. The only question in connection with these claims that can fairly be said to raise any difficulty is the question of the machinery or plant, and the amount of capital on which the deduction for wear and tear and interest are to be calculated. Is the estimated value of the machinery and plant as at 15th May 1874 or 11th November 1875, or some other and what date or dates, to be taken as the amount on which the percentage for tear and wear and interest of capital is to be calculated? Is the percentage claimed by the defenders for the whole period of their wrongful retention of the colliery to be assumed as correct? The parties have no mind in their minute of admissions given any precise or perfectly satisfactory data for an answer to these questions. They have merely specified the value of the plant and the value of capital as at certain dates on the assumption that the value of the plant and the value of capital and the percentage are to be taken as throughout the same. I have liked if the parties had agreed upon a scale shewing how and how often, monthly or quarterly, or at what other dates, the value of the plant and the amount of estimated capital had varied, according to the rise or fall in the stock, between 15th May 1874 and 11th November 1875. But as the parties have not furnished this information I have been left to come to a conclusion on the subject as I best could without it.

No. 64.
Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

Having now adverted to what have appeared to me to be the leading considerations to be attended to in determining the amount of damages sustained by the pursuer, Mr Houldsworth, through the wrongful retention of the colliery by the defenders, it only remains for me to say that, according to the best of my judgment, and dealing with the matter as I believe a jury would do, and be entitled to deal with it, the amount of the damages ought to be assessed at £2000.

JUDGMENT.—The sole question remaining in this case is the assessment of damages, and the Court are to make such assessment precisely as a jury would have done answering an issue of damages upon evidence laid before them. The joint minute contains the proved facts upon which the jury must be assessing the damages.

If the question had been referred to a jury on an issue and upon this issue what the jury would have done would have been to find for the pursuer to assess the damages at a certain amount, naming the amount at which they had arrived. I think we must do the same, and I propose, agreeing with your Lordships, that we should find for the pursuer and assess the damages at £2000.

Perhaps I might stop, for a jury never gives, and is not bound to give, the result of the calculations upon which the estimate of the damages proceeds. The verdict of the jury is not subject to review, and although on a motion for a new trial the verdict may be set aside if the damages awarded are excessive, extravagant and beyond what any reasonable view of the evidence could justify, yet the burden of shewing this rests upon the party attacking the verdict, and it is always a very difficult matter to instruct inordinate or excessive damages.

Although acting as one of a jury I am not bound to explain the data upon which the calculation of the damages rests. I have no objections to do so, and shall do so as shortly as possible.

Where damages are due for breach of a mercantile contract the object is to place the pursuer in as good a position pecuniarily as if no breach of contract had been committed. The supposition to be made is that the contract had been fully implemented, and then the inquiry will be what would have been the value of the result to the pursuer. What could he have made by or through the contract, and then the difference between this amount and the amount which the pursuer actually has realised, after or notwithstanding the breach, is the amount of loss which the pursuer has sustained by and through the breach of contract complained of.

In order to reach this result, and to fix what loss the pursuer has sustained, there are two leading lines of inquiry which the jury may take and to which evidence should be directed—1st, it may be shewn speculatively what the pursuer might have done, and probably would have done, if the contract had been exactly observed and fulfilled, and the fair amount which the pursuer might have gained or realised had he followed an ordinary and reasonable course will be the amount which the defenders must make up to him for

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

having, by their breach of contract, wrongfully prevented the pursuer from securing the amount supposed. But, 2d, another course may be taken, instead of inquiring, or besides inquiring, what the pursuer has lost, and probably lost, by the breach of contract, the jury may ask quite fairly what the defender gained by and through his wrongful failure to implement his contract, and it will very often happen, I think it happens in the present case, that the defenders' gain through the breach, when compared with the estimate of what the pursuer might possibly have himself made, will lead to an equal estimate of his damage. Thus, in the present case, when the question is, what has the pursuer lost by reason of not getting back his colliery at a given time, a very great assistance will be got by finding what the defenders have made or gained by keeping and working the colliery wrongfully and after the date at which they ought to have given it up, for it may be fairly held that the pursuer would have been able to make as much of the colliery if he had got it at the proper time as the defenders have actually made during their undue retention of it.

No doubt the amount of the defenders' gain or net profit will not necessarily limit the pursuer's claim, for the pursuer might be able to satisfy the jury that if he had got possession of the colliery at the time fixed by the contract, he would have made more of it than the defenders have actually done. He may shew that he could have worked it more profitably, or relet it on better terms, and so as to give him a better return than the defenders have actually made, for it is always the pursuer's loss which is to be sought for, and not merely the defenders' illegal gain. Still the defenders' actual realised gain is always the most important and a most relevant element to lay before the jury.

I am of opinion that the jury are entitled to look at the question in all its aspects, to take both into account, and to draw therefrom a reasonable conclusion. As a juryman I have done so, and it gives me some confidence that I cannot be far wrong in the amount of damages which I have assessed; that the results of the two views do not very greatly differ, although the sum which the pursuer would have got from Mrs Brand as new tenant seems larger than the actual gain realised by the defenders, at least if the deductions claimed by the defenders are allowed.

But in estimating the damages according to either view the jury must fix the period of time or date at which the defenders ought to have ceded possession of the colliery to the pursuer, for this also is, I think, a jury question. It has been fixed that the pursuer was entitled to resume possession of the colliery on a valuation "if he so wishes," and if "at any time he should be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand." Under this clause the pursuer, on 3d February 1874, gave notice of his intention to resume, but it is plain that resumption of an extensive colliery under such a clause could not be effected in a day. Reasonable time must be allowed for obtaining and adjusting the valuations and for completing the arrangements necessary for the cession by the defenders of the going colliery, and for the assumption as a going colliery by the pursuer. Workmen or miners, machinery, above-ground and under-ground, and all the necessary officials, had to be arranged with, dismissed or transferred, current orders provided for, accumulated stores or undisposed of coal had to be removed or sold, pumping arrangements had to be kept up without interruption, and many similar details had to be attended to and adjusted. We have no special evidence before us as to the question as to what is a reasonable time is simply left to the jury to dispose of it best may. In this state of matters, and approximating as best I can to what would be fair and reasonable in the circumstances, I fix Whitsunday 1874 as an equitable date at which the defenders ought, in consequence of the notice given on 1 February 1874, to have fully and completely ceded possession to the pursuer. Jan. 27, 1877.

Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

In thus allowing the defenders three months to clear out I give them the fullest allowance possible. Perhaps a shorter time would have sufficed, but going to the terms of the lease and agreement, and the references therein to the terms of entry and removal, I think it not unreasonable to give the defenders till the Whitsunday term instead of fixing upon some intermediate and nearly arbitrary date.

Coming, then, the period from Whitsunday 1874 till Martinmas 1875, and taking as I best can the evidence both of what the pursuer might have made by working the colliery himself, or by a new lease to Mrs Brand or to anybody else, and also what the defenders have actually made by wrongfully continuing to work during that period, and making all reasonable deductions for working expenses, tear and wear, interest of capital, and incidental costs, I estimate £2000 as being as nearly as I can estimate the damage to which the pursuer is entitled.

In reaching this result I attach great weight to the pursuer's bargain with Mrs Brand. I think that if the pursuer had got possession of the colliery at Whitsunday 1874 Mrs Brand would then have entered, as in point of fact she did, at Martinmas 1875, and the pursuer would have got from her the new and enhanced lease, and then the pursuer would have had no working or other expenses to pay. In the other view—that is, what profit the defenders themselves have made—I do not allow the defenders the full amount they claim for working expenses, for I think some of the items claimed are inadmissible, or partially admissible—for example, the accounts paid to the defenders' lawyers. Interest on capital again cannot be dealt with precisely; it involves considerations not only as to market value of money, but also as to whether the pursuer would not have been saved all outlay in consequence of his agreement with Mrs Brand, who was to take the whole concern over at the same amount as was valued over at to the pursuer.

I think it right to add also that I do not give much weight to the alleged variation in the value of the machinery between Whitsunday 1874 and Martinmas 1875. The loss from depreciation to a large extent arose from the variations in the value of iron, and whether there is to be ultimate loss or not on that ground can hardly be ascertained till the plant comes to be actually sold by the pursuer or his assignees. Besides, it seems to be sufficiently established that the pursuer had little interest in this question, for Mrs Brand had taken over the whole plant at whatever sum it was valued at to the pursuer, be the value more or less. Even if Mrs Brand were not held tenant, it is obvious the pursuer might have made a similar lease with some other person who would have taken over the plant as at Whitsunday 1874 at its then value, that is, precisely at the value which the pursuer himself was to pay for it. These details, however, must be dealt with, and necessarily only approximately dealt with, by the jury. I have tried to take everything into due consideration, and my verdict is for the pursuer—damages assessed at £2000.

THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

No. 64.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Houldsworth
v. Brand's
Trustees.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Having resumed consideration of the cause, with the minute of admissions for the parties, heard counsel, find the defenders liable to the pursuer in the payment of £2000 in name of damages for the injury sustained by him by the defenders having wrongfully retained possession of colliery in question after the period at which they were bound to remove therefrom : Find the pursuer entitled to expenses from the date of said minute of admissions, including the expenses of said minute ; and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and report, and find no expenses due to either party after that date decern."

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 65. GRACE CHARLES OR GRAY AND OTHERS, First Parties.—Lord-Adv. W.
—Jameson.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Gray, &c. v.
Gray's Trustees.

ROBERT MATHESON AND OTHERS (James Gray's Trustees), Second Parties.—Moody Stuart.

Trust—Powers of Trustees—Agreement modifying Trust Purposes—Tuition of New Trust—Alimentary Provision—Nobile Officium—Special.
—A testator left his estate to trustees, with directions to pay an annuity to his widow as the preferable purpose of the trust, and to distribute the residue as far as consistent with securing the widow's annuity, among his daughters by half-yearly payments, which he termed "annuities," but which really were payments out of the capital of the estate which would have exhausted it in a few years. From these annuities he excluded the jus mariti and right of administration of his daughters' husbands, and declared them strictly alimentary. After four years it was found that the trust had become unworkable, the moveable property was exhausted, and that though power to borrow out of the herbage was conferred, no further distribution could be made to the daughters without borrowing in a way prejudicial to their real interests. The herbage still remaining in the trustees' hands was considerably in excess of what was required to secure the widow's annuity.

The mother, and the daughters, who were all of full age, being the only persons beneficially interested in the estate, and the trustees, entered into an agreement for the conveyance by the trustees to the daughters of the remainder of the trust-estate, and for the creation by them of a new trust, securing the widow's annuity, and providing for the distribution of the property among the daughters as an alimentary fund, and exclusive of the jus mariti.

A special case was then presented to the Court to determine whether the trustees had power to carry out this agreement. The Court, in respect of a clause in the original settlement declaring the daughters' "annuities" alimentary and excluding the jus mariti, but without deciding as to the effect of the clause, declined to sanction a conveyance of the estate to the daughters inasmuch as the whole parties beneficially interested in the estate were not parties to the agreement, authorised a conveyance by the trustees direct to new trustees for the purposes of the trust proposed in the deed of agreement, and added a clause declaring the fund alimentary and excluding the jus mariti similar to that contained in the original settlement.

Trust—Alimentary Provision.—Question, whether a clause declaring the fund alimentary an "annuity" which was in reality a series of periodical payments out of the capital stock of the estate was effectual.

2D DIVISION.
R.

THE late James Gray died on 5th April 1873, leaving a trust in his estate, and a settlement, dated 3d April 1871, whereby he conveyed his whole estate to Robert Matheson and others as trustees his whole estate. Mr G ived by his widow, Mrs Grace Charles or Gray, and by one son, No. 65.

 ander Gray, and by seven daughters. The truster's widow and his n daughters, with the husbands of those of them who were married, Jan. 27, 1877.
 g the only parties beneficially interested in the trust-estate, so far as Gray, &c. v.
 in the hands of the trustees, were the first parties to this special case. Gray's Trushe trustees under Mr Gray's trust-disposition and settlement were tees.
 second parties to the case.

y his settlement Mr Gray directed his trustees to pay an annuity of 0 to Mrs Gray, and also gave her the liferent of his dwelling-house furniture, the annuity to commence at the date of the testator's h, and to be paid half-yearly in advance out of the personal estate interest thereof, so long as these should be sufficient for that purpose for the other purposes of the trust to which the moveable estate was e specially applied, and thereafter, out of the rents of the heritable te, or, if need be, out of the heritable estate itself, or of a sum to be rowed on the security thereof. This annuity to Mrs Gray was declared be the primary and preferable purpose of the trust. Further, the truse were directed to pay out of the personal estate and revenue thereof, l thereafter, on exhaustion of the personal estate, out of such sum as uld be borrowed by them on the security of the heritable estate, an nity of £450 to each of five of Mr Gray's daughters, and an annuity of 0 to each of the other two. These annuities were to commence at the of Mr Gray's death, and to be paid so long as the funds lasted.

ter the widow's death, and on the truster's daughters being reduced to, the residue of the estate was to be realised and divided between no surviving daughters.

he trust-deed also contained the following declaration:—"And I he provide and declare that in all cases in which any female shall e any right, in virtue of any part of these presents, the provision or put-matter of such right shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right administration and curatory of any husband she may have, and shall purely alimentary, and shall not be assignable or liable to be attached toment or other diligence at the instance of the creditors of my daughters or their husbands or other parties; and in all cases the ists of any females, without their husbands' concurrence, shall be l and effectual discharges."

he trustees entered upon the management of the estate, and realised part of it was personal. The proceeds thereof, however, only ed for the payment of the annuities to the truster's widow and lters for the first four years after his death. There remained heritproperty to the value of about £14,000. But it was found by the es to be impossible, if they adhered strictly to the letter of the deed, to make any further distribution of the trust-estate, con-ntly with preferably securing the widow's annuity, without borrowing manner prejudicial to the interests of the other beneficiaries. At the time, it appeared to them and to the beneficiaries that a further ibution of the trust-estate might be effected, consistently with ing the widow's annuity, were certain alterations made on the pro-ns of the trust-deed.

he parties of the first part accordingly, being the whole parties inter-l beneficially in the trust-estate, and being all of full age, entered an agreement with the trustees, the parties of the second part, rebly (1) the whole parties agreed to concur in bringing an action or ial case into the Court of Session for the purpose of having it found declared that the daughters of the said James Gray were now entitled ie whole balance and remainder of the estate absolutely, Mrs Gray's

No. 65.
Jan. 27, 1877.
Gray, &c. v.
Gray's Trustees.

rights being secured in manner hereinafter set forth, and on grant discharge to the trustees under the said trust-disposition and settlement were entitled to receive a conveyance or conveyances to the same; (2) in the event of the said action or special case being successful parties of the first part bound themselves to execute a deed of assigning and conveying to the parties of the second part as trustees whole remaining estate of the said James Gray for certain purposes. These purposes were such as the first parties were agreed would carry substantially the intentions of the truster in a way which would make the trust workable. The trust-deed was also to contain a provision similar to that in the original trust-disposition and settlement, excluding the jus mariti and right of administration of the husbands of the first parties to the deed, and rendering any sums to which they had an alimentary.

This deed having been executed, the parties presented this special case to the Court, stating that the parties of the first part, being the only parties beneficially interested in the estate, were desirous of having the residue of the trust-estate handed over to them for the purpose of being administered in terms of the deed of agreement in a way conducive to the interests of all concerned, but that the trustees, the parties of the second part, had doubts as to whether they were entitled to divest themselves of the trust-estate in the manner proposed, and declined to do so without judicial authority.

The question of law submitted to the Court was:—"Are the parties of the first part and daughters of the deceased Mr James Gray entitled to obtain from the parties of the second part a conveyance of the whole remaining estate of the said Mr James Gray, upon the parties of the first part granting to the parties of the second part a discharge of all claims against the said trust-estate?"¹

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case stands in a somewhat complicated position. It is a case for the opinion and judgment of this Court, presented by the parties of the first part as trustees under a trust-settlement and the trustees acting under the settlement.

I may at once say that we are not in a position to give any final judgment on the matter. It is necessary that the parties should revise their case, and only state that they are willing to execute the deed of agreement upon the terms of the case, but they must actually execute the deed, instead of merely proposing to do so.

No doubt the period mentioned in the settlement has not arrived, and the parties say they represent all material interests under the settlement, and that circumstances render it inconvenient for the trust to continue. The inconvenience arises owing to the unusual provisions of the deed, by which payments are to be made to the beneficiaries at certain times, which payments are called annuities in the deed, but are in truth payments to account of the income of the estate alone, and not out of the capital. These payments are not to be out of the income of the estate alone, but out of the capital also. It turns out that the affairs of the trust have already at this position, that the personal estate left by the truster will do not meet the annuities falling due in April next, being only four years from the truster's death. There is heritable estate in the hands of the trustees, and

¹ Authorities referred to.—Lewis v. Anstruther, June 11, 1852, 14 D. Scot. Jur. 514, and Dec. 17, 1852, 15 D. 260, 25 Scot. Jur. 172; Allan v. Allan and Others, Dec. 12, 1872, 11 Macph. 216, 45 Scot. Jur.

No. 65.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Gray, &c. v.
Gray's Trustees.

empowered to borrow. But as the annuity to the truster's widow is for a purpose of the trust, sufficient of the heritable property must be mortgaged and unburdened to secure that annuity. Accordingly the available borrowings at present is but small, and it appears that after another year or so the trustees must cease paying the annuities to the truster's daughters, and that a considerable amount of the capital of the estate must be locked up until the death. The object of the special case is to ascertain whether the trustees in safety to accede to a family agreement which the parties interested proposed as a means of obviating the result above mentioned.

I shall shortly advert to the clauses of the trust-deed. The fourth direction to the trustees is to pay out of the moveable estate, and thereafter, on its exhaustion, out of such sum as should be borrowed in manner after provided on the security of the heritable estate, and out of the interest on such borrowed money at the time of borrowing, to each of five of the testator's daughters an annuity during their respective lives of £450 per annum, and to the remaining two daughters an annuity of £100 per annum, payable in advance, "declaring that on the death of any one or more of my daughters, the annuity payable to her or them as aforesaid shall be paid amongst my whole surviving daughters," "which payments shall be made out of my moveable estate and the interest or other revenue thereof, and after the foresaid sum to be borrowed by my trustees as aforesaid, with interest to accrue thereon, shall be sufficient for that purpose," "but subject to the preferable annuity to my wife as aforesaid."

In the seventh head, with regard to the income of his heritable estate, the testator directs his trustees, until the death of all his daughters except two, to do the same, after deduction of feu-duties, &c., and any sums required, if any, to be, for the foresaid annuity to his wife, to his five first mentioned daughters, and the survivors of them equally, excluding the issue of any of them either before or after him and leaving issue.

In the last place, the testator directs his trustees, on the death of his daughter, or on his daughters being reduced in number to two, to realise the residue of the heritable and moveable, and divide it among the two surviving daughters to the exclusion of the issue of any predeceasing.

It is also an important provision that in all cases in which any female is entitled in right under the settlement, "the provision or subject-matter of such entitlement shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration and curatory which the husband she may have, and shall be purely alimentary, and shall not be subject to be attached by arrestment or other diligence at the instance of the creditors of my said daughters or their husbands or other persons."

In this settlement, beyond what I have read, there are no ulterior provisions whatever. There are some small legacies, it is true, but these are subject to the provisions which I have referred to, and are all, I understand. There are now no interests to be provided for except those of the wife in the first place, and of the daughters in the second. The only interest that can be called an ulterior interest is the provision in the last clause of the settlement of the residue to the two last surviving daughters on the death of their father. But that still leaves the whole interest in this trust-estate in the hands of the daughters as a class. They are all parties to the case, and the whole parties interested are represented.

No. 65.
 Jan. 27, 1877.
 Gray, &c. v.
 Gray's Trustees.

In these circumstances I could have no difficulty in holding that the parties were entitled to enter into any such agreement as they chose for the purpose of facilitating the division of the trust-funds and the discharge of the trust. Were it not for the single clause above referred to declaring the trust to be alimentary, free from the jus mariti of husbands, and not assignable or alienable.

So far as the widow is concerned I do not think that there is any ground for giving weight to the considerations drawn from this clause. I doubt whether it was intended to apply to her. But whether it applies or was intended to apply to her, the provision of an annuity under the new trust-deed which is proposed to execute will afford the same protection.

With regard to the daughters' shares of the estate, there is more doubt whether to any, and, if so, to what effect, the provision I have referred to is effectual. It is unnecessary for us to decide this point. All that I shall say is that whatever effect could have been given to it under the settlement proposed to be given to the similar provision under the trust which it is proposed to execute. It is not the case of a person putting or endeavouring to put his means within the reach of his creditors, but of a mutual agreement between several parties for reciprocal considerations, to import into a trust created by themselves conditions which have been attached to beneficial provisions in their favour to the third party.

But I must in fairness say that I have very great doubt whether the trust either in the settlement or the new trust-deed, could be made effectual. The sums to which it is attempted to make it apply are not payments out of profits or interest, or by way of life annuity, or even annuity for a fixed number of years. They are truly and in substance payments out of capital. And I know of no case where bequests of capital have been effectually rendered alimentary by conditions, without the continuance of a trust to protect them. There is no machinery provided here to make the condition available so soon as the trust has, in accordance with the truster's directions, paid over the particular sums to the beneficiaries.

In these circumstances I think that we shall be doing justice to the parties if we sanction the transfer of this trust-estate from the testamentary trust to the trustees under the deed proposed to be executed. But it must be understood as a distinct condition that the new trust be created by the execution of the deed before we give our judgment.

LORD ORMDALE.—Keeping in view that all the parties interested in the succession concur in the proposed arrangement I should be inclined to say that they were entitled to get absolute possession of the estate were it not for the clause making their shares alimentary and excluding the jus mariti of the husbands of the female beneficiaries. This feature of the case cannot be ignored.

With regard to the new trust proposed to be executed in order to obviate the objection arising to the beneficiaries at once obtaining absolute possession of the estate, I fear it would not do so as the matter now stands. I rather think that the terms of the new agreement of trust will require to be altered in some respects, and in place of the estate being first made over absolutely to the beneficiaries, leaving it to them to make it over to the new trustees, it ought to be transferred at once by the Court to these new trustees. But were we to answer the question in the case in the affirmative as it now stands, there would, in the first place, ing to oblige the parties to execute a new deed of trust such as they proposed, and if they did so after an interval, however short, during which they were vested absolutely in the trust-estate, they would be very much in the position of parties trying to lay aside and secure their means from the legal attachment of their creditors. But that could not be done. No such arrangement would be effectual against creditors. The parties must therefore, I think, arrange the matter as to have the estate transferred directly from the old to new trustees. If that be done, and the case and new trust-deed altered accordingly, I do not at present see that the object of the parties effected in any way should not be sanctioned by the Court.

No. 65.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Gray, &c. v.
Gray's Trustees.

MR. GIFFORD.—This case is a very peculiar one, not only in its nature, but the way in which it is presented to us. The parties have submitted an agreed agreement by which they undertake to do certain things if they are allowed by our judgment to have the power. The difficulty in point of form amounts to this, that the parties here are really converting a special case into a question for authority. The substance of the case comes very nearly to this, that the trustees shall be empowered to enter into an agreement somewhat differing from the provisions of the trust-settlement, and enabling the new trustees to do what the original trustees had no power to do under the trust, but the doing of which is strongly expedient, or indeed necessary for the reasonable administration of the trust. If, however, this end can be attained through the submission of a special case, though it certainly is an unusual course, I do not see any serious objection; and if the special case be now remodelled by the substitution of the draft of the new trust-deed for the deed originally presented, and the corresponding alteration of the question submitted to us, I think we may answer that question in the affirmative.

Then, in a private trust, every possible beneficiary desires and consents to a particular course being adopted—all the beneficiaries being of full age and sui juris—and none of them being placed under any restraint or disability by the deed itself—then no one has any right or interest to object, and the Court will not interfere to prevent the sole and unlimited proprietors doing what they wish with their own.

Whereafter the parties adjusted a deed of direct conveyance by the same parties as trustees under the original trust-settlement to themselves as trustees under the proposed new deed of trust, embodying the agreed trust-purposes contained in the deed of agreement, and submitted the same to the Court, and at the same time altered the special case to the following effect—that the parties of the first part, being the whole beneficiaries interested, “have become desirous that the present trust should be wound up and a new trust constituted in terms of the said draft trust-settlement and conveyance, No. 8 of process. They have therefore requested the second parties to grant the said trust-disposition and conveyance in favour of the trustees therein named on receiving from the first parties a discharge of all claims on the trust-estate.”

They also substituted the following question for the question formerly submitted to the Court:—“Whether the parties of the second part, the trustees of the late Mr James Gray, are entitled now to execute and carry out the disposition and conveyance No. 8 of process, and whether, on so executing and carrying out the said disposition and conveyance, they will be sufficiently discharged of the trust?”

No. 65. After considering the new draft-deed and the amendments on special case—

Jan. 27, 1877.
Gray, &c. v.
Gray's Trustees.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the part of the second part, the trustees of the late James Gray, are entitled now to execute and carry out the disposition and conveyance No. 8 of process, and that on so executing and carrying out the said disposition and conveyance they will be sufficiently discharged of their trust: Allow the expenses of both parties to be paid out of the trust-funds, and remit," &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMERON, W.S.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 66.

Jan. 27, 1877.
Scott, &c. v.
Scott's Executrix.

ALEXANDER GLOVER AND ANOTHER (James Scott senior's Trustees Pursuers and Real Raisers.—R. V. Campbell.

JAMES SCOTT junior, Defender and Claimant.—Kinnear—Lorimer.

JESSIE CAMERON AND CURATOR, Defenders and Claimants.—

Kinnear—Lorimer.

MARY MONTGOMERIE OR SCOTT (Robert Scott's Executrix), Claimant.—M'Laren—Millie.

PETER BEATTIE, Claimant.—Burnet.

Succession—Vesting—Trust—Discretion of Trustees.—A truster, whose death consisted entirely of heritage, burdened to a certain extent with debt, directed his trustees to pay an annuity to his widow, and in the event of his leaving the property clear of debt, to accumulate the surplus income for the widow's life, and until the period of division, but in the event of his leaving the property burdened with debt to accumulate the surplus income for the purpose of discharging such debt. He then directed his trustees in the event of the decease of his widow, "and so soon thereafter as the whole heritable debt affecting the property "shall be paid off and discharged," to sell and convert the estate into money, and divide it in equal shares among his five children, substituting the issue of children dying before the period of division for the parents, and with a survivorship clause referring to the same period. The trust also contained a clause providing that there should be no division during the widow's life, or until the whole heritable debt was extinguished, "with the exception of my said trustees selling my said heritable subjects, under the authority of the heritable debts affecting the same," after the death of his widow, "waiting to accumulate funds to extinguish the debt, "provided they shall find such a course expedient, and for the interest of my estate." There was also a general power of sale.

The truster died in 1854, and his widow in 1867. At the widow's death the property was still burdened with debt. Between 1867 and 1875 the trustees held the property and accumulated the revenue. On 28th April 1875 they had accumulated sufficient to extinguish the debt, the trustees resolved to sell the estate, and on 19th May 1875 they carried this resolution into effect. The truster's five children survived his widow, but four of them preferred the resolution of the trustees to sell the property.

Held that vesting took place at the date of the widow's death, the earliest period at which the trustees might, in the exercise of their discretionary powers, have fixed the period of division, and was not postponed till the exercise of these powers.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.
R.

THE question in this case arose on the construction of the trust-deed of the late James Scott senior, builder, Maryhill, who died in 1854.

The trust-estate consisted entirely of heritage situated in Glasgow, which, at the date of the truster's death, was burdened with a heritable debt of £350.

By the second purpose of the trust-deed Mr Scott provided an annuity of £30 to his widow.

The third and fourth purposes of the deed were as follows :—

No. 66.

Thirdly, my said trustees and their foresaids, after payment of my ole debts, and all expenses incurred by them in the execution of this st, and after providing for the payment of the said yearly provision to said spouse, . . . shall collect the residue of my said estate, and in event of my having, prior to my decease, paid off and liquidated the itable debts presently affecting or which may affect my heritable subs, or any other heritable property I may yet acquire, they shall, in the nt of my said spouse being alive, invest the residue of my said means estate in good heritable or personal security, taking the rights and s in their names as trustees foresaid, and hold the same until the time a division of my estate is appointed to be made ; but in the event my dying before the heritable debts presently affecting my heritable jects, or any additional sums I may still borrow on the security of the e, or any other heritable property I may yet acquire, shall be fully d off and extinguished, then my said trustees and their foresaids are eby directed to collect the said residue and remainder of my means l estate, and lodge the same in some responsible banking company in ir names as trustees foresaid, until the funds so collected shall amount uch a sum or sums of money as may enable them from time to time liquidate and discharge such heritable debts, or whichever parts or fies thereof may be remaining over unpaid or unextinguished.

Jan. 27, 1877.
 Scott, &c. v.
 Scott's Executrix.

Fourthly, My said trustees and their foresaids, upon the decease of my spouse in the event of her surviving me, and so soon thereafter as whole heritable debts now affecting or which may yet affect the heritsubjects presently belonging to me, or which I may yet acquire, shall d off and discharged, in the event of the same not having been dis-d during my lifetime, are hereby directed to sell and convert my estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, generally and lularly before described and conveyed, into money, and after paying roviding for all expenses, to divide the same into five parts or shares, ay over the said shares to the following parties, my children, namely, mes Scott junior, wright, Maryhill, one share ; Robert Scott, mason, hill, one share ; Catherine Scott or Haddow, widow of George Hadfiesher, Glasgow, one share ; Elizabeth Scott or Cameron, spouse of : Cameron, mason, and residing at Maryhill, one share ; and Janet , presently residing in family with me at Maryhill, one share ; and e event of any of my said children above mentioned deceasing be-after me, and before the division shall take place of my said means state, leaving lawful issue of their bodies respectively alive at that then the child or children of any such deceiver or deceasers shall e equally among them, if more than one, share and share alike, the or proportion that would have fallen to their parent if in life ; deg that if any of my said children shall die before or after me, with-aving been married, or without leaving lawful issue alive at the time d division, the share or shares which would have belonged to such ser or deceasers shall fall and belong to the survivor or survivors of aid children before mentioned."

e settlement thereafter conferred the following discretionary power e trustees :—" But it is hereby expressly provided and declared that rt of the said residue of my means and estate shall be divided durhe lifetime of my said spouse, nor until the whole heritable debts ing my heritable subjects and estate are paid off and extinguished ;
 ut prejudice to my said trustees selling my said heritable subjects, the burden of the heritable debts affecting the same, at any time the death of my said spouse, without waiting until they shall be in

No. 66. possession of funds from my said general estate to enable them to pay off said debts as aforesaid, provided they shall think such a course expedient and for the interest of my estate: And to enable my said trustees or their foresaids to carry the purposes of this settlement into execution I do hereby specially empower and authorise them and their foresaids to sell and dispose of my whole heritable and moveable property and for such price or prices as can be obtained therefor."

Jan. 27, 1877.
Scott, &c. v.
Scott's Executrix.

The trustor was survived by his widow, who died in 1867.

The five children of the trustor mentioned in the fourth purpose of the settlement survived their mother, the trustor's widow; but four of them, Robert, Catherine, Elizabeth, and Janet, died before the year 1875, leaving issue, viz. James Cameron.

During the widow's life the income of the trust-estate was exhausted by payment of her annuity and other charges. From the widow's death in 1867 down to the year 1875 the trustees accumulated a sum of surplus income equal to about two-thirds of the heritable debt secured on the property.

Between 1867 and 1875 the trustees had on more than one occasion been under consideration the expediency of bringing the estate to sale, but the discretionary power conferred upon them, but determined to refrain from taking that step till the debt should be paid off out of accumulated income, thinking that they were thereby giving effect to what appeared to be the wish of the testator, and desiring to follow the directions of the settlement as closely as possible.

In 1875, however, influenced chiefly by the state of the market for heritable property in Glasgow, and thinking it expedient and for the interest of the estate, they altered their former resolution, and, on the 19th April 1875, resolved to expose the subjects for sale. They were accordingly sold on 19th May 1875.

The proceeds formed the fund in medio in the present multiplicity of claims which was thereafter raised by the trustees.

The claimants were—(1) James Scott junior, who claimed four-fifths of the fund (one-fifth as in his own right, and three-fifths as coming in right of his brother and two sisters, who died without issue before the division), on the footing that vesting was postponed by the terms of the trust-deed till the date of division, and that the date of division was the date at which the trustees took the resolution to sell the property and the proceeds; (2) Jessie Cameron, who claimed one-fifth as in right of her mother, on the same footing; (3) Mrs Mary Montgomerie, widow and executrix of Robert Scott; and (4) Peter Beattie, in right of poor of Barony Parish, Glasgow, a creditor of Robert Scott, who was a pauper lunatic.

Mrs Scott, as Robert Scott's executrix, and Peter Beattie, claimed for them one-fifth of the fund, on the footing that vesting took place at the death of the trustor's widow in 1867, when Robert Scott was still alive.

No claim was made to the shares of Catherine and Janet Scott by their representatives.

The Lord Ordinary, on 18th October 1876, found that vesting took place at the death of the widow, and appointed the fund to be distributed accordingly, the shares of Catherine and Janet Scott being in the meantime deposited in bank.

Against this interlocutor James Scott junior reclaimed, and argued that vesting depended on the date at which distribution became possible, that depended in this case on the discretion of the trustees. The trustees, in the exercise of that discretion, had resolved to sell, therefore there was no vesting. The mere delay in carrying out a direction of the testator resolution of the trustees, might indeed have no effect on vesting. No. 66.

 If the trustees had resolved to sell, it might be admitted that the date of vesting was fixed, and could not be modified by delay in carry- Jan. 27, 1877.
 ing the resolution into effect. But so long as the trustees abstained from Scott, &c. v.
 exercise of their discretion, there could, under the terms of the deed, Scott's Execu-tric.

vesting.¹

argued for Peter Beattie and Mrs Scott;—The decisions referred to in application. They applied to cases of postponed payment, where postponement was for the benefit of some beneficiary. That element wanting here. The question was, did the right become pure on the death of the trustor's widow; or was there a remaining condition which postponed vesting? The postponement of payment till the subjects were cleared of debt, or till the trustees chose to sell, was a condition which did not postpone the vesting.²

nothing.—

JUDGE-CLERK.—The question in this case is, at what date did the inheritable provisions vest? These provisions are the gift of residue to the children contained in the fourth purpose of the trust. It is considered on the one hand, that vesting took place on the death of the testator's widow; on the other, that there was no vesting until the sale by the trustees of the testator's heritable property. The Lord Ordinary has decided in favour of the widow's death. I am of opinion that his Lordship's interlocu-tion is sound, and shall shortly explain my reasons.

The testator appears to have been in very great doubt as to what the value of his heritable property was. At the same time he was anxious above all things to provide for his widow. Accordingly he left his whole property to his trustees with instructions to pay her an annuity during all the days and years of her life, and not to dispose of the property until her death.

Provisions as to the widow's annuity are found in the second head of the will. In the third head the testator directs the trustees, in the event of his dying during his own life paid off all debts affecting his heritable estate, then, after paying his other debts, and providing for his widow's annuity, to accumulate the residue "until the time when a division of my estate is appointed or determined," but in the event of his dying without having paid off the debts affecting his heritable estate, to use the residue so to be accumulated, in the first place for the heritable estate of debt.

In the fourth head the testator provides as follows—(reads fourth provision,
 p. 385). It is also added—"But it is hereby expressly provided that no part of the said residue of my means and estate shall be paid during the lifetime of my said spouse, nor until the whole heritable estate affecting my heritable subjects and estate are paid off and extinguished."
 If the deed stopped there, it would be difficult to hold that the date of vesting was any other than the date of division, that is, the date at which, the testator being dead and the estate cleared of debt, the trustees are directed Stirling v. Thorburn (opinion of Lord Cockburn), Feb. 16, 1836, 14 S. 485, 12 Jur. 239; Wilkie v. Wilkie, Jan. 27, 1837, 15 S. 430, 9 Scot. Jur. 236;

Stirling v. Leighton, March 8, 1867, 5 Macph. 561, 39 Scot. Jur. 283; Paterson's
Tr. v. Paterson, Jan. 29, 1870, 8 Macph. 449, 42 Scot. Jur. 198; Howat's
Tr. v. Howat, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 337, 42 Scot. Jur. 116.
Stirling v. Ferriers, May 18, 1872, 10 Macph. 711, 44 Scot. Jur. 390; Sloane
Tr. v. Sloan, May 20, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 678.

No. 67.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Lochgilphead
School Board
v. South
Knapdale
School Board.

At the date of the deliverance of the Board of Education the school board the parish from which the quoad sacra parish was disjoined had not yet been constituted, and no opportunity was given for any party representing that parish being heard.

On a special case presented by the school boards of the quoad sacra parish and of the parish from which it had been disjoined, held (1) that the deliverance of the Board of Education was not final because it was issued without the parties interested; (2) that the Court could not pronounce on the merits of the question, the decision of it being exclusively committed to the Board of Education or the Sheriff by the 9th section of the Education Act.

1st DIVISION.

B.

ON 10th April 1873 the school board of the quoad sacra parish of Lochgilphead passed this minute:—"Mr M'Kichan laid before the board an extract decret of disjunction and erection of the parish of Lochgilphead, and submitted that there was doubt whether the farms of Daill and Craiglass, according to the terms of the decret, form part of the parish of Lochgilphead quoad sacra. The board having considered the matter resolved to ask the opinion of the Board of Education on the question provided for by clause 9* of the Education Act, and authorised the Chairman, pro tempore, to bring the matter under the notice of the Education Board."

The deliverance of the Education Board was as follows:—"At Edinburgh, the 18th day of April 1873.—Having considered the application made on behalf of the school board of the quoad sacra parish of Lochgilphead, and having examined and considered the decret of disjunction and erection of the districts attached to said parish with reference to the question submitted regarding the farms of Daill and Craiglass, the Board of Education for Scotland, by virtue and in exercise of the powers in them vested under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, have settled and determined and do hereby settle and determine that, for the purposes of the said Act, the farms of Daill and Craiglass above mentioned shall be included and comprehended within the area of the said quoad sacra parish of Lochgilphead."

The first election of the school board of South Knapdale, one of the parishes from which Lochgilphead was disjoined in 1846, took place on the 24th April following.

In June the Lochgilphead school board certified to the parochial board of South Knapdale the amount of the rate to be collected along with the assessment for the poor from those parts of Knapdale attached to Lochgilphead, including the farms of Daill and Craiglass. The parochial board replied that a demand for assessment from those farms had not been made upon them by the Knapdale school board, on the ground that the farms still formed part of the original parish, and that the parochial board would not acquiesce in the determination of the Board of Education and refused to levy the rate.

* Sec. 9.—"The area of a parish shall for the purposes of this Act be taken to be the area of any burgh or part of a burgh situated therein for which a school board is required to be elected, and the area of every such burgh shall for the purposes of this Act be taken to be the limits within which the municipal, or ward, or other local authorities are no municipal, then within which the police assessments thereof are levied, and any question or dispute regarding the area of any parish or burgh for the purposes of this Act shall be settled by the Board of Education, or by the Sheriff of the county in which the same or the greater part thereof is situated, on an application by the school board authorised by the Board of Education, or by the Sheriff, the determination of the Board of Education or of the Sheriff, as the case may be, shall be final."

the result is that, in my opinion, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reclaimed No. 66.
is ought to be adhered to.

Jan. 27, 1877.

AND GIFFORD.—I think that in this case, and upon a sound construction of the whole terms of the trust-deed and settlement, the true period of vesting was the death of the truster's widow. It is, of course, quite competent for a testator to suspend vesting till any time he pleases, whether fixed or contingent. But it does not come to the conclusion that the testator in this case intended to suspend vesting until his heritable property was relieved of debt by the slow process of paying off the debt from the accumulations of the rents, or until his trustee had actually sold and realised the heritable estate by selling and converting it into money. This might depend upon the state of the market and the disposition of the trustees, and might not be accomplished for an indefinite and an uncertain period. It is difficult to imagine any reason at all, certainly any good reason, for suspending vesting beyond the period of the widow's death. The clauses for realisation were provisions solely for the benefit of the residuary estate, and it would be to invert their purpose to make mere delay in realising a suspension of the vesting. I do not, therefore, think that it was the intention of the testator that no vested interest should be taken in these provisions by his children until the trustees had accumulated enough to pay off the debt which burdened the heritable estate. The express power to the trustees to discharge the burden of the heritable debt, is to me a conclusive indication against such a view.

Another test may be applied to the case. Suppose that the children, who were of age, and who were absolute and unfettered beneficiaries, had demanded conveyance under burden of the debts and without a sale, could the trustee have withheld it? I think clearly not. Or suppose the children had taken up the debts and discharged them, could they not then have insisted upon immediate division? In truth, the clauses directing the paying off of heritable debts were clauses of administration only. Although they might in certain cases postpone actual distribution they were not intended to postpone or defeat the actual rights and interests of the children.

THE COURT adhered.

BY & LYON, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNER, & LOGAN, W.S.—
J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF LOCHGILPHEAD, First Parties.—Darling. No. 67.
SCHOOL BOARD OF SOUTH KNAPDALE, Second Parties.—Kinnear.

Jan. 30, 1877.

—Education Act, 1872, sec. 9.—The 9th section of the Education Act 1872, which provides that "any question or dispute regarding the area of any parish or burgh for the purposes of this Act shall be settled by the Board of Education, or by the Sheriff of the county in which the same or the greater part thereof is situated, upon application by the school board authorised by the Board of Education, or by the determination of the Board of Education or of the Sheriff, as the case may be, shall be final."

The school board of a quoad sacra parish having doubt whether, under the provisions of the Act, in the event of the disjunction and erection of the parish included certain farms, referred the question to the Board of Education. The Board of Education issued a decision stating that they had examined the decree, and determining that for the purposes of the Act the farms "shall be included and comprehended" in the parish.

No. 67. right to decide the second or third questions at all, and my opinion is that the determination of these matters is committed to the Board of Education, and they are entitled to decide finally for the purposes of the Act in which the farms lie.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Lochgillhead
School Board
v. South
Knapdale
School Board.

No doubt section 9 commences by dealing with questions relating to parishes having burghs within them. But the words which we have now to consider are much too broad to be confined to such parishes.

There may be a little difficulty in following the policy of the statute in making this enactment, considering that the determination of such disputes involve questions of law. But it is not to be left out of view that there is an alternative. The Board of Education may authorise the school board to refer the matter to the Sheriff, and it rather appears that this course is the alternative provided by the statute for cases in which questions of law do arise.

Other clauses in the statute to which we have been referred go to support the construction which I have put on sec. 9, because they confer powers, though of a different kind, are very large, will involve civil rights, and oblige the inhabitants to or relieve them from assessments, and bring them for the purposes of the statute within one parish rather than another.

I therefore propose that we answer the first question in the negative, and decline to answer the others.

LORD DEAS.—It is plain on the face of the decree of disjunction and pronounced in 1846 that there is room for a question of construction whether or may not be aided by evidence whether or not the farms belonged to the quoad sacra parish.

I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that section 9 of the statute refers to that question of construction to the Board of Education, and that the effect of the section is not limited to questions between parishes on the one hand and burghs on the other.

The question was as to the area of the parish. It depended on the construction of the decree, and the only question the board were called on to determine was whether according to a sound construction of that decree the farms were or were not within the quoad sacra parish. The power of sending a case to the Sheriff is an element going to shew that the power of construing such a decree was intended to be conferred on the board. The Board of Education, however, neither heard parties as they should have done, nor sent the case to the Sheriff, but gave their answer as if they had an arbitrary power to include the farms in one parish or the other as they thought most expedient. Their determination would have been final if they had either applied their minds to and decided the real question themselves, or taken the still more appropriate course of referring it to the Sheriff. But it can have no finality as it stands.

LORD MURE.—I am quite satisfied with the way in which it is proposed to answer these questions.

I think the Board of Education had the exclusive power to decide the questions submitted to them for the purposes of this Act, and that their determination would have been final if the proceedings had been properly gone about. The matter was not properly gone about, inasmuch as all parties interested in the question were not called before the board at the time their determination was pronounced.

Accordingly the two school boards presented this special case, the No. 67.
 Lochgilphead board (first party) maintaining (1) that the determination of the Board of Education was final; and (2) that according to the true Jan. 30, 1877.
 construction of the decree of disjunction the quoad sacra parish did include the farms. Lochgilphead
 School Board
 v. South
 Knapdale
 School Board.

The Knapdale board (second parties) maintained (1) that section 9 did not apply, being limited to the case of a parish containing a burgh or part of a burgh, or at all events to questions of mere boundaries between parishes; (2) that, in any case, the Board of Education had no power to decide on any such question on an ex parte application, and without giving other parties interested an opportunity of being heard; and (3) that the farms of Dail and Craiglass did not form part of the parish of Lochgilphead.

The questions were—" (1) Whether the determination of the Board of Education for Scotland is final and conclusive of the question whether, for the purposes of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1862, the farms of Dail and Craiglass form part of the parish of Lochgilphead, or of the parish of South Knapdale? (2) Whether the farms of Dail and Craiglass, for the purposes of the Act, form part of the parish of Lochgilphead? Or (3) whether the said farms, for the purposes of the said Act, form part of the parish of South Knapdale?"

Advancing,—

THE PRESIDENT.—The first question is whether the determination of the Board of Education is final and conclusive for the purposes of the Education Act, the question whether these farms belong to one parish or the other.

The school board of Lochgilphead, upon a consideration of the decree of dis-junction and erection, thought it a doubtful question whether the farms belonged to the quoad sacra parish or not, and they submitted the point to the Board of Education, by their deliverance of 18th April 1873, "settle and determine that, for the purposes of the said Act, the farms of Dail and Craiglass are included and comprehended within the area of the said quoad sacra

 parish of Lochgilphead."

It may be doubted whether it does not appear on the face of this deliverance that the Board of Education failed to apply their minds to the true question before them, viz., whether, according to the just construction of the decree of disjunction and erection, the farms belonged to the one parish or the other, and whether they led to a decision on some view of expediency or mero arbitrio. But this is rather a narrow and critical view on which to hold that the deliverance is defective.

The objection that the board issued their deliverance parte inaudita is more frivolous. It is admitted that the application of the Lochgilphead board was ex parte, and that no one appeared or was called on to appear in the interest of the parish of South Knapdale. Now, whatever may be the construction of the section of the statute in other respects, I am of opinion that in a question of the kind now before us, in which two parishes have adverse interests, and the Board of Education are not within the powers conferred by this section if they determine the question without having both parishes represented, and without stating what is to be alleged by each. I therefore think the first query must be answered in the negative.

When we come to consider the second, which is on the merits of that dispute, we are met by the important preliminary plea that we have no

No. 67.
 Jan. 30, 1877.
 Lochgilphead
 School Board
 v. South
 Knapdale
 School Board.

right to decide the second or third questions at all, and my opinion is that determination of these matters is committed to the Board of Education, and they are entitled to decide finally for the purposes of the Act in which p the farms lie.

No doubt section 9 commences by dealing with questions relating to p having burghs within them. But the words which we have now to co are much too broad to be confined to such parishes.

There may be a little difficulty in following the policy of the state making this enactment, considering that the determination of such dispute involve questions of law. But it is not to be left out of view that there alternative. The Board of Education may authorise the school board to the Sheriff, and it rather appears that this course is the alternative p by the statute for cases in which questions of law do arise.

Other clauses in the statute to which we have been referred go to sup construction which I have put on sec. 9, because they confer powers though of a different kind, are very large, will involve civil rights, and the inhabitants to or relieve them from assessments, and bring them for the poses of the statute within one parish rather than another.

I therefore propose that we answer the first question in the negative decline to answer the others.

LORD DEAS.—It is plain on the face of the decree of disjunction and pronounced in 1846 that there is room for a question of construction whi or may not be aided by evidence whether or not the farms belonged quoad sacra parish.

I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that section 9 of the statute o that question of construction to the Board of Education, and that the of the section is not limited to questions between parishes on the o and burghs on the other.

The question was as to the area of the parish. It depended on the con of the decree, and the only question the board were called on to determ whether according to a sound construction of that decree the farms were not within the quoad sacra parish. The power of sending a case to the is an element going to shew that the power of construing such a de intended to be conferred on the board. The Board of Education, b neither heard parties as they should have done, nor sent the case to the but gave their answer as if they had an arbitrary power to include the one parish or the other as they thought most expedient. Their determ would have been final if they had either applied their minds to and the real question themselves, or taken the still more appropriate course ing it to the Sheriff. But it can have no finality as it stands.

LORD MURE.—I am quite satisfied with the way in which it is prop answer these questions.

I think the Board of Education had the exclusive power to decide t submitted to them for the purposes of this Act, and that their determ would have been final if the proceedings had been properly gone abou the matter was not properly gone about, inasmuch as all parties inter the question were not called before the board at the time their deliver pronounced.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I think this question fell properly before the cognisance of the Board of Education, and that whether they considered it themselves or sent it to the Sheriff the decision for the purposes of the Act would be final, provided the interests of the parties interested were duly represented.

No. 67.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Lochgilphead
School Board
v. South
Knapdale
School Board.

It would be a somewhat critical view to say that the board has not dealt with the question, though the proceedings are open to the observation that it has not well dealt with. I prefer to put my judgment on the ground that the board should have had some party before them who had an adverse interest. But the Knapdale board was not in existence. But the Board of Education might have had some party who represented the interest, or deferred the determination of the point; and at least, in the absence of any representation of the interest, I think the determination was not final to the effect of taking the board from again entertaining the question and hearing parties. And the Knapdale board has the opposing interest I concur in thinking must send the case back to the Board of Education in order that they may order the dispute between the two parties.

The interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare that the question or dispute, whether, in terms of the decret of disjunction and erection, dated 9th December 1846, the farms of Dail and Craiglass form part of the parish of Lochgilphead, or of the parish of South Knapdale, is by section 9 of the Act 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62, and for the purposes of that Act, competent only to the Board of Education, as therein provided; but find that the determination of the question by the Board of Education, by their minute of 13th April 1873, having been made and issued without hearing the party of the second part, or giving opportunity for any party representing the parish of South Knapdale being heard on the said question, is not final, and that the said question or dispute remains to be determined by the said Board of Education, or the Sheriff, in terms of section 9 of the said Act: Therefore the Court answer the first question in the negative, and for want of jurisdiction decline to answer the second and third questions."

D. MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT FERGUSON, Pursuer and Appellant.—McKechie.
ALEXANDER THOMSON AND OTHERS (James Jack's Executors), AND
MARGARET JACK, Defenders and Respondents.—Rankine.

No. 68.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Jack's Execu-
tors.

Title to Sue—Husband and Wife—Divorce, effect of on Title to Held that a husband, who had been divorced on account of his adultery, had title to sue for moveable estate which had vested in his wife prior to the decree of divorce, but had not been paid.

This action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen by Robert Ferguson in November 1875 to recover from James Jack's executors the residue of James Jack's estate which, on his death in 1872, was undisposed of residue to his daughter, Margaret Jack, from whom the pursuer had been divorced in 1874 on the ground of his adultery. The action was defended by James Jack's executors, who stated the ordinary plea of no title to sue, in respect that the pursuer was not at the time of the action the husband of Margaret Jack, having been divorced from her on 19th December 1874.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen-
shire.
I.

No. 68.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Jack's Execu-
tors.

Margaret Jack was also sisted as a defender, and, while adopting the plea of no title to sue, also pleaded "that, on the assumption that the pursuer has a title to sue, he is not entitled to claim the sum mentioned in any part of it, except on the condition of making therefrom a reasonable provision for her support and maintenance, under the provisions of the 16th section of the 'Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861,' 24 and Victoria, chapter 86."

The Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson) sustained the plea of no title to sue, and dismissed the action.*

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) adhered on appeal.†

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—The true import of the dicta of the institutional writers¹ on the subject of the effect of divorce on the matrimonial rights of parties is that upon divorce the marriage ceases to have any influence on these rights, and that provisions granted intuitu matrimonii must be restored to the innocent spouse. The divorce has, however, no effect on what accrues to the guilty husband stante matrimonio by his jus maritus. The case of Ritchie,² quoted by the Sheriff, was not truly an authority to the contrary. The 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, applies only to parties who were still spouses.

Argued for the defenders;—In the case of divorce for desertion the offending husband lost the tocher by the express words of the Act of 1571, 55, and this had been interpreted to include the conventional provisions of courtesy and jus mariti.³ There was no real distinction between this case and the case of divorce for adultery, for the decision in Justice v. Mackenzie.

* "NOTE.—The object of the present action is to enable the pursuer to get the sum sued for from the executors of the father of the woman who was his wife here, and to enable her to get the succession. I am of opinion that he is not entitled to get it. It is true that the sum sued for was vested in the wife prior to the dissolution of marriage, and that it might have been then claimed by the husband, as his marital rights were not excluded; but, in point of fact, he did not get possession of it, and I put my judgment on this broad ground, that having been divorced, and being the guilty party, he can take no benefit through the marriage or through the dissolution of the marriage.

"The words used by Stair seem to me to set forth the existing law of Scotland on the subject:—'When marriage is dissolved by divorce, the party injured loseth all benefit accruing through the marriage, but the party injured the same benefit as by the other's natural death.'

"I accordingly deal with the wife here as if she were a spouse surviving the death of her husband. The question of the rights of the husband's creditors is not raised."

† "NOTE.—The pursuer of this action, who was divorced from his wife in 19th December 1874, claims a sum of money to which she became entitled by her father's death on 16th July 1872. He maintains that the decree has retroactive effect, as it simply terminated his rights under the marriage.

"It, however, does more; it operated a complete forfeiture of them. The guilty spouse is thereby cut off from all right or privilege that he or she might have as a spouse.'—(Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, 5th June 1874.) It is clear that, as regards this legacy, the wife herself is the only party now in the world entitled to uplift and discharge it, because, although it may have vested prior to the divorce, the husband never obtained possession of it, and the effect of the decree was to deprive him not only of the status of a husband, but of all the rights and privileges coming to him in that character."

¹ Stair, i., 4, 20; Ersk. i., 6, 46–8; Bell's Prin. 1622; Fraser, i., 686, seq.

² Ritchie v. Ritchie's Trustees, June 5, 1874, ante, vol. i. 987.

³ Fraser, i. 687, 1st ed.

⁴ 1761, M. 334.

been regarded as unsound,¹ and in noticing it Lord Chancellor Cairns² No. 68.
 set out the true test of what should or should not be given up to the present party, viz., whether it had or had not become mixed up with the of the offender's property. Here the husband never had possession Jan. 30, 1877.
 the fund, and required to sue for it now. Ferguson v. Jack's Execu- tors.

Even if the defenders were wrong, the wife was entitled, either under Conjugal Rights Act or in equity, to a settlement.³ The divorce could put the guilty husband in a better position in this respect than if parties were still spouses.
 It advising,—

MR. ORMDALE.—The Sheriff-principal, as well as his Substitute, has held that the husband's divorce on the ground of adultery the pursuer forfeited all rights, and his jus mariti as now attempted to be put in operation by him, which accrued to him through his marriage with Margaret Jack, and consequently he has no title to sue the present action. The question for the Court is whether the Sheriff's judgment is well or ill founded.

It is disputable that the pursuer's marriage with Margaret Jack was equivalent to a legal assignation in his favour of all her moveable rights and estate, and required no intimation beyond that afforded by the marriage itself. If, therefore, no divorce had interposed, the pursuer's right and title to insist in the action would have been clear, for his wife's share of her father's moveable succession had indisputably vested in him on the father's death fully two years before the divorce, and payment of it might have been enforced by him, and might have been attached by his creditors.

Then, it is said that the divorce in 1874, before the present action was brought, destroys any title the pursuer might otherwise have had to sue for recovery of the fund in question, in respect the same must be held to belong to Margaret Jack. I do not very well see how this can be, unless upon the ground that by the divorce her husband was divested of the right which he previously had, and that she thereby came to be vested in what she had not previously any right to. But can it be held that the divorce has had any such effect? It is true that a divorce operates as a dissolution of the marriage as fully as the death of either of the spouses; but a dissolution of the marriage by death, although it puts an end as at its date to the jus mariti, does not retro so as to effect a restoration of previously vested interests. Accordingly, as observed by Mr Erskine (i. 6, 13), "any moveable subject which the wife's death shall be discovered to have belonged to her falls to the surviving husband," or, it may be added, to his representatives in the event of death before the existence of the moveable subjects was discovered, as was in the case of Egerton v. Forbes, 27th November 1812, F.C.

The question, then, in the present case comes to be narrowed to this—Does dissolution of the pursuer's marriage, in consequence of his adultery, do more than what would have been effected by its dissolution through the death of either of the spouses? If the divorce had been for desertion its effects in some respects have been different from what they are when the divorce

¹ Fraser, i. 691, 1st ed.; Ivory's Note to Ersk., i. 6, 48.

² Harvey v. Farquhar, Feb. 22, 1872, 10 Macph., H.L. 26, 44 Scot. Jur.

³ Re Kincaid's Trust, 1 Drewry, 326.

No. 68. has proceeded for adultery, for by the Act 1573, cap. 55, it is declared that "the offending party shall lose the tocher and the donationes propter nuptias." But it has been decided in more than one case that such is not the effect of a divorce on the head of adultery—Anderson v. Welsh, 8th Feb. 1734, Mor. 1000, and Justice v. Murray, 13th Jan. 1761, Mor. 334. It is unnecessary, however, to go into that distinction, for here the dispute does not relate to the tocher or the donationes propter nuptias. The very circumstance, indeed, of its requiring a statutory enactment to effect a loss to the offending party of the tocher or the donationes propter nuptias goes far to shew that beyond these particular grounds of divorce on any ground, unless on the head of absolute nullity, implying that there never had been any valid marriage, can be held to operate retro in its effects.

Jan. 30, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Jack's Executors.

I am therefore unable to satisfy myself, either on authority or principle, that the pursuer's vested right to the fund here in dispute has been cut down by a divorce. It might very well have been that he had not previously obtained actual payment of it in consequence of his having from indulgence to the debtor refrained from exacting payment; or it might have been owing to the inability of the debtor to make payment; or a variety of other accidental causes attributable to the pursuer, and which he could not help, may have prevented him obtaining actual possession; but I am unable to see how his right could be converted into no right by such accidental circumstances as those now suggested. I am equally unable to think that his right has been destroyed in the circumstances in which the present action has been brought. Nor am I impressed with the hardship that may be supposed to result from holding that a divorce does not destroy rights in a husband which had previously vested in him mariti, for it must be borne in mind that by his marriage a husband becomes liable for the debts and obligations of his wife, and after divorce, as before, is bound to bring up and maintain the children of the marriage.

As regards the plea stated for the wife on the Conjugal Rights Act, we decide that, as the record contains no averment whatever on the subject.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur in the view which your Lordship has stated. I think that on marriage the wife's moveable estate vests eo ipso in the husband where there is no antenuptial contract. The mode in which the older law stated the effect of marriage was that it operated in favour of the husband by an intimated and completed assignation of the whole of the wife's moveable estate. The wife's claim here is moveable. It emerged during the subsistence of the marriage, though it was not reduced into possession. Now, I think that marriage was equivalent to an assignation intimated to the executors, and, if that effect was not cut down by divorce, for in that case I do not see why, if the amount had actually been in the husband's pocket and been recovered by him, it should not be repaid. No such effect has ever been given to divorce. The forfeiture which follows on divorce does not cut down an intimated assignation, though the subject is not reduced into possession. Neither does it cut down the husband's right to what has already vested stante matrimonio, if not recovered. I therefore concur in repelling the preliminary plea. All questions are necessarily reserved,—in particular, the questions under the Conjugal Rights Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Marriage operates as an assignation of all the

sonal estate, requiring no intimation. In this case, therefore, the wife's No. 68.
 interest in her father's succession vested in the husband by virtue of the marriage, and the divorce did not divest him. It is quite true, as Lord Stair has said, that in divorce the guilty spouse "loseth all benefit accruing through the marriage." But that does not cover past benefits. Unless divorce in such circumstances operated as a retrocession there is no foundation for the plea of title, and I know of no authority for holding that a divorce has this

Jan. 30, 1877.
 Ferguson v.
 Jack's Executors.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Having heard counsel on the appeal, sustain the same ; recall the judgments appealed from ;
 repel the first plea in law stated for the respondents in so far as the same is pleaded to bar the action ; . . . and remit the case to the Sheriff to proceed in the cause ; reserve all questions of expenses, with power to the Sheriff to dispose of the whole expenses, including those in this Court, at the end of the cause, and decern."

W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

MRS P. LILLEY, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—R. V. Campbell.
 MR M. B. SALMOND or LILLEY, Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Watson
—Balfour—H. Johnston.

No. 69.

Jan. 31, 1877.
 Lilley v.
 Lilley.

Wife of Child—Husband and Wife.—In a petition by a father for the custody of his child, which was eight months old, the mother answered that she had been obliged to leave her husband's house shortly before the birth of the child in consequence of unkind treatment, and that owing to the tender care the child it required its mother's care. The Court, without inquiry, ordered the child to be given up to the father, reserving to the mother right of visitation at any time she might desire, and appointing the child to be sent on to the mother on one day in each week.

There was a petition by the Rev. J. P. Lilley, minister of Free Knox's 1ST DIVISION.
 Church at Arbroath, for the custody of his child. The petition set forth that he was married to Margaret B. Salmond in July 1875. On 10th May 1876 he left Arbroath on business for a few days, and on his return on the 13th he found that his wife had left his house that day.
 When she had lived in the house of her sisters at Arbroath. She gave birth to a daughter on 19th May, and she refused to return to his house to give up the child. The petitioner attributed her conduct to the influence of her brothers and sisters.

Lilley lodged answers, in which she stated that she was obliged to leave her husband owing to his cruelty and unkindness.

Lilley averred that it would be most detrimental to the child's health and comfort to remove it from her charge and place it in alien possession. Moreover she had not done anything to forfeit the right of a mother to minister to the wants of her infant."

A correspondence was printed, beginning the day of the wife's desertion between the husband and his wife and her brothers. The petitioner failed ineffectually to induce his wife to return.

An inquiry was moved for or ordered.¹

No. 69. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Jan. 31, 1877.
Lilley v.
Lilley.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question is whether, in the circumstances of case, the father or the mother is entitled to the custody of their only child.

The child is now eight months old, and has been weaned. It was not in the father's house, the mother having left his house while in an advanced stage of pregnancy, and gone to live with her sisters, where she still resides. The case would not be substantially different if the child had been born in the father's house, and the mother had recently left the house, taking the child with her. Neither the father nor the mother is personally disqualified to the custody of the child. There are no considerations of a special nature affecting the question.

In these circumstances, the Court are of opinion that, in accordance with previous cases, the right of the father must prevail. We shall therefore make an order substantially in terms of the prayer of the petition. But before the order is signed some arrangement must be made to secure that the mother shall have proper and reasonable access to the child.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel for the petitioner and answers, find that the petitioner is entitled to the custody of the child of the marriage between him and the respondent: Therefore decern and ordain the respondent forthwith to deliver up the said child to the petitioner, or any one having authority to receive delivery, but reserving to the respondent the right of access to the said child as follows, viz., the petitioner shall send the child to the respondent's residence in Arbroath only once a-week, on any day she may select, to remain with the respondent from 11 A.M. to 6 P.M., the respondent to be entitled, but without any attendant, to visit the said child at the petitioner's house without the petitioner being present, at any time she may desire: Quoad ultra continue the cause that the parties may hereafter move the Court in the event of any change of circumstances: Find the petitioner liable to the respondent's expenses hitherto incurred," &c.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—LEBURN & HENDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 70.

WILLIAM HAY'S TRUSTEES, Petitioners and Respondents.—Kearney
GEORGE YOUNG, Respondent and Appellant.—Mackintosh—James

Jan. 31, 1877.
Hay's Trustees v. Young.

Interdict—Trespass—Bona fides.—A person in good faith entered upon the land of the proprietor without permission from the proprietor, and dug holes to trace an old mine for the purpose of obtaining evidence for a jury trial then proceeding. The proprietor, a month after, presented a petition for interdict. Held that there was no ground for the application, and petition dismissed with expenses.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Berwickshire.
R.

THE trustees of Mr Hay of Dunse Castle, on 1st February 1877, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court to have George Young, p. 397, Dunse, interdicted from trespassing on the lands and estate of Dunse Castle. A record was made up, from which it appeared that on 24th December

June 3, 1870, 8 Macph. 821; Ketchen v. Ketchen, July 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 821; Symington v. Symington; March 20, 1874, ante, vol. i. 871, March 18, 1875, vol. ii. (H. of L.) 41.

Accordingly the two school boards presented this special case, the No. 67.
 the Lochgilphead board (first party) maintaining (1) that the determination Jan. 30, 1877.
 the Board of Education was final; and (2) that according to the true Lochgilphead construction of the decree of disjunction the quoad sacra parish did in- School Board de the farms. v. South

The Knapdale board (second parties) maintained (1) that section 9 did Knapdale apply, being limited to the case of a parish containing a burgh or part School Board a burgh, or at all events to questions of mere boundaries between ishes; (2) that, in any case, the Board of Education had no power to pose of any such question on an ex parte application, and without ng other parties interested an opportunity of being heard; and (3)
 the farms of Dail and Craiglass did not form part of the parish of Lochgilphead.

The questions were—" (1) Whether the determination of the Board of Education for Scotland is final and conclusive of the question whether, the purposes of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1862, the farms of Dail Craiglass form part of the parish of Lochgilphead, or of the parish South Knapdale? (2) Whether the farms of Dail and Craiglass, for purposes of the Act, form part of the parish of Lochgilphead? Or (3) whether the said farms, for the purposes of the said Act, form part of parish of South Knapdale?"

It advising.—

THE PRESIDENT.—The first question is whether the determination of the Board of Education is final and conclusive for the purposes of the Education Act, the question whether these farms belong to one parish or the other.

The school board of Lochgilphead, upon a consideration of the decree of dis-
 junction and erection, thought it a doubtful question whether the farms belonged to the quoad sacra parish or not, and they submitted the point to the Board of Education.

The Board of Education, by their deliverance of 18th April 1873, "settle and determine that, for the purposes of the said Act, the farms of Dail and Craiglass shall be included and comprehended within the area of the said quoad sacra
 parish of Lochgilphead."

It may be doubted whether it does not appear on the face of this deliverance
 that the Board of Education failed to apply their minds to the true question before them, viz., whether, according to the just construction of the decree of disjunction and erection, the farms belonged to the one parish or the other, and whether they should be included in the parish of Lochgilphead or not. But this is rather a narrow and critical view on which to hold that the deliverance is invalid.

The objection that the board issued their deliverance parte inaudita is more substantial. It is admitted that the application of the Lochgilphead board was ex parte, and that no one appeared or was called on to appear in the interest of the parish of South Knapdale. Now, whatever may be the construction of this section of the statute in other respects, I am of opinion that in a question of the kind now before us, in which two parishes have adverse interests, the Board of Education are not within the powers conferred by this section if they determine the question without having both parishes represented, and without stating what is to be alleged by each. I therefore think the first query must be answered in the negative.

When we come to consider the second, which is on the merits of that dispute, we are met by the important preliminary plea that we have no

No. 70. supplied with water by a pipe passing through Peelrig he had gone to inspect the state of that pipe, that he had found the pipe to the extent of 90 feet already laid open, and had made the necessary investigations. No objection had been taken to that action of his at the time, or till it was made in the present petition. He further averred that on neither of the occasions complained of had any harm been done either to the petitioners or their tenants.

Jan. 31, 1877.
Hay's Trustees v. Young.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dickson) on 31st March 1876 refused the prayer of the petition, with expenses.

The petitioners appealed to the Sheriff (Pattison), who recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and granted the prayer of the petition.

Young appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I regret very much that this case should ever come before us. I am, however, quite unable to concur in the view taken by the Sheriff.

I see no difficulty in accounting for the steps which were taken by Mr Young. He certainly had no intention of trespassing, nor did it occur to him that the respondents would object to his operations. Mr Hannan, the factor for the trustees, and Mr Young, had been employed by the police commissionaires Dunse to make investigations of this nature with a view to being prepared to give evidence on their behalf in the pending action against them, and they appear to have worked together for this purpose. Hannan and Young were both to have been in Edinburgh at the trial, and Young, who was returning from Dunse while the case was still going on, wishing to support the facts to which Hannan was prepared to speak, if called upon, resolved to make fresh statements with a view to strengthening those already made by Hannan. It is not, it is true, entitled to assume, but he did assume, that whatever he could do to support Hannan's evidence would be allowed both by Hannan, and the trustees, whose factor he was. Accordingly, he wrote to the local overseer for assistance and telegraphed to Hannan that he was about to take fresh gaugings. Having done this he proceeds to go upon the property of the trustees, and with the assistance of their overseer and workmen takes gaugings, and also finds out what repairs are going on and the ground broken up he gets holes dug to the extent of this old drain. All this he says he did to support Hannan's evidence, and he never thought that any one would object. It is possible that if he had thought more deliberately he would have applied for leave to do what he was doing, but he was thinking of nothing but the trial and the importance of the evidence. He afterwards, it appears, waited upon Hannan to put him in possession of the additional information which he had acquired, but failed to do so. All this was imprudent and thoughtless, but it was certainly done in good faith.

The next thing that occurred was the receipt by him of Hannan's letter of the 30th December 1875 complaining of what he had done as a trespass. He answered most candidly that he employed the overseer and workmen, and that he had no intention or idea that what he did would give offence, and he also offered to pay the expense incurred in the operations.

In such circumstances, the proper course for Mr Hannan to have taken would have been to have said, "You have given offence to my employers, and you must give me an assurance that you will not do so again." But nothing of that sort is done. No notice of that letter is taken at all until a month to the cognisance of the Board of Education, and that whether they con- Jan. 30, 1877.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I think this question fell properly No. 67.
 sidered it themselves or sent it to the Sheriff the decision for the purposes of Lochgilphead the Act would be final, provided the interests of the parties interested were duly School Board represented. v. South
 Knapdale
 School Board.

It would be a somewhat critical view to say that the board has not dealt with the question, though the proceedings are open to the observation that it has not well dealt with. I prefer to put my judgment on the ground that the board should have had some party before them who had an adverse interest.
 I doubt the Knapdale board was not in existence. But the Board of Education ought to have had some party who represented the interest, or deferred consideration of the point; and at least, in the absence of any representation of opposing interest, I think the determination was not final to the effect of excluding the board from again entertaining the question and hearing parties.
 As that the Knapdale board has the opposing interest I concur in thinking that we must send the case back to the Board of Education in order that they may consider the dispute between the two parties.

THE interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare that the question or dispute, whether, in terms of the decret of disjunction and erection, dated 9th December 1846, the farms of Dail and Craiglass form part of the parish of Lochgilphead, or of the parish of South Knapdale, is by section 9 of the Act 35 and 36 Vict. cap.
 62, and for the purposes of that Act, competent only to the Board of Education, as therein provided; but find that the determination of the question by the Board of Education, by their minute of 13th April 1873, having been made and issued without hearing the party of the second part, or giving opportunity for any party representing the parish of South Knapdale being heard on the said question, is not final, and that the said question or dispute remains to be determined by the said Board of Education, or the Sheriff, in terms of section 9 of the said Act: Therefore the Court answer the first question in the negative, and for want of jurisdiction decline to answer the second and third questions."

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT FERGUSON, Pursuer and Appellant.—McKechnie.
 ALEXANDER THOMSON AND OTHERS (James Jack's Executors), AND
 MARGARET JACK, Defenders and Respondents.—Rankine.

No. 68.

Jan. 30, 1877.
 Ferguson v.
 Jack's Execu-
 tors.

Verdict—Title to Sue—Husband and Wife—Divorce, effect of on Title to —Held that a husband, who had been divorced on account of his adultery, has title to sue for moveable estate which had vested in his wife prior to the decree of divorce, but had not been paid.

HIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen by Robert 2D DIVISION.
 Ferguson in November 1875 to recover from James Jack's executors the Sheriff of residue of James Jack's estate which, on his death in 1872, Aberdeenshire.
 as undisposed of residue to his daughter, Margaret Jack, from whom I.
 pursuer had been divorced in 1874 on the ground of his adultery.
 The action was defended by James Jack's executors, who stated the liminary plea of no title to sue, in respect that the pursuer was not at date of the action the husband of Margaret Jack, having been divorced from her on 19th December 1874.

No 70. Young did not intend to commit a trespass or to give offence to any party. Nothing could better shew this than the telegram which he sent to the respondents' general factor, and the communications he had with their local owners. All he did appears to me to have been done by him in optima fide. And, whenever he was complained of he wrote the letter quoted in the record by the respondents' factor—a letter which, in its terms, does him, I think, great credit and ought to have been held as perfectly satisfactory. But the respondents, although they remained quiescent for more than a month after that letter was written, proceeded, without any previous intimation to Mr Young of their intention, to present their petition for interdict against him. I cannot think that, under the circumstances, they were warranted in doing so.

Jan. 31, 1877.
Hay's Trustees v. Young.

I agree, therefore, with your Lordship that the petition for interdict was founded, and ought never to have been presented. And I may add that I consider the reference to the so-called former trespass does anything but improve the position of the petitioners.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and I entirely concur in the observations of your Lordship in the chair.

The remedy of judicial interdict is a most important one, for it proceeds on the principle that prevention is better than cure, and that in many cases it is more expedient to prevent a wrong from being done than merely to attempt to give subsequent redress. But interdict is never granted as a matter of course, and ought not to be applied for or granted without strong, or, at least, reasonable grounds.

The petitioners do not say in this petition for interdict that they apprehend and fear that the respondent will offend again, or that they have any reason to think or to suppose that he has any intention of interfering with their land or estate. Now, this is not a mere matter of form and a thing to be implicitly taken for granted. If it were I should not at all found on it. It is a matter of substance. The essence of a case for interdict is that either there is a wrong being actually committed, or that a wrong is apprehended. There must be reasonable grounds for fearing that the respondent in a petition such as this will do the act which he is to be interdicted from doing. The Court is not asked without any cause shewn to interdict and prohibit all the world from doing anything contrary to law. It will presume that the law will be obeyed unless it is shewn that an infraction is seriously threatened, or on good grounds apprehended. Now, when I come to the facts of this case I find no ground for any such apprehension. Without going into details, I have no doubt that the respondent thought that what he was doing was what no one would object to. He employed the petitioners' overseer and labourers with him, and what was done was done by their hands, and this very clearly indicates that he must have known that he was doing nothing wrong. When written to by the petitioners' agent he made what seems to me to be a full apology, and that letter, fairly read, implies a promise, or at least a disclaimer of any intention of ever again making such investigations on the petitioners' property without permission. I am of opinion that this is not a case for interdict, and that this petition should never have been presented. The reference to the old examination service water-pipe does not aid the petitioners' case. It is not disputed that there was a right or permission to take water by means of that pipe the owners' land. I think such right or permission implies a right to inspect No. 70.

 pipe when necessary to repair it or ascertain its efficiency.

Jan. 31, 1877.
 Hay's Trustees v. Young.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the judgment complained of; dismiss the petition: Find the petitioners liable in expenses in both Courts; and remit both these accounts to the Auditor of this Court," &c.

BENTON & GRAY, S.S.C.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

MARY DOW AND OTHERS, First Parties.—Moncreiff.
 KILGOUR'S TRUSTEES, Second Parties.—McLaren.

No. 71.

Jan. 31, 1877.

Executor—Trust—Defeasible Directions.—When a testator has made a particular investment for behoof of a beneficiary who would have control over the investment if it were made the Court will not enforce the direction.

Dow v.
 Kilgour's
 Trustees.

THOMAS, merchant, Dundee, died on 15th July 1875, leaving a 2^D DIVISION.
 will in which he directed his trustees, after payment of debts R.
 legacies, to realise the residue of his estate and divide it into parts or shares. One of these shares he directed to be invested in annuities of equal amount—one a Government annuity, another in the Scottish Widows' Fund, and the third of the Scottish Provi-dent Institution, each of these annuities to be made payable to his Mary Ann and Ellen Dow, residing in Oporto, "jointly, and the survivors of them." Another share was appointed to be similarly invested in three like annuities in favour of Mary Dick and Marjory Forbes Dick, wives of his, jointly, and to the survivor. The third share was to be invested in three like annuities in favour of his housekeeper, Mrs. Mitchell. It was provided that, in the event of any of the sets of beneficiaries predeceasing the purchase of the annuities, the funds should be similarly invested in favour of the surviving benefactor contained this direction—"And I direct my said trustees, in paying the foresaid annuities, to provide as far as possible that the annuities shall be payable to the said annuitants exclusive of the jus mariti of administration and all other rights and interests which the any of them may have married or may marry might have by the law of any other country, so that the same may be payable to them on their own simple receipt without the consent of their said trustees were also directed to deliver to the respective annuitants

 the sum of annuity on obtaining a full discharge of their intromissions

After the testator's death the trustees, as directed, proceeded to realise the residue and to invest it in annuities in favour of the beneficiaries, all of whom survived. They purchased the annuities from the insurance company when they came to inquire as to procuring Government annuities. They found that they could not get annuities for the Misses who resided abroad, and certain special requirements were made for the Misses Dick, with which it was inconvenient for them to comply.
 In the circumstances all the annuitants requested the trustees, instead of purchasing the Government annuities, to pay over to them the residual shares of residue directed to be so invested.

A case setting forth the above facts was presented to the Court

No. 71. —the annuitants being the first parties thereto, and the trustees second parties.

Jan. 31, 1877.
Dow v.
Kilgour's
Trustees.

The question was as follows:—"Are the first parties entitled to demand payment of the respective portions of the said remaining third of said residue which were directed to be invested in the purchase of Government annuities for their behoof irrespective of the possibility of obtaining such annuities?"

Argued for the annuitants;—It was a recognised rule in the law of England that the law will not compel that to be done which can be done immediately afterwards.¹ This rule had been adopted in the law of Scotland, and there were numerous decisions giving effect to it.² In the view, as it was impossible to purchase the Government annuities for Misses Dow, owing to their residing abroad, they were entitled to the payment of their shares in money.

Argued for the trustees;—The rule of law in England was not different, but no Scotch case had ever gone the full length of it. The case for the annuitants had all proceeded upon specialties. It was clear that if the annuities had been declared alimentary the annuitants could have defeated the trustor's directions.³

LORD GIFFORD.—In this case the whole beneficiaries for whose behoof the residue of the estate is directed to be invested are before us. They are all of full age and sui juris, and none of them is placed under any restraint or disability by the terms of the testator's deed, excepting, if this be really a condition, that the jus mariti of the husbands of females is excluded. The intention in the deed is that the money should be invested in annuities in favour of residuary legatees. The money was to be sunk in Government annuities, and annuities to be purchased from two insurance companies named in the deed. The annuities were to be taken to each set of annuitants, the whole to be taken to the survivor of each set, with the exception of the last annuity provided which was to one person alone. It was also provided that they were to be so far as possible exclusive of the jus mariti of any husbands the beneficiaries might subsequently marry.

I suppose that this last condition could only be carried out by the trustees taking the annuities with a clause inserted in the bonds of annuity bearing that the annuity should be payable to the annuitant alone, exclusive of the husband of her present or future husband.

The question is, are the trustees entitled or bound to invest the trust money in these annuities in spite of the wish of the beneficiaries, who prefer to have the money paid direct to themselves, and some difficulties having arisen in the purchase of annuities in the exact terms of the trust-deed? Now, I take it, on the authority of the cases of Tod, Kippen, and Gordon, and of other cases both here and in England, that wherever a beneficiary totally unfettered by the trust and what the trustees have done, or what the trustees are directed to do, No. 71.

¹ Jarman on Wills, i., 367; White and Tudor's Leading Cases (4th ed. v. M'Guire), ii., 288; Power v. Hayne, May 28, 1869, L. R. 8 Eq. 201; Weston v. Walker, Aug. 15, 1831, 2 Rus. & Mylne, 197; Ford v. B. 8, 1853, 17 Beav. 303; Stokes v. Cheek, July 2, 1860, 28 Beav. 62.

² Tod v. Tod's Trustees, March 18, 1871, 9 Macph. 728, 43 Scot. Jur. 134; Kippen v. Kippen's Trustees, Nov. 24, 1871, 10 Macph. 134, 44 Scot. Jur. 134; Gordon v. Gordon, March 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 501, 38 Scot. Jur. 231; v. Scott's Trustees, July 18, 1872, 10 Macph. 982, 44 Scot. Jur. 556; Gray's Trustees, Jan. 1877, ante, p. 378.

³ Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 507.

 wherever there is no limitation of the beneficiary's right, and no restraint upon the beneficiary, but only a direction to trustees, the Court will Jan. 31, 1877.
 insist upon the trustees carrying out the direction, for the only result of Dow v.
 would be to put the beneficiary to the expense, trouble, and inconvenience Kilgour's of going in a circuitous way, and entirely at his own pleasure, what the Trustees.
 trustees had fruitlessly done.

Of course there are cases where the bequest may have been made alimentary, restricted for the sole and continuous aliment of the legatee, or the annuity is declared to be not assignable by the beneficiary, and not capable or to be alienated by him, and such cases are to be distinguished from a case this. Where a beneficiary is placed under fetters, either for his own benefit that of his wife or children, or of third parties or substitutes, such restrictions would have to be inserted in the bonds, and the legatee would be not an absolute but only a limited fiar. Here there is no such provision, and the legatee has no power in any way to tie up or fetter the annuitants in their disposal or otherwise. It was practically admitted at the bar that if annuities were once bought from Government or from the insurance offices terms of the deed any set of the beneficiaries could sell or assign them to their own pleasure.

Inclusion of the jus mariti of the husbands of the annuitants is not really a restraint on the annuitants; it is the very reverse, it is a restraint only on the husband and makes the annuitant's right larger and more absolute than it otherwise have been. I think, then, that we should in this case affirm the principle, the broad and general principle, which has been already recognised in England, and which is the law of England, and answer the question in the affirmative.

MR. CROMBIE.—I am of the same opinion. If the fund or estate in dispute had been declared to be strictly alimentary, or if there had been an express declaration of the right of the annuitants to assign, the question we have to decide would have been materially different from what it is, because, on either assumptions the beneficiaries might not have been in a position to realise their annuities after they had been constituted in their favour. In this case, as it stands, the annuities, for anything I see, might, after being constituted, be sold, and the proceeds disposed of as the annuitants might think proper. But it is an established principle that what can be instantly undone can be done at all.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur, and have nothing to add except this, that it will be clearly understood that we have decided this case on the principle, and on no specialty. The ground on which we proceed is that as in England as well as here, that an act which, if done, can be at once done by the person having interest, will not be directed by the Court to be done.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the first parties are entitled to demand payment of the respective portions of the remaining third part of the residue which was directed to be invested in the purchase of Government annuities for their benefit, irrespective of the possibility of obtaining such annuities."

MR. DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—FYFE, MILLER, FYFE, & IRELAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 72.

JOHN HOLMAN AND OTHERS (Owners of the Steamship "Gertrude," Pursuers.—*Guthrie Smith—Keir.*Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Harbour Trustees.THE IRVINE HARBOUR TRUSTEES, Defenders.—Trayner—Mackintosh.Harbour—Obligations of Harbour Trustees—Pilot—Master and S.

When harbour trustees, who are appointed "a pilotage authority" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, do not license pilots under powers conferred on them by Part V. of that Act, but employ unlicensed pilots at stated wages to pilot vessels into their harbour, and themselves receive pilotage dues, and apply them to harbour purposes, they are liable for the loss of the pilots so employed by them.

Reparation—Negligence—Ship—Harbour Trustees—Pilot—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, Part V., Pilotage Regulation.—The I. harbour trustees, by their statute of incorporation (36 and 37 Vict. c. cxxiv.), vested with the management of I. and its whole works and pertinents, and entrusted with its management for the benefit of the public. By sec. 32 of this Act they were authorised to levy certain rates, and, inter alia, "rates for pilotage." These "rates for pilotage" were leviable on all vessels entering and leaving the harbour, whether pilot was employed or not, and were applied under sec. 42, along with the rates levied, as a general fund for harbour purposes. By sec. 47 the trustees were appointed "a pilotage authority" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The trustees, however, did not, under Part V. of that Act (secs. 330-388), license any pilots to act within the limits of their jurisdiction, but instead they employed certain men termed "hobblers" at weekly wages, whose duty it was to act under their harbour-master in berthing and moving ships about the harbour, and in other harbour work, and to pilot ships out of the harbour when required. By "Mariners' Notice as to I. Harbour" the trustees advertised that "pilots are in attendance at tide-time night and day."

The s.s. "Gertrude," while entering the harbour, was injured through the negligence of J. M., one of the "hobblers" in the trustees' employment, under a charge as pilot she was at the time.

Held that the trustees were liable for the damage, in respect that J. M. was not acting as a licensed or authorised pilot in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, but merely as the servant of the trustees, paid by the trustees, acting within the limits of their harbour, in discharging a duty which the trustees undertaken to perform.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
R.

THIS was an action raised by John Holman and others, pursuers, against the Irvine Harbour Trustees, defenders, to recover damages for injury to the s.s. "Gertrude," of which the pursuers were owners, while in the harbour of Irvine on 10th September 1875, through the negligence of Jeremiah M'Gill, the pilot sent out by the defenders to bring the vessel into the harbour.

It was admitted that the vessel, in being brought into the harbour, was struck against the base of the perch which marked the entrance to the harbour, and received the injury complained of, through the negligence of M'Gill.

M'Gill was not a licensed or qualified pilot in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. He was what is known as a "hobbler" employed by the defenders at weekly wages. He was under the direction of the defenders' harbour-master, and his duties were principally connected with the berthing of ships and the moving them about within the harbour. The defenders had not licensed any pilots to act at the entrance of Irvine, and M'Gill and other "hobblers" were employed in bringing ships into the harbour when required.

It was not compulsory upon ships entering the harbour of Irvine to accept the services of a pilot; but the defenders were entitled to charge, pilotage dues on all ships entering the harbour, whether required a pilot or not. These dues were paid directly to the deand formed part of their general funds, out of which they paid cesses of the "hobblers" employed by them, and kept up the neceslights, &c.

No. 72.
 Feb. 1, 1877.
 Holman, &c.
 v. Irvine Harbour Trustees.

Defenders stated in their "Mariners' Notice as to Irvine Harbour," June 1875 (a copy of which the master of the "Gertrude" had ob-before sailing for the port),—"A powerful paddle tug and pilots are at hand at tide time, night and day, and every facility is given for loading and discharging of cargoes."

Master of the "Gertrude," being a stranger to the harbour, waited till a pilot-boat came off to him, and, on M'Gill coming on board, the vessel under his charge.

Defenders were appointed under the Irvine Harbour Act, 1873 (36 Vict. c. cxxiv.) Under that Act (sec. 47) they were constituted pilotage authority and local authority within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and the Acts amending the same, with powers conferred by those Acts on pilotage authorities and on authorities.* And they were entitled (sec. 32) to "demand and Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), provided:—

"Pilotage authority" shall include all bodies and personalities to appoint or license pilots, or to fix or alter rates of pilotage, or exercise any jurisdiction in respect of pilotage.

"Conduct" shall mean any person not belonging to a ship who has the conduct

"Licensed pilot" shall mean any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong."

"Subject to the provisions contained in the fifth part of this Act, it shall be lawful for every pilotage authority, by bye-law made with the consent of His Majesty in Council, from time to time to do all or any of the following things within its districts; (that is to say)

To determine the qualification to be required from persons applying to be licensed as pilots, whether in respect of their age, skill, term of service, character, or otherwise.

To make regulations for the government of the pilots licensed by them, and to ensure their good conduct, and their constant attendance to and effective performance of their duty, either at sea or on shore.

To fix the terms and conditions of granting licenses to pilots,

To make regulations for punishing any breach of such regulations as aforesaid by such pilots by the withdrawal or suspension of licenses or by the infliction of penalties to be recoverable by before two Justices," &c.

To fix the rates and prices or other remuneration to be demanded and paid for the time being by pilots licensed by such authority, or to alter the mode of remunerating such pilots, in such manner as such authority may, with consent as aforesaid, think fit," &c.

To repeal or alter any bye-law made in exercise of the above powers, and to make a new bye-law or bye-laws in lieu thereof.

Every bye-law duly made by any pilotage authority in exercise of the powers hereby given to it shall be valid and effectual, notwithstanding any Act in that behalf made, or any rule, law, or custom to the contrary."

"Every pilotage authority shall deliver periodically to the Board of Trade in such form and at such times as such board requires, returns of the following particulars with regard to pilotage within the port or district under the jurisdiction of such authority; (that is to say)

All bye-laws, regulations, orders, or ordinances relating to pilots or pilotage for the time being in force.

The names and ages of all pilots or apprentices licensed or authorised to

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

receive for and in respect of vessels entering within or leaving the lin of the harbour, or using the works in or connected with the harbour any of them, any sum not exceeding the several rates specified in schedule (A) to this Act annexed."

Schedule (A) contained, inter alia,—"Rates for pilotage. For vessels entering or leaving the harbour, per registered ton, twopence."

By section 42 the trustees were empowered to apply the rates la generally in the maintenance, repair, management, and improvement the harbour.

Although they had not licensed any pilots in the sense of the Merc Shipping Act, 1854, the defenders, in their annual returns for 1875, suant to the 18th section of the Pilotage Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vi 129), entered M'Gill and the other "hobblers" in their employas "pilots," "licensed or authorised" by them.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers having sustained los damage through the fault of the defenders and their servant, in ca the vessel to come into collision with rocks or stones on entering the bour, are entitled to decree for the sums specified in the said accou concluded for.

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) The said Jeremiah M'Gill being a qualified pilot, the defenders are not liable. (3) The services of the Jeremiah M'Gill having been accepted by the pursuers at their own and without any responsibility on the part of the defenders, the de are not liable.

The Lord Ordinary, on 15th November 1876, pronounced this locutor :—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove facts and d stances inferring liability against the defenders for the sum sued any part thereof : Assoillizes the defenders from the conclusions c action, and decerns : Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

act by such authority, and of all pilots or apprentices acting either medi immediately under such authority, whether so licensed or authorised or n

"(3) The service for which such pilot or apprentice is licensed.

"(4) The rates of pilotage for the time being in force, &c.

"(5) The total amount received for pilotage, &c.

"(6) The receipt and expenditure of all moneys received by or on b such authority in respect of pilots or pilotage."

Sec. 349. "Every qualified pilot, on his appointment, shall receive a containing his name and usual place of abode, together with a descriptive person, and a specification of the limits within which he is qualified to ac

Sec. 351. "Every qualified pilot, while acting in that capacity, shall vided with his license, and produce the same to every person by whom employed, or to whom he tenders his services as pilot ; and if he refus so at the request of such person, he shall incur for each offence," &c.

* "NOTE.— It is not alleged on record that M'Gill, the who was sent by the harbour-master to bring the vessel in, was unfit f duty ; and in the absence of such an averment it would be an injustice defenders to take such a fact as proved. The evidence, however, on the is sufficient to shew that M'Gill possessed the requisite knowledge and rience to fit him for the duty. The piloting of vessels over the bar t places in the harbour is not attended with any difficulty to one acquainte the harbour and the rules of seamanship. M'Gill, who was born in Irvi sailed out of that port for a number of years. At a later time of his life acted as a pilot for seven years at the port of Ardrossan, and he had b gaged piloting vessels out and into the harbour of Irvine, with full tunities of seeing its condition and peculiarities at all times of the tide fo two months before the accident in question took place.

"The result is that the injury to the vessel was caused by the fault of and that the defenders, the harbour trustees, were not in fault. But the

the pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders were liable for the t of M'Gill, their servant. There was no compulsory pilotage at the

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

tion which remains is, whether the defenders, the harbour trustees, are onable for the fault of M'Gill the pilot? That question seems to depend his other question, whether, when the captain accepted the services of ill, who was sent out by the harbour-master, as representing the defenders, ring the vessel in, the defenders undertook and contracted to bring the d in safely, or only undertook to give the services of one whom they be- d to be duly qualified for the duty. I am of opinion that the defenders ot undertake responsibility for any fault which M'Gill, whom they believed a duly qualified pilot, might commit.

In support of the view of the defenders' liability, on which the action is del, the pursuers rely on the fact that the defenders are proprietors of the sur. M'Gill was their servant, paid by weekly wages, and dismissible at ure, and engaged, not only to perform the duty of piloting vessels from the of the river in the bay of Irvine into the harbour, but of moving vessels a place to place in the harbour, taking soundings in the river, and perform- much other duties in relation to the navigation as the harbour-master might ure. It is proved that the relation of master and servant existed between ill and the defenders, and the pursuers maintain that the defenders under- the safe pilotage of the vessel, performing the duty by their servant, and they are, therefore, responsible for his fault.

are, however, of opinion that, notwithstanding the relation which subsisted on M'Gill and the defenders, the latter are not responsible for his fault, not in providing pilotage for vessels resorting to the harbour, the defenders undertake more than that due and reasonable care shall be taken in the ment of the persons who shall perform the duty of pilots. The defenders and at the proof the local Act, 7 Geo. IV. c. 107 (1826), and two provi- l orders, dated in 1867 and 1870, and it appears that under the first of orders the defenders became 'a pilotage authority' for the harbour under Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. It is unnecessary to consider the effect documents, for by the Irvine Harbour Act, 1873, section 7, the local ad the orders of 1867 and 1870 were repealed in so far as related to the ur of Irvine, and a new series of statutory provisions was then enacted. in Act of 1873 the provost, magistrates, and town-council of the burgh of y the convener of trades, and a certain number of owners of vessels be- g to the harbour, and of traders at the harbour, were incorporated as the Harbour Trustees. By section 17 the limits of the harbour were defined the beds or channels of the rivers Irvine and Garnock, in and through our, and from the harbour to the bay of Irvine' and the foreshore on the harbour and works are situated. The statute authorises a variety of to be executed by way of improving the harbour, and section 42 provides e trustees shall apply the money received from the rates levied under the ally in the maintenance, repair, management, and improvement of the : The 32d section of the statute gives the trustees right to the rates l in the schedule annexed to the Act on all vessels 'entering within or the limits of the harbour,' and amongst the rates specified in the e is the following:—'Rates for pilotage: For all vessels entering or leav- harbour, per registered ton, 2d.' Section 47 is in the following terms:— trustees shall be a pilotage authority within the meaning of "The Mer- shipping Act, 1854," and the Acts amending the same, and shall have all ens conferred by those Acts on pilotage authorities and on local authorities.' on these provisions it appears that the defenders are entitled to charge els entering or leaving the harbour a rate 'for pilotage,' and this of itself, least taken in connection with the clause providing that the defenders e a pilotage authority, it may be assumed imposes on them the obligation ing some provision for the pilotage of vessels entering and leaving the r. Such a duty and obligation seems to be a necessary consequence of istence of a harbour to which access is obtained by a navigable river

No. 72. harbour of Irvine, but the defenders, by their notice to mariners, invite the public to rely upon the pilots supplied by them. As a pilot

Feb. 1, 1877.

Holman, &c.

v. Irvine Harbour Trustees.

channel, and certainly of the existence of a bar harbour in which the band liable to shift with the effect of altering the channel more or less from time to time. Harbour trustees have generally the duty of making provision for pilotage, and are usually authorised to levy rates in return for the pilotage. The owners of vessels, on the other hand, have the important advantage of local knowledge of the peculiarities of the harbour, possessed by persons employed in the peculiar service of pilots at that place. In the present case Captain Hall has stated that he would not have himself ventured to take the vessel into port, particularly as he knew Irvine was a bar harbour, and probably if he had taken this duty upon himself his employers would have forfeited any claim to indemnity under any insurance effected on their behalf. See authorities cited by Mr Kay in his work on Shipmasters and Seamen, vol. 2, p. 756.

"In the port of Irvine there is no compulsory pilotage. In practice vessels frequently enter and leave the port without taking the services of a pilot, and vessels which hail from the port, or frequently resort to it, and the captains of which are familiarly acquainted with the harbour, are probably better served by the hands of their own commanders than in those of the pilots appointed by the harbour trustees. Vessels are liable to pilotage dues, and pay such dues accordingly, whether they take the services of a pilot or not; but any vessel desiring such services is entitled to have them.

"The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 recognise the existence of two classes of pilots,—'Pilot' meaning 'any person not belonging to the port who has the conduct thereof,' and 'qualified pilot,' 'any person duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong.' Section 333 contains provisions giving full power to pilotage authorities to determine the qualifications of pilots, and grant them licenses, to make regulations for the conduct of pilots, and for ensuring their attendance and the performance of duty either at sea or on shore, to fix the remuneration to be received by pilots, to arrange the limits of their districts, to make regulations for the approval and licensing of pilot-boats, and ships, and otherwise to regulate the pilotage authority (section 337) also provides that every pilotage authority shall periodically to the Board of Trade, to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, returns embracing a number of particulars shewing the regulations relating to pilots, or pilotage in force in each district; 'the names and ages of all the pilots or apprentices licensed or authorised to act by such authority, and of all other persons or apprentices acting either mediately or immediately under such authority, whether so licensed or authorised or not, the rates of pilotage for the district in force, with the total amount received for pilotage, and receipt and expenditure of all monies received by or on behalf of such authority in respect of pilotage.' This section of the statute obviously contemplates the case, which is probably not an uncommon one, at least in the coast harbours of Scotland, of pilots acting under the pilotage authority although not holding a formal license. The clauses of the statute (365-6-7) relating to the offences of pilots and the penalties to which they are to be subject under the statute also recognise the existence of licensed pilots as distinguished from pilots acting without a license.

"From the provisions of the statute of 1854 thus noticed, in connection with the enactment contained in the Irvine Harbour Act of 1873, it appears that the defenders were entitled to license pilots, who should be subject to such regulations as they might think fit, and whose remuneration they were to fix. If the defenders, in the performance of their duties under the Act, had adopted this system, and become practically a licensing board only, like the Trinity House of Leith, or the Elder Brethren in England, it is maintained that they would have been liable for the fault of the pilot or pilots, at least it is not maintained there would have been no liability if the defenders had not gained benefit by the pilotage dues. In the case of a licensing authority, which is substantially a licensing board only, it seems clear authority they might have licensed pilots, who would then have been No. 72.

 lic officers, for whose acts the defenders would not have been liable.

Feb. 1, 1877.
 Holman, &c.
 v. Irvine Har-
 bour Trustees.

responsibility for the fault of the pilot would attach to the board. In this case the defenders did not license the pilots at the port so as to make them 'qualified' pilots under the statute, but merely appointed them to the duty. It appears to me to be a reasonable extension of the general principle to the present case, in these circumstances, that there is no such responsibility on the defenders which the pursuers seek to enforce.

Under the statute, the defenders being bound to provide pilotage for those who desire it, may either license persons or simply appoint them to do the duty. If the defenders found it necessary, in order to provide competent pilots for the service they might no doubt pay away all the pilotage dues directly, or, it may be, give the pilots right to receive the dues directly; but they do not find it necessary to expend the whole pilotage dues on that account, then their statute provides that the dues received shall be applied for general harbour purposes. The form of the appointment of pilots, or the mode of their remuneration, does not appear to me to affect the legal responsibility of the board for the pilots' acts; nor do I think the circumstance that the remuneration is given by the board out of the pilotage dues, in periodical instalments, instead of being in the form of direct payments from the shipowner, makes any difference. In all of these cases alike it appears to me that the legal obligation which lies upon the body of trustees, acting as a pilotage board, towards the owners and traders resorting to the port, is to take reasonable care to provide men whom they believe to be fitted for the duty of the office. There is certainly no express contract to do anything more, and I do not think that the relation between the parties creates a legal power with higher obligations. It is true that in one sense pilots, employed as those in Irvine, are servants of the trustees, under their orders, and liable to be dismissed by them. But these pilots are there truly in the performance of the public service, in the same way as duly licensed pilots are, and in each case in which they act for the time the servants of the owner or trader of the vessel under charge. The service cannot, I think, be regarded as one which the trustees themselves perform by their servant or deputy. It would be a very serious responsibility that harbour trustees, by the appointment of pilots for the public service, should be held absolutely to undertake the safe pilotage of vessels within their district, becoming responsible for the faults of the pilots appointed, and no example of such responsibility can be cited by the pursuers. In the present case, no doubt, the defenders might have formally issued orders to the three pilots who are required for the work of the harbour, and their responsibility is, that if they did so, men of better capacity for the office, and probably with somewhat better remuneration, would be selected, to the benefit of the public. It is difficult, however, to see how the defenders, in practice, have adopted any other system of remuneration. It would probably yield but small returns to give them the dues, or a large portion of the dues due for each vessel which they brought in or took out of the harbour, for the vessels prefer to dispense with the pilot altogether. The only practical mode of payment appears to be that adopted by the defenders, and which would most probably act upon whether they licensed pilots or not, viz., to pay them so much a-week or month for their services. If the defenders paid the whole pilotage dues in this way it would be extremely difficult for the pursuers to maintain the argument that the defenders incurred liability for the faults of the pilots. In that case, though no doubt to some effect the legal relation of master and servant would subsist, yet in substance the pilots would, I think, be truly the servants of the public, and the defenders merely intervene to form for the benefit of the public resorting to the harbour the duties of licensing the pilots, and regulating their conduct and remuneration. It does not, in my opinion, make a difference in this case, that the pilots do not receive the whole pilotage dues. It may fairly be assumed that under the general head of pilotage the ship is paying for something more than mere pilotage, including

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

But instead of licensing pilots they chose to employ their own servants to discharge the duty of pilotage, which they held themselves out as prepared to perform. They were in no different position from any statutory body of trustees performing a work imposed upon or assigned by them by the hands of their servant, and accordingly the ordinary liability for their servant's act attached to them.¹

maintenance of pilot boats; as, for example, such items as are mentioned in return, No. 81 of process, of lights, and expenses in sounding the channel bell like. In that view, the proper charge for the services of the pilot was paid by the owner or trader to the port, but, for the sake of convenience, by the hands of the trustees. In any view, however, I think the owner or trader, getting the benefit of a pilot's service, is for the time his employer, and not the employer of the trustees; that the pilot, and not the trustees, undertake the duty of bringing in the vessel to the harbour; that the trustees are the persons by means of whom the remuneration is given by the owner or trader to the pilot, the balance of the pilotage dues being, as authorised by Parliament, applied to harbour purposes. If this be the substance of the arrangement between the trustees and those who resort to the harbour, or the nature of the obligation which the law imposes on the harbour trustees, there is obviously no responsibility on the part of the trustees for the pilot's acts.

"The case of Ogilvie v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, 22d May 1821, 24, was mentioned in the course of the discussion. The report does not contain the opinions of the Judges, but the case appears, when fully examined, to be direct authority in support of the judgment I have pronounced. The papers were not referred to by the defenders, but an examination of them after this opinion was written has satisfied me that the judgment of the Court proceeded generally on the grounds to which I have given effect. The case appears to have been very elaborately argued in written papers, and must have been subject of anxious consideration by the Court, who obtained reports from various harbour authorities in the kingdom as to the practice in regard to pilotage. These reports are printed in the appendix to the pleadings. They did not to any extent turn on any fault on the part of the magistrates as trustees in not removing the sand-bank referred to in the report, but was based on the footing of the accident having occurred through the fault of the pilot. The only difference between that case and the present appears to be that the magistrates regularly licensed the pilots who were employed at the port. The pilots received two-thirds of the dues from the magistrates, the remaining third having been paid to the shore-master. He was referred to by the trustees as pilot-master, but it appears to be clear from the papers that it was in that limited capacity that he received a third of the dues. The case in the present instance appears to me to be scarcely distinguishable from the present, and the argument which received effect is very much based on the grounds on which the present judgment rests.

"It was pleaded on the part of the pursuers that the three persons in the position which M'Gill occupied were not to be regarded as pilots at all, but what is called 'hobblers,' whose proper duty was working in or about the harbour only. There is, I think, no room for this view on the evidence sufficient to observe that the persons referred to performed the duties of pilots between points specified in the statute as the limits of the harbour for pilotage dues were paid.

"In conclusion, I may say that if I had taken a different view of the degree of liability, and had held them responsible for the fault of M'Gill, I should have found the pursuers entitled to £240 in name of damages."

¹ Mersey Dock Trustees v. Gibbs, 1866, L. R., 1 E. and L. App. 93, 11 Q. B. 110; H. of L. Rep. 686; Virtue v. Police Commissioners of Alloa, Dec. 12, 1861, ante, vol. i. 285; Thomson and Others v. North Eastern Railway Co., Feb. 1, 1862, 31 L. J. Q. B. 194; Ogilvie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 22, 1821, 1 S. 24; Indermaur v. Dames, Feb. 6, 1867, L. R., 3 C. P. 311; Ruthers v. Sydebotham, 4 M. and S. 77; Att.-Gen. v. Case, 3 Price, 362; Sons on Shipping, vol. ii. p. 116, note.

Armed for the defenders ;—The real question was, not whether M'Gill was a licensed pilot, but whether he was fit for the duty imposed on him. His fitness was not denied. What a license did was to give a pilot the status of an independent contractor. For him the pilotage authority was in no way responsible. But if the defenders' acting, not as pilotage body, but simply as harbour trustees, chose to employ their own servants for pilotage purposes all that they were responsible for was that they should be fit persons to act as pilots, and this they might be quite well though unlicensed as if licensed. There was no absolute warranty by the defenders that vessels would be brought safely into their harbour. Negligence on the part of the defenders must be proved to infer liability.

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

MR. JUDICIAL—This is a case of importance and interest, and has evidently attracted the Lord Ordinary.

The ground upon which the defenders' liability is maintained is that the pursuers' steamship, the "Gertrude," was caused through the fault of their servant Jeremiah M'Gill, who acted as pilot on the occasion in allowing her to strike against some stones or other obstructions on the harbour. The defenders deny their liability, on the ground that they are in law responsible for the fault of M'Gill. It is not, however, disputed either that loss and damage to the amount claimed, have been caused by the pursuers, or that they were caused by the fault of M'Gill. The defenders' liability disputed on the ground that they are a corporation and that their corporate funds and estate cannot be applied to the compensation of the pursuers for the injury of which they complain. It is clear, that no such plea could now be maintained, having regard to the judgment of the House of Lords in the Mersey Dock Trustees v. Gibbs, L. R., 11 App. p. 93 ; and that of Virtue v. The Commissioners of Police of London, p. 285, in this Court ; as well as subsequent cases.

The pursuers, however, maintain that the defenders are liable to them, irrespective of the fault of M'Gill, in respect that contrary to their duty they allowed obstructions by which the ship was injured to exist in the harbour ; and have not been able to satisfy myself that the Lord Ordinary is wrong on this ground of liability not established I shall proceed at once to the more important ground of liability, and that which was chiefly relied on by the pursuers, viz., the liability of the defenders for the fault of their servant.

In reference to this part of the case it has to be observed that Captain James, the master of the pursuers' ship, says he saw at Glenarm, in Ireland, started from that place on the voyage to Irvine, the "Mariners' Notice of the Harbour," No. 62 of process, which, among other things, contains Greenock v. Greenock Harbour Trustees, Dec. 10, 1875, ante, vol. iii. 1194 ; St. Andrew and Others, 1875, L. R. 10 Q. B. 125 ; General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company, 1869, L. R. 4 ; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (2d ed.), sec. 81, a ; Story on Negligence (1851), sec. 456, a ; Maclachlan on Shipping (2d ed.), p. 267 ; Smith and St Catharines Dock Company, 1868, L. R. 3 C. P. 326 ; Stephen v. Police Commissioners, March 3, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 535 ; Hammond v. The Trustees of the Glasgow Harbour, 1830, 10 Barn. and Cress. 424.

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

the following announcement—"A powerful paddle-tug and pilots are in attendance at tide-time, night and day, and every facility is given for the loading and discharging of cargoes." The shipmaster was therefore entitled to rely on the tug and pilots, when he approached Irvine, a pilot sufficiently qualified to take the vessel safely into that harbour, and this, in his case, was indispensable, as he says he was himself unacquainted with the harbour, never having been there before. He accordingly waited in the offing for a pilot; and he then states that "A pilot-boat came out from the harbour with three men in it, one of whom was Jeremiah M'Gill, came on board the 'Gertrude.' I asked him if he was a pilot of the river Irvine. He said he was, and demanded the helm. This was my first voyage to Irvine, and I would not have attempted to enter the harbour without a pilot. I allowed him to take the helm. He took full command of the vessel. I stood by the telegraph to the engine and obeyed his orders. 'Gertrude' answered her helm very well."

But who was M'Gill, and who sent him out from Irvine to take command of the pursuers' ship? In regard to these questions there can be no doubt, from the record the pursuers say that M'Gill, "acting under the instructions of the employment of the defenders," came on board and took the command of the ship for the purpose of taking her into the harbour of Irvine; and the defenders explain in answer to that statement, that "the three men, including said Jeremiah M'Gill, were duly qualified pilots, and that they were allowed to act as pilots by them," and went out and boarded the "Gertrude." If M'Gill was a duly "qualified pilot," as thus stated by the defenders, it may be that they have plausible, if not sufficient, ground for maintaining that they are responsible for him; but if, on the contrary, it should appear that M'Gill was not a duly qualified or licensed pilot at all, but merely a servant of the defenders, working about the harbour, the question of their responsibility, as I apprehend, presents itself in a very different light. In regard, then, to this important matter, Alexander Muir, the defenders' engineer, says—"I knew M'Gill who was the pilot in charge of the 'Gertrude' at the time of the accident. I do not know what was his character or experience as a pilot." But William Wilson, the defenders' harbour-master, by whom M'Gill was engaged, furnishes more particular information regarding him. He says—after explaining that he had engaged him only shortly before the accident—"I did not make any examination of him. I gave him no special instructions except as to how to get in vessels safely. I did not give him any particular instructions as to how he was to do so." And he further explains that M'Gill and the other two who were sent out to the "Gertrude" on the occasion in question were paid a weekly wage of 21s. each out of the harbour trust funds. They were engaged in transporting vessels from one part of the harbour to another, in placing vessels, and in piloting vessels in and out. In the book of directions they are called pilots, but 'hobblers' is the proper name for them, as they do not generally go outside the bar. A 'hobbler' is a man who moors vessels and does not work in the open sea. These men are subject to my orders. They do no other general work for the harbour trust, except, perhaps, sounding the bell at the bar, and so on. (Q.) They make themselves generally useful subject to my orders? (A.) Yes. I engage and dismiss them and have the entire control over them." And in answer to the Lord Ordinary this witness concludes his evidence by saying—"The harbour trustees do not issue any license to them, they just employ them as their servants at weekly wages." And M'Gill

he "never held a license as pilot. When I went to Irvine I received no instructions from any one as to the navigation of the river. The only instruction I received were, that I was to obey the harbour-master in everything he said or done. Nothing was told me as to the line of safety between the porches and the channel. I saw no chart of the river." And he afterwards says he and his two comrades were called "hobblers," and that he was not aware of the stones or other obstructions in the harbour against which the "trade" struck.

The true character and position of M'Gill thus appear very clearly. That he was not a licensed pilot is indisputable. But to be a "duly qualified pilot," as represented by the defenders in the record, he required to be licensed; for a "duly qualified pilot" and a "licensed pilot" I hold to be the same thing. This is made sufficiently plain by the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 36 Vict. c. 104, under and in reference to which there is evidence that the defenders professed to regulate themselves in regard to the pilotage of Irvine, in connection with their own Harbour Act of 1873, the 36 and 37 Vict. c.

By section 32 of the latter Act the defenders are authorised to demand for the pilotage dues there referred to, consisting, amongst others, of a certain registered ton "for all vessels entering or leaving the harbour;" and section 47 it is enacted that the defenders "shall be a pilotage authority within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854." And that Part V. of the Merchant Shipping Act, besides conferring powers on pilotage authorities, contains a code of directions for the regulation and licensing of pilots. It is certainly not made clear that the defenders as a pilotage authority were bound, although they had the power, to license pilots; nor do I think that this is of much moment in relation to the question of the defenders' liability in the present case. Clear it is, however, that no examination of M'Gill by the defenders or any one else was made, or any license ever granted to him. How, then, could the defenders come upon them to say in the record that M'Gill was a "duly qualified"

In the debate sub-division 2 of section 337 of the Shipping Act was introduced as justifying this. By that section it is enacted that every pilotage authority shall make certain returns relating to the port or district within its jurisdiction, and amongst others the particulars specified in sub-division 2, viz., the names and ages of all pilots or apprentices licensed or authorised by such authority, and all pilots or apprentices acting either mediately or immediately under such authority, whether so licensed or authorised or not. The defenders, founding on the expression "licensed or authorised," said that they were entitled under the Act to "authorise" pilots, and that that was a different thing from licensing them. I cannot think so. It appears to me that to "license" and to "authorise" pilots mean the same and not different things. And, accordingly, the defenders could not point out in the record the provision whatever for authorising pilots separately and independently of licensing them. Nor could they say, and certainly the proof does not disprove, if any, authority or appointment, as pilots, M'Gill and his two obtained from the defenders; all they could say was, what their master stated when examined as a witness, that M'Gill was engaged, on any inquiry or examination as to his qualifications or experience, as a pilot, to do all work about the harbour, that his proper character was that of hobbler

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Harbour Trustees.

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.

Holman, &c.

v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

rather than pilot, and that the defenders just employed him and his two com-
"as their servants at weekly wages."

But if such is the true position of M'Gill—if the relation between him the defenders is that of master and servant—I must own my inability to un-stand how the usual consequences and responsibilities resulting from that tion should not in the present instance be held to follow. Not only was the defenders' servant, but he was acting and paid by them as such on the sion and at the time when, by his fault, the pursuers' ship was injured.
maxim qui facit per alium facit per se clearly therefore applies, and the M'Gill, the defenders' servant, must be held to be the defenders' own.

Nor do I think it can avail the defenders anything to say that they exact any pilotage or other dues from the pursuers for the services of for it is in evidence they were prepared to do so, and only abstained in quence of M'Gill's services being the reverse of beneficial. The de-harbour-master, Wilson, says that he instructed the clerk to delete the pilotage from the account which had been made out against the
"because the pursuers' vessel got damages by being brought in by the

But the defenders argued that there was no compulsory pilotage in conwith their harbour, and that the pilotage dues are payable whether the of a pilot are taken or not. This may be so, but of what avail it can defenders in the present case I fail to see. The pursuers desired pilot; the defenders sent out, not a licensed or duly qualified pilot, the pursuers were entitled to expect and were ready to pay for, but one own servants or hobblers working about the harbour on a wage of 21s.
and that man, acting under the defenders' authority and instructions, command of the pursuers' ship, and by his faulty guidance of her loss and damages now sued for.

It is in these circumstances, that, in my opinion, the defenders' lia-been made out. The defenders undertook to bring the pursuers' ship into the harbour of Irvine, but in place of doing so she was serious-through the fault of their servant acting under their instructions.
Ordinary has come to the conclusion that no liability has been estab-
the assumption that the defenders are in an equally favourable posi-M'Gill had been a duly qualified or licensed pilot. It is here I feel much deference, obliged to differ from the Lord Ordinary. A duly licensed pilot is a public officer who obtains his certificate only after examination of his qualifications by parties competent to judge of being licensed he occupies an independent position, very much as public or messenger-at-arms does. The public constitute his master, the servant of the public, like these and other public functionaries usual consequences and responsibilities arising from the ordinary master and servant do not arise. It was for this reason—a reason no application to the circumstances of the present case—that the pilotage authorities were assoilzied from liability in the case of Others v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh relied on so much by the nary. The action in that case appears to have been laid upon the that the pilot whose fault was there in question was appointed by the the Magistrates of Edinburgh, and it was not said that there was clarity or illegality in the appointment. But in sending M'Gill in case to take command of the pursuers' ship the defenders sent a man been licensed as a pilot at all, and who occupied merely the position of No. 72.

 of their servants working about the harbour; and in so sending that man defenders contravened their own bye-laws, and especially the first of that Feb. 1, 1877.
 of them titled "Regulations for pilots at the Harbour of Irvine," which Holman, &c.
 in these terms—"That no person shall act as a pilot for or on board of any v. Irvine Har-trading to or from the harbour of Irvine without being first duly licensed bour Trustees.
 by the harbour trustees, and that under a penalty not exceeding £5 sterling such offence besides all damages and expenses that may be incurred, and a pilot shall upon his appointment find caution for his good behaviour faithful discharge of his duties." But M'Gill had no license, and he never caution for his good behaviour and the faithful discharge of his duties.

MR GIFFORD.—This is a very important case, and attended with considerable difficulty. It involves in some of its aspects principles of wide application; it has an important bearing on the general responsibility of harbour trustees not only of the harbour of Irvine, but also of other harbours similarly situated.

After full and careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment cannot be sustained, but that the defenders, the Irvine Harbour Trustees, are liable in damages to the pursuers for the loss and expenses which the pursuers sustained through the fault or negligence of Jeremiah M'Gill, who piloted the pursuers' vessel into Irvine harbour on 10th September 1876. I think that the pursuers are entitled to recover damages for these expenses against the Irvine Harbour Trustees qua trustees, and against the public funds under their control. As to the amount of the damages, I am in agreement with the assessment and suggestion which the Lord Ordinary makes, and I would propose that the pursuers should obtain decree for that ground upon which I rest my opinion may be stated almost in a few words. I think, upon the evidence, and looking to the whole circumstances of the case, including the terms of the various statutes under which the trustees acted, that Jeremiah M'Gill, on the occasion in question, was not an independent pilot employed by the shipmaster or captain of the vessel, but was acting merely licensed or authorised by the defenders, but was acting simply as the servant of the defenders, employed by them alone, and acting within the limits of the defenders' harbour in performing a duty which the defenders themselves had undertaken to perform. If this be so, I can see no reason for departing from the general rule which holds the master who undertakes any piece of work liable for the fault or negligence of any servant or workman whom he directs to carry out the operations which the master has undertaken. In short, a person who undertakes to do a piece of work by means of a subordinate employed by him is liable for the negligence of the subordinate just as if he had been acting himself. It is doubt true that the Irvine Harbour Trustees are a public statutory corporation created and constituted by Act of Parliament, vested with the harbour of Irvine and its whole works and pertinents, and entrusted with its management for the benefit of the public. But it is now quite fixed that such a position does not exempt the statutory trustees from liability for damages occasioned by the negligence of the trustees' workmen, or of those whom they must employ in the management of the undertaking. The case is not

No. 72. different from what it would have been had the harbour belonged to a private individual, and been managed for his own private emolument, whether with or without statutory powers. It may be that in the case of public trustees the liability (where they do not bind themselves personally) will be limited to the funds under their control; but no question of this kind arises in the present case in which the defenders are only concluded against as trustees and not personally or individually.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Harbour Trustees.

The first material point to notice is the position of the defenders as harbour trustees under their statute of incorporation (36 and 37 Vict. cap. cxxiv.). Under this statute the defenders are vested with the harbour of Irvine, and the wharves, works, and property connected therewith, and the limits of the harbour are by sec. 17 defined to include the bed or channel of the river Irvine in and about the harbour and from the harbour to the bay of Irvine and the sea. The harbour of Irvine is in fact just a part of the river Irvine, and it is not material to notice that the accident which occurred did not occur in the river but in the open sea but in the river and within the limits which the statute defines as "the limits of the harbour."

Next, the defenders, the harbour trustees, are empowered by sec. 39 to demand and levy "for and in respect of vessels entering within or leaving the limits of the harbour," the various rates and duties not exceeding the rates specified in schedule A, and among these duties we find the entry,—"Pilotage.—For all vessels entering or leaving the harbour, per registered tonnage, two pence." Then, by sec. 42, it is enacted that "the trustees shall apply the money received by them from the rates authorised to be levied by them . . . for the following purposes," and then the statute proceeds to enumerate the general harbour expenses which all harbour trustees must necessarily incur, and, in particular, the "expense of the maintenance, repair, and improvement of the harbour and works connected therewith."

On these clauses I have to remark that it is only qua harbour trustees that the defenders are entitled to levy dues at all, and that no distinction is made either in the Act or in the schedule annexed thereto between the dues for "pilotage" and the dues leviable in respect of any other service or contribution, nor is any distinction made as to the application of such dues; the dues, including dues for pilotage, are to form one undivided fund, and are indiscriminately applied for general harbour expenses. This seems to be the plain provision of the statute, and it would require something very precise in the general or in the special Acts to place the different kinds of dues in different categories to constitute them separate and independent funds applicable respectively and exclusively to different purposes. In particular, there is no provision constituting the pilotage dues into a special fund applicable only to the payment of pilots or to strict pilotage purposes. It might have made a material difference in the case if the statute had provided or enacted that the pilotage dues should form a separate trust-fund applicable or held applicable to a special trust for the pilots alone who might be licensed for the harbour, and that this fund should not be applied to any other purpose. I can find no such provision, and I think that any attempt to do this, even if this had been done, if it was not, would have been unwarranted by the provisions of the statute.

As I read the Act, therefore, the harbour trustees themselves must provide pilotage within the limits of the harbour, that is, practically within the river for about a mile, just as they undertake to provide wharfage, &c.

and the other accommodation required by vessels discharging or taking in; and the dues, whether leviable on vessels or goods or for pilotage, form common and undivided fund, and are made indiscriminately applicable to general harbour purposes.

It, then, it is said the Irvine Harbour Trustees are specially appointed by 17 "a pilotage authority and local authority within the meaning of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' and the Acts amending the same, and it is said that they shall have all the powers conferred by those Acts on pilotage authorities and on local authorities," and the defenders maintain that it is solely pilotage authority and not as harbour trustees that they authorised Jeremiah M'Gill to act as pilot, that they paid him his wages out of the pilotage dues, and that they are no way responsible either for his skill or for his actings.

It is quite true that the defenders are by their Act appointed to be a pilotage authority and a local authority, although what is exactly meant by local authority has not been explained, unless it means that they shall be a local authority under the Merchant Shipping Act. The defenders, however, are not a pilotage authority under that Act. On turning to the duties of pilotage authorities I find that they discharge quasi judicial duties regarding the licensing and in reference to the employment of pilots. Section 331 of the Act gives the pilotage authority power to fix the qualifications of pilots, to make regulations as to licensing pilot-boats and pilots and apprentices, and to fix the prices or remuneration to be demanded by licensed pilots, and to make a variety of other regulations relating to pilotage, but all regulations and bye-laws must be submitted to the Board of Trade, and laid before Parliament.

In the present case it does not appear that the defenders qua pilotage authority have exercised any one of the statutory powers conferred upon them that is, as a pilotage authority. They have not made any regulations as to the qualifications of licensed pilots, either as to skill, age, or otherwise, nor have they instituted any examination of pilots whatever. They have not issued a single license or a single written authority to a single licensed or unlicensed pilot; in particular, Jeremiah M'Gill held no license, no written authority, and underwent no trial or examination of any kind as to his qualifications. The defenders qua pilotage authority have issued no bye-laws or regulations of any kind, and have not fixed in any way the rates of remuneration. By the words of the statute, licensed pilots are to be entitled to demand the rates of remuneration produced appear to have been enacted under the provisions of the general harbour Acts, and it has not been shewn that they were enacted by minute or otherwise, as bye-laws of the pilotage authority, and never been confirmed as such. But even if these bye-laws were to be confirmed as such, enacted by the pilotage authority and duly approved, the first law enacted would be that no person shall act as pilot without being first duly licensed and having taken due caution, and the general statute provides, sec. 349, "that every person who shall act as pilot, shall receive a license containing a variety of particulars, which license must be duly registered, and which license must be produced to every person to whom he tenders his services. Of course the license required by the statute must be in writing. In no way can it fulfil the statutory requisite. Mere verbal authority as equivalent to a license is out of the question. The defenders, supposing them to be pilotage authorities, never granted a license at all of any kind, and,

No. 72.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Holman, &c.
v. Irvine Har-
bour Trustees.

No. 72. on their own shewing, every time they employed M'Gill or any of their hobblers they contravened their own bye-laws.

Feb. 1, 1877. The truth is, that, although appointed a pilotage authority, the defendants have never really acted as such, except, apparently, in making certain returns which were called for by the Board of Trade. Whether these returns were properly made or could have been demanded by law, or how far they were accurate, we are not called on to determine. Plainly they are inaccurate in that respect, viz, in so far as they describe M'Gill and the other hobblers as licensed or authorised under the pilotage authority, when they held no such licence or authority. I may say also that if the pilotage dues are to be held as levied by the pilotage authority for behoof of the pilots I see no warrant for charging them any part of the general expenses of the harbour, such as quays, repairs, &c. The utmost that the pilots could be charged with would be the expense of pilot-boats and piloting apparatus. The rest of the pilotage dues would belong to the pilots themselves, and would in the words of the statute be demandable by them, subject to superannuation or widow's fund, if such a fund were established, and to the expense of management, but on this matter we are not called on to decide. In reference to the expression in the statute "licensed pilot," the distinction may perhaps refer to apprentices, apprentices mentioned as well as pilots in the same clause; but the broad distinction is established between "qualified pilot," which means a person duly licensed by any pilotage authority, and unqualified pilot, or pilot, which means a person licensed and not belonging to a ship, but who has the conduct thereof. I see no warrant in the statute for holding that the pilotage authority could grant two kinds of licenses, the one a license with the statutory requirements, the other a mere authority, the meaning and effect of which is nowhere defined. The words seem generally to be used as synonymous or explanatory of each other.

The defenders, as the pilotage authority of Irvine, never having licensed pilots, and never having granted any written licenses of any kind, the only remains to inquire, what was the position held and occupied by M'Gill and the other hobblers, as they are called, who were engaged in service with Irvine harbour.

Now, I have no difficulty in answering this question upon the evidence. It is proved that they were simply the servants of the harbour trustees, and that the harbour trustees at weekly wages of £1 each per week, for which wages they gave their whole time to the service of the harbour, under the direction of the trustees and their harbour-master. In particular, I think it is proved that Jeremiah M'Gill, in conducting the "Gertrude" into the harbour, was employed solely as the servant of the defenders, and that he must be held as such in the question between the pursuers and defenders. There was no contract between the pursuers and M'Gill as an independent pilot. M'Gill had no contract with the pursuers for pilotage fee or remuneration of any kind. The ship was taken into the harbour authorities alone, to whom they paid or incurred the pilotage dues in return for which the harbour trustees undertook to supply the pilot. If a licensed pilot might have offered his services, but within the limits of the defenders' harbour, in territory where the defenders alone were supreme, and which they might exclude all excepting their own servants and those of the ships they had received into their harbour. M'Gill and boats were sent to the pursuers' ship by the defenders or their harbour- No. 72.

 men, under whose entire and sole control the whole hobblerers were.

Difficult questions might arise if M'Gill, in the course of piloting the de- Feb. 1, 1877.
 fenders' ship, had by his fault or negligence occasioned injury to third parties, Holman, &c.
 for example, to other ships in the harbour, or to members of the public, and it is v. Irvine Harprobable that in a question with such third parties he might have been held bour Trustees.
 servant of the "Gertrude" or of her owners. No such question arises and it is enough for the decision of the present case that as in a question between the pursuers and defenders M'Gill was acting solely as the servant of harbour trustees.

In illustration of my ground of judgment, suppose that the "Gertrude," instead of being piloted into the harbour by M'Gill, had been towed into the harbour by the defenders' tug-steamer, and that the accident had occurred solely from the fault of the tug or of those in charge of her: In such a case I think the tug-steamer would be liable. The tug-steamer was the defenders' exclusive property, furnished and equipped by them, and under the control and charge of the servants of the harbour trustees. By the published table of dues the tug-steamer exacts so much for towage, and they apparently make this charge of vessels of the "Gertrude's" size whether the tug-steamer is required or not. I should entertain no doubt that the defenders are liable for the negligence of their tug-master whom they employ, and of whose skill and actions they alone are cognisant. On precisely the same grounds I think the defenders liable for the fault or blunder of Jeremiah M'Gill.

At the moment the conclusion is reached that Jeremiah M'Gill on the day in question was acting, not as an independent pilot selected and employed by the captain of the "Gertrude," but simply and solely as the servant of the harbour trustees, this is enough for the decision of the case, and upon this ground I think the defenders are liable for the proved damages.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the general views which your Lordships have expressed, and therefore shall not enter at any length into the question.
 There can be no doubt that the case is one having a very wide and important bearing, and all the more so if it is true, as we were told, that the practice of the Harbour Trustees is a common practice in the harbours round our coast. The moral which I should draw from this fact is, that while the pilotage authorities are conformed to, and the duties laid on pilotage authorities are performed they are not so in spirit. And if the result of our judgment should be to increase vigilance among pilotage authorities, and increased attention to their statutory duties, it will not be unproductive.

As regards the case itself, my observations will be confined to two points.
 I am of opinion that the Irvine Harbour Trustees undertook the duty of receiving this vessel into the harbour of Irvine, in consideration of certain payment to be made by the vessel using the harbour, which are directed by their statute to be applied for harbour purposes,—that is to say, the relation between this vessel the "Gertrude" and the harbour commissioners was a contract, under which the vessel was bound to pay pilotage dues, and the trustees in return undertook the safe pilotage of the vessel. Now, when the vessel enters into an onerous contract, whereby one agrees to pay and the other to perform, it is the duty of the latter to perform that for which the payment is made with care and skill, and if the duty be negligently performed by

No. 72. the party contracting or those employed by him, liability will attach to for the consequences.
 Feb. 1, 1877. Second, the harbour commissioners here did not perform their duty under Holman, &c. pilotage Acts in sending out a man to pilot the "Gertrude" who was a licensed
 v. Irvine Har- pilot. They sent only one of their own servants, who held no license, and bour Trustees. his fault they must be liable. No doubt, if the harbour commissioners had out a licensed pilot they would have done all that could have been required them, for it is certain that a pilotage authority, having duly licensed a pilot, not responsible for any fault he may commit. The licensing of a pilot is appointment of a public officer, and the supplying of a licensed pilot to a vessel is the due performance of the obligation under which the harbour commissioners lie.

It is not a sufficient performance of that obligation, first to neglect the of licensing pilots, and then to send out a man who, however qualified to be, is not in the position of a public officer.

As to the duty incumbent on the commissioners under the statute re pilotage regulations, and as to whether those made by the defenders are framed, I give no opinion. All I shall say on this point is that if the de have made regulations they have made no attempt whatever to act up to

Had they complied with their own regulations they would have duly pilots, and delegated the duty to no other; and so would have escaped present liability. I do not mean to say that if in case of emergency no licensed pilot to be had, and the defenders were to send out the best their disposal, that they might not be held to have done their best to immediate necessity. There is no such case here. They have failed in duty to license pilots, and having sent out one of their own servants, not the public character of pilot stamped on him by a statutory license defenders must be liable for their servant.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords, having counsel on the reclaiming note for John Holman and against Lord Shand's interlocutor of 15th November 1876
 the said interlocutor: Find the pursuers entitled to damages libelled, and assess the same at £240, with interest thereon the date of citation, and decern against the defenders for of the same, with expenses, and remit," &c.

T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 73. LADY RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND, First Party.—M' Laren
 Feb. 1, 1877. R. V. Campbell.
 Maitland v. SIR JAMES RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND, Second Party.—King
 Maitland. J. C. Lorimer.

Heir and Executor—Public Burdens.—The heir in possession of estates, the rents of which were postponed, died one day after the test Sunday. In a question between his executrix and the succeeding heir held that the executrix was not liable for burdens effecting to the after Whitsunday.

Heir and Executor—Drainage Money.—In a question between the executor of the proprietor of an entailed estate, held that money borrowed Acts of Parliament to be expended in drainage, and to be repaid ments, including both capital and interest, fell to be paid by the heir sion at the date when each instalment fell due.

Heir and Executor.—Held that an assessment imposed by consent of heritors 30th June, partly to meet debts incurred prior to Whitsunday, and partly to provide for the expenditure of the year following, could not be charged against the executor of a heritor who had died at Whitsunday.

No. 73.

Feb. 1, 1877.

Maitland v.
Maitland.2d DIVISION.
I.

ALEXANDER RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND of Cliftonhall and Barnton born 16th May 1876, survived by his widow, Lady Ramsay Gibson Maitland, and his son, Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland. The estates burdened with an annuity under the Aberdeen Act to Mrs Ramsay, the widow of a previous heir of entail, payable at Whitsunday and Martinmas. In addition, Sir Alexander burdened the two estates under the Aberdeen Act with annuities in favour of his widow, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday in advance.

The entailed estates were farther burdened with debt for drainage and improvements under statutes 12 and 13 Vict. cap. 100, and 27 and 28 Vict. cap. 114. Part of the principal and the interest so expended were paid by half-yearly instalments at various dates throughout the year, the first year's payment in each case commencing six months after the date of execution to the satisfaction of the commissioners under the Act.

Lady Maitland, as executrix of Sir Alexander, confirmed to the rents of the first half of crop 1876, some of which were payable under the Act at Martinmas 1876 and others at Candlemas 1877.

Parts of certain grass parks on the entailed estates, let in February 1876 at Martinmas 1876, were admitted to be divisible equally between the executrix and the heir, on the authority of the case of Swinton dec. June 20, 1809, F. C.

Lady Maitland made no claim for any apportionment of rents in respect of Sir Alexander surviving the term of Whitsunday by one day.

A question having arisen as to the liability of the executrix for certain public burdens and other payments a special case was presented to the Lord Ordinary Maitland being the first party and Sir James Ramsay Gibson Maitland the heir of entail, the second party thereto.

The executrix did not dispute her liability for public burdens effeiring the estates prior to Whitsunday 1876.

She maintained (art. 10) for her, that the liability of the executrix for annual or other burdens on the lands ceased as at Whitsunday 1876 and was limited to the burdens effeiring to the possession prior to that date—that on this view the executrix was not liable for any part of the interest on entail and improvement debt, heritable bonds, &c. for the year to Martinmas 1876, payable at that term;

annuities, half year's payments payable at Martinmas 1876;

rent-duty, half year to Martinmas 1876;

poor and school rates for the year from Whitsunday 1876 to Whitsunday 1877;

poor rates for same period; and (8) Cramond heritors' assessment amount £37, imposed by consent of the heritors 30th June, paid 30th June 1876. This assessment was imposed partly to meet debts incurred prior to Whitsunday 1876, and partly to provide for the expenditure of the year following 30th June 1876, in equal proportions.

She was liable only for such parts of rents, crop 1876, payable in March 1877;

drainage rent charges before mentioned for previous half years respectively at sundry dates between June and Martinmas 1876, and for previous half years ending respectively at sundry dates between Martinmas 1876 and June 1877;

poor labour conversion money for year 1876;

No. 73.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Maitland v.
Maitland.

(10) Land-tax for year from 25th March 1876 to 25th March 1877 payable 1st January 1877;

(11) Property tax, year from 5th April 1876 to 5th April 1877 payable 1st January 1877;

as effeired to the possession prior to Whitsunday 1876.

On the other hand (art. 11), it was maintained by the heir that the burdens in question were proper deductions from the rents falling to the executrix, and conventionally payable after the death of Sir Alexander Maitland, and that the executrix could only draw these rents on condition of discharging the burdens therefrom.¹

The following questions were submitted:—“(1) Is the liability of the first party, as executrix foresaid, limited to the burdens effeiring to the possession down to Whitsunday 1876? Or (2) Does the liability of the first party, as executrix foresaid, extend to all or to what part of the rents payable at or prior to the terms at which the rents falling to the executrix are conventionally payable? (3) How is each of the several classes of burdens herein above specified to be charged and apportioned as between the first and second parties hereto?”

On 23d January 1877 the following opinions were delivered on the question as to the annuities to Mrs Ramsay and Lady Maitland:—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think there can be much doubt upon the first point, as to whether the rents are to be charged with these annuities. Lady Maitland is entitled to an annuity of £3000 out of the entailed estate, by virtue of a provision in terms of the Aberdeen Act. The heir in possession, as the rents are postponed, and as Lady Maitland is entitled to them as executrix, she should pay her annuity out of them.

It seems to me that the effect of this contention would be merely to postpone the heir of a half year's annuity, and to make it fall upon Lady Maitland, who has a right to the rents on a different title altogether.

I am of opinion that the heir must pay this annuity. That is my impression upon the first point raised, but I should like to hear more upon the other points.

LORD ORMDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I think that it is an equitable principle that where the rents are postponed by mere conventional provisions in a lease, so that delay of payment is given to the tenant, who is allowed time for payment beyond the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas at which the rents would otherwise be due,—this is a mere matter of convenient arrangement between the landlord who gives the credit and his tenants who receive the prolonged credit. In a case of intestate succession, which is the simplest case to take, the death of the testator cannot affect in the slightest any questions between heir and executor. In the case of Sir Alexander Gibson Maitland's interest in the lands ceased as at Whitsunday 1876, or say—for there is no question as to the one day—at Whitsunday 1876, and the interest of his heir-at-law then began.

The legal terms are the true terms of payment, and the terms at which the right to the rents legally vests, and the conventional postponement of payment of the rents has nothing to do with the question. Such conven- No. 73.

¹ The heir relied on the following cases—Hard v. Anstruther, Nov. 1863, 1 Macph. 14, 35 Scot. Jur. 19, reported in the House of Lords under the name of Paul v. Anstruther, Feb. 15, 1864, 2 Macph. H. L. 1, 36 Scot. Jur. 323.

 postponement will not diminish the rights of the executrix and will not ^{Feb. 1, 1877.}
 the rights of the heir. The executrix takes, in the present case, the first Maitland v. year's rents for crop and year 1876, and the heir takes those for the second Maitland.
 year, that is, those which, apart from conventional postponement, would fall at Martinmas 1876. If there be burdens payable out of the first half year's the executrix must pay them, and the heir, who takes the second half rents must pay the burdens effeiring to them. The postponement of the of payment of the rents does not in any degree affect the division of the and cannot in any way affect the incidence of the burdens.

were further heard upon the other points on 24th January.

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are three classes of burdens, payment of which due since the death of Sir Alexander Maitland, the liability for which, the succeeding heir of entail and the executrix of the last heir, is the in this special case. These payments are substantially (1) those at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas; (2) those payable for and (3) payments falling due at irregular periods. The first class is important.

In this case I have been unable to find any point of difficulty. The question whether or not these burdens, all of which fell due after the death of the last possessor, should be paid out of the funds of the executrix. On the other side made in the case I can see no ground on which this can be maintained.
 The interest falling due on the heritable bonds at Martinmas 1876 for the year from Whitsunday 1876: It is stated in the case (1) that these are charged under the Montgomery Act for entailed improvements, and by bonds and dispositions in security for money borrowed. As to these, the possessor for the time being bound to keep down the accruing interest as the primary debtor in the interest falling due for the period of his possession. (2) It is stated that the last heir in possession kept down all the accruing during the period of his own possession, whence it follows that the succeeding is the proper debtor in the interest which fell due thereafter.
 That the rents in question were debts due by the tenants to the last possessor, and now belong to his executrix. It follows from all this that there can be no pretence for taking payment of a debt, due by the heir in possession, out of the funds of one who is not the debtor, and who has no connection with the debt; and on this simple ground I am of opinion that the executrix is not bound to bear the burden of this sum. The only ground on the opposite contention has been maintained is, that those rents, which were stated to belong to the executrix as in right of Sir Alexander Gibson and are payable at the same terms as the interests in question. No doubt that, as these were postponed rents, that is to say, the debtor of the debetor in possession had by the terms of his lease so much credit before he was to pay his debt. I cannot see what interest the succeeding heir of entail has in that matter. He is not the creditor of the tenant for this amount, and cannot affect him at what period his predecessor chose to exact his debt.
 He may have discharged the debt altogether, or assigned it during his life, or postponed the payment to any period he pleased. Having discharged during his life all the obligations incumbent on him in respect of this interest in the

No. 73.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Maitland v.
Maitland.

estate and its fruits, his rights in these rents vested in himself, and transferred to his executrix, free of any claim at the instance of the next heir of entail. The question whatever arises as regards the right to these rents, in consequence of their being payable at postponed terms, for the right of the executrix is not disputed, nor could it be, for the law on this head is clearly settled. The statements in the case are conclusive of the rights of heir and executrix in this respect.

The case of Paul v. Anstruther has no application to the point now in dispute. It related to a claim by an assignee of a prior heir of entail for repayment of two sums which he contended were proper debts of the succeeding heir. The House of Lords held that as regarded the first of these sums the cedent was the proper debtor in the debt so paid, because it came payable during his lifetime, which he clearly was. The claim as to the second was in regard to a proportion of a term's annuity corresponding to the proportion of rent which the assignee drew under the Apportionment Act, an entirely different question. Alexander Maitland had lived till August 1876, and the executrix had drawn under the Apportionment Act a quarter's rent—postponed or not postponed. She must have borne a corresponding proportion of the current burden of the estate, as the heir in possession was bound to keep down the interest for the period during which he or his representatives drew the rents, so, for the fractional part of the year, which, by the Apportionment Act, the representative was made entitled to draw the rents, the liability for the proportional amount of the burdens necessarily followed. This view solves the questions here put as to termly payments.

As to the stipend, the executrix drew one-half of the rents for crop 1876, and must pay half the stipend.

The instalments of the drainage money stand in a different position. They are not due at fixed periods, but become payable at certain intervals provided by the statute. I am of opinion that these, being payments for permanent improvements, are burdens on the heir in possession at the time when the instalments fall due. There is no question raised as to the instalment falling due in September, which Lady Maitland undertakes to pay. The subsequent instalments are burdens on the heir in possession.

The inconsiderable sum assessed for by the heritors after the death of Alexander must, I think, be borne by the heir in possession, seeing that he was himself a party to the laying on of the assessment. This only became due by the heir in possession when the assessment was imposed, and the payments, even although executed previously, were for the benefit of the property.

The other payments seem to divide equally between heir and executrix.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I think it unnecessary to go back upon what was said a few days ago, and I concur with your Lordship in your remarks on the points which have now to be disposed of, merely remarking that I place more weight upon the terms of the 66th section of the Drainage Act of 1864, which lays the burden expressly upon the heir of meeting the rent upon their becoming "payable during the continuance of his interest." I cannot, I think, be disputed that the interest of the heir here had ceased and was continuing at the dates when those rent charges in question were due and became payable.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur entirely in your Lordships' opinions. I opinion which I expressed at the former hearing of this case. It seems to me that the case for the heir proceeds upon the fallacy that the conventional postponement of the rents can have any effect either upon the right to the rents themselves or upon the incidence of the burdens. As the postponement of the rents does not enlarge the right of the subsequent heir, as it has no effect upon rents themselves, so it can have no effect upon the burdens. The burdens just as if the rents had been payable at the legal terms. With regard to the several small items, I think we should find that they fall to be divided in the manner contended for by the first party in article 10 of the deed. Some admissions have been made by the executrix conceding perhaps that the heir somewhat more than she was bound to do. But this is matter of dispute with which the Court will not interfere. We do not decide anywhere where the party herself concedes the point.

No. 73.
Feb. 1, 1877.
Maitland v.
Maitland.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords are of opinion, and find (1) That the liability of the first party as executrix is limited to the burdens effecting to the possession down to Whitsunday 1876. (2) That the liability of the first party as executrix did not extend to all or to any part of the burdens payable at or prior to the terms at which the rents falling to the executry are conventionally payable. (3) That each of the eleven classes of burdens specified in the case fall to be charged and apportioned as between the first and second parties thereto in the mode stated in article 10 of the special case, and decern."

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—Agents.

ELIZABETH STEWART, Pursuer.—Fraser—Strachan.
GEORGE BURNS, Defender.—R. V. Campbell.

No. 74.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Stewart v.
Burns.

Rei interventus—Locus poenitentiae.—Two persons having agreed for the purchase respectively of a licensed public-house belonging to one of them, a bargain was written out in duplicate by a third party, and the two were signed by the purchaser and seller, each of whom retained one. The seller afterwards gave the tenant of the house notice to quit, and the purchaser let it to a tenant of his own selection. The purchaser's tenant having in getting the license transferred to him, the purchaser repudiated the bargain before the term of entry. Held, in an action for implement at the instance of the seller, that sufficient rei interventus had followed to render the bargain binding, and that there was no locus poenitentiae for the purchaser.

Testing-clause—Subscription of Witnesses ex intervallo.—Duplicate copies of sale of heritable property were written out by a third party, and subscribed by the seller and purchaser in presence of other persons not specially called as witnesses.

The purchaser, four months afterwards, repudiated the bargain, and the seller then caused the persons who had been present to subscribe the missive of possession as instrumentary witnesses, and had a testing-clause added. Held, that the subscription of the witnesses and the testing-clause had been complied with, and that the missive was a probative writ.

ELIZABETH STEWART, owner of certain house property in Grassmarket, Edinburgh, brought an action against George Burns, horse-dealer, for implement of an alleged contract of sale entered into by him with her on 13th January 1876, by missives of sale executed by them, by which she averred he had offered, and she had accepted, the sum of £1000 for her house property. The subjects had been advertised in the "Edinburgh" newspaper of 13th January as follows:—"Grassmarket—House, &c. To be sold, by public roup, within Dowell's Rooms,

2d Division.
Ed. Craighill.
I.

No. 74. 18 George Street, at two o'clock afternoon, the licensed shop No. 1 G
 Feb. 1, 1877. market, as presently occupied by Mr Spence, with flat above," &c.
 Stewart v. The pursuer averred that Burns, at a meeting in the public-house Burns. her son, John Stewart, at No. 70 Canongate, had offered her £140 for the above subjects, and that she had accepted the offer, and then a missive in the following terms was written out by a man named Brechin in duplicate, and signed by them:—"Edinburgh, 13th January 1877.

 I, George Burns, hereby offer Mrs Elizabeth Stewart fourteen hundred pounds sterling for properties consisting of licensed shop No. 1 G market, Edinburgh, and the whole of the first floor above the same entered by No. 3 Grassmarket and also entering by the Vennel, all as presently owned by her, which offer is hereby accepted by the said Mrs Elizabeth Stewart. ELIZABETH STEWART. GEORGE BURNS." The pursuer produced her copy of this missive (No. 9 of process) with a testing-clause filled up as follows:—"In witness whereof these presents, written by George Brechin, painter, Lothian Street, Edinburgh, are subscribed said Mrs Elizabeth Stewart, Canongate, Edinburgh, and George Stewart, horse-dealer, Edinburgh, at Edinburgh, thirteenth January eight-hundred and seventy-six, before these witnesses, the said George Burns and John Bowles, farmer, Drumgaveline, County Down, Ireland, William Stewart, spirit-merchant, Belfast, declaring that the entry in the said George Burns shall be at Whitsunday next." Then followed the signatures of the witnesses. This testing-clause was crowded into the partly above and partly below the signatures of Mrs Stewart and

The pursuer further averred that the defender, after the date of the alleged purchase, proceeded to exercise rights as proprietor, and refused to warn Spence, the then tenant of the public-house, out of the premises, and himself let the whole subjects to a man Storrie, to be used by him as a public-house, and concurred in Storrie's application for transfer of the license for the premises, in which application Storrie was unsuccessful.

The defence stated for Burns was that he had purchased a house, and that when the transfer of the license was refused he was no longer bound to implement the bargain, it having been a condition of the bargain that the premises were to be licensed. There were also averments to the effect that the loss of the license was owing to the pursuer; and that the missive founded on had been improperly supplied with a testing-clause, the parties having had no intention that the testing-clause should be added, and the subscribing witnesses had not been called on or required to act as instrumentary witnesses.

A proof was allowed to both parties, from which the following appeared:—At the meeting in John Stewart's shop, 70 Canongate, 13th January, there were present the pursuer, John Bowles (her son), John Stewart and William Stewart (the pursuer's sons), and after some bargaining it was arranged that Burns should give £140 for the subjects. At this time George Brechin came in, and was required to put the bargain in writing, and accordingly wrote out two missives, Nos. 9 and 16 of process, which were signed by Mrs Stewart and Burns, and one was taken by each. Both of these missives were substantially stamped at the instance of the parties. A few days after this Burns went to Spence, the tenant of the public-house, 1 Grassmarket, and asked him to make an offer for a lease of the property. This he did and on 26th January Burns let the whole premises to Storrie at rent of £40. Thereafter, at the request of Burns, Spence and his tenant were given notice by Mrs Stewart's agent to leave the premises at Whitsunday. On 20th March Storrie applied for a renewal of the

No. 74.

he premises, and on 11th April, at the Licensing Court, this application was refused. An appeal was taken to the Quarter Sessions, and that was dismissed on 11th May. Immediately after the license was refused Burns' agent intimated to Mrs Stewart's agent verbally that Burns declined to go on with the purchase, and on 23d May Burns' agent wrote Mrs Stewart's agent repudiating the transaction on Burns' behalf. After notice of Burns' repudiation of the bargain Mrs Stewart, her husband, William Stewart, and Brechin, to sign her missive, No. 9 of process, as instrumentary witnesses, and the testing-clause was thereafter signed by Brechin.

At the Licensing Court, in April, Spence, the former tenant of this house, who had taken new premises opposite, applied for the renewal of his license to these new premises, and in support of his application produced an unsigned lease in his favour of his former house by Mrs Burns for six years, and a correspondence with reference thereto. Burns deposed that the magistrates granted Spence's application in preference to Storrie's on the ground that Spence had been ill-treated by Burns in not getting his lease of his old shop. Burns deposed that he was in entire ignorance that there had been any transaction between Mrs Stewart and Spence as to a lease until after the meeting on 13th January 1876 when he called upon Spence, who then said something about a lease. The pursuer pleaded;—(1) A valid and effectual contract of sale of the premises having been entered into between the pursuer and the defender by the foresaid minute or missive of sale executed by them the pursuer is bound to implement and fulfil his part thereof (2) Separate The contract of sale libelled having been followed by rei interventus the same was thereby rendered effectual and binding on the defender (3) The said subjects having been sold unconditionally, and with any warranty, express or implied, with reference to the license, the defender is not entitled to refuse to implement the contract on the ground of withdrawal of the said license.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The missives between the parties being in the defender's possession the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (2) The missives having been put out in duplicate, and delivered as completed documents in the possession of the defender's duplicate, the pursuer's subsequent additions to the duplicate, without the defender's knowledge or consent, are of no effect. (3) The proposed purchase being conditional, and the pursuer unable to transfer the premises as licensed premises, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (4) The license having been lost by special process for which the pursuer is responsible the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (5) The missives, in any event, implied warrandice that the pursuer knew of nothing, and had done nothing, likely to prevent a lease being obtained by the defender, or any tenant from him; and the warrandice not having been made good the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (6) The defender having been induced to enter into the said contract (first) by essential error caused by the pursuer, and (second) by the pursuer's fraudulent concealment of material circumstances, he is entitled to absolvitor.

On 11th November 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interdict:—“In the first place, and with reference to the first plea in law of the pursuer, and the relative counter pleas for the defender, finds as a matter of fact (1) that at a meeting between the pursuer and the defender on 13th January 1876 the defender agreed to purchase from the pursuer the premises which the pursuer agreed to sell to the defender, the premises in the market of Edinburgh which are described in the summons, and on the writing, No. 9 of process, as it was before the signatures of

Feb. 1, 1877.
Stewart v.
Burns.

No. 74.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Stewart v.
Burns.

witnesses were adhibited and a testing-clause was introduced, and writing, No. 16 of process, were subscribed by the pursuer and the defender; (2) that immediately after subscription the said writing, No. 9, was when signed by the parties, was delivered to and carried away by the pursuer, and the said writing, No. 16 of process, was delivered to and carried away by the defender, and both the pursuer and the defender understood and believed that by the signature and the delivery of the writings a contract for the sale and purchase of the said premises had been effectually concluded; (3) that as delivered and carried away neither the writing, No. 9 of process, nor the writing, No. 16 of process, was signed by witnesses or contained a testing-clause, and it was neither intended that either of these writings should be subscribed by witnesses, or that a testing-clause should be added, the signature of witnesses, as well as a testing-clause, being at the time considered by the pursuer and the defender to be unnecessary; (4) that George Brechin, John Bowles, and William Stewart, the three persons whose names appear on the said writing, No. 9 of process, as instrumentary witnesses, were present when the said agreement between the pursuer and the defender was concluded, and saw the said writings subscribed by the pursuer and by the defender, but none of them were specially called upon or required at the time when the said writings were signed by the parties to be a witness to their subscriptions; and (5) that the defender has subsequently repudiated the bargain, the said George Brechin, John Bowles, and William Stewart thereafter, that is to say, sometime in 1876, on the application of the pursuer, and without communication with the defender, signed as witnesses the said writing, No. 9 of process, which was the pursuer's duplicate, and the said George Brechin, by the body of the said writings had been written, wrote above the signatures of the pursuer and the defender the testing-clause which appears in that document: Finds as matters of law that the facts being as above set forth, there is nothing in the circumstances of the case which the validity of the said writing, No. 9 of process, produced and founded on by the pursuer as a probative writ, can be successfully impugned: In the second place, and separatim, with reference to the second plea in law for the pursuer, finds as matters of fact (1) that the said contract had been concluded as aforesaid the pursuer, at the request of the defender, warned the tenant of the shop No. 1 Grassmarket, which is the more valuable part of the premises in question, to remove therefrom at the then ensuing term of Whitsunday 1876; (2) that the defender granted a lease of the said shop to a new tenant for a period of years from said term, but this lease, with the consent of the pursuer, was renounced before said term of entry, in consequence of a refusal of transfer of the license for the shop having been refused by the Lord Ordinary; Court; and (3) that the said shop is now, and since Whitsunday 1876, has been, without a tenant or occupant: Finds as matter of law that the facts being as above set forth, locus penitentiae is excluded, even on the supposition that the said writing founded on by the pursuer is not entitled to be received in faith as a probative writ: In the third place, and with reference to the other pleas of parties, except the fifth plea, which, not being insisted on, has been already repelled, and the seventh, consideration of which has meantime delayed, finds as matters of fact (1) that the said contract was not entered into by the defender under essential error; (2) that the said shop, No. 1 Grassmarket, was a licensed shop at the date of the said contract; (3) that it was not a condition of said contract that the said shop then held by the tenant of said shop should be transferred to or retained by the defender, in favour of the defender, or the tenant of the defender; and (4)

did nothing to prevent, and at the time of the sale knew of nothing event, the transfer or renewal of said license : Finds as matter of fact, the facts being as above set forth, the grounds on which the said contract is impeached by the defender cannot be maintained : Therefore the defences, and finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the first intimation of the summons, reserving meantime judgment upon the subject of conclusion, in which decree for damages is sought in the event of the defender's failure to implement the said contract which has now become obligatory : Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses of process and incurred," &c.

No. 74.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Stewart v.
Burns.

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The pursuer had no right to produce the improbativ document with a testing-clause, nor was she entitled to get the persons who were accidentally present at the signing of the missive to adhibit their signatures after an interval of four months.¹ (2) No mandate to get the missive completed,² especially when it was one of duplicate documents.³ (2) No rei interventus had passed in the bargain. Anything that had been done had been merely in preparation for the execution of the contract. Burns never could have been in possession of the subjects, as the term had not arrived by the expiration of the bargain.⁴ To found a plea of rei interventus it was essential that there should have been part implement of the contract. Burns was entitled to break off the contract any day before the expiration of course to a claim for any damage caused.⁵ (3) Under the settlement and the missives the bargain was one for the purchase of a "leased house," and when the license was lost, owing to the fault of the pursuer, the bargain fell to the ground.⁷ The pursuer was bound to tell Burns how she stood with her tenant Spence, and to have cleared her quarrel with him, which was an essential fact in the case.⁸ (4) The plea for the pursuer ;—(1) Burns by signing the missive in the presence of witnesses put himself in such a position that the other party was bound to produce a probative document at any time, and he was not entitled to deny her having done so. It was quite competent to fill up the clause of a writ any time before the writ was produced in judgment.⁹ Even if the missive were not held to be probative, sufficient evidence had followed on the bargain to make it binding. The production of a ticket had been held to validate an improbativ conclusion, and here much more had followed. (3) The house was a licensed

¹ See 2, 27 ; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, pp. 15-6 ; Hamilton's Creditors, June 19, 1713, M. 16,734 ; Home v. Dickson, June 1730, 18.

² Strathmore v. Paul, July 30, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 189, Lord Brougham, Scot. Jur. 411 ; McNeillie v. Cowie, July 8, 1858, 20 D. 1229, 30 Scot.

³ 2, 20.

⁴ The London and England Insurance Company v. Wink, July 17, 1857, 19 D. Scot. Jur. 486.

⁵ See v. Steuart, June 25, 1844, 6 D. 1201, 16 Scot. Jur. 521.

⁶ See v. Baikie, Jan. 14, 1846, 8 D. 376, 18 Scot. Jur. 170 ; Bell v. Bell, 1841, 3 D. 1201, 13 Scot. Jur. 628 ; Sinclair v. Weddell, June 13, Scot. Law Rep. 600.

⁷ See v. Gale, Nov. 13, 1871, L. R. 7 Chancery, 12.

⁸ See on Contracts, 490.

⁹ See v. Arthur, Dec. 6, 1870, 9 Macph. 223, 43 Scot. Jur. 171 ; Veasey's v. Malcolm, June 2, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 748 ; Frank v. Frank, March 16, 1824, H. L. June 10, 1809, 5 Pat. App. 278 ; Bell on Deeds, 270. See also v. Hay, Dec. 12, 1845, 8 D. 283, 18 Scot. Jur. 133 ; Dickson v. Hay, vol. i. book 3, sec. 839.

No. 74. house at the time it was sold, and the pursuer could not be expected to guarantee that the license would be renewed.
 Feb. 1, 1877. At advising,— Stewart v. Burns.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case some points of considerable practical importance are raised. The facts are simple enough. Mrs Stewart and Burns, on 13th January 1876, in a shop in the Canongate, and in the presence of several persons, made a bargain about the sale and purchase of a shop in Grassmarket, the property of Mrs Stewart, and this agreement was embodied in a missive containing offer and acceptance. This missive was written out in duplicate, signed by Mrs Stewart and Burns at the same time and place. This missive is now brought at the instance of the seller to compel Burns to fulfil the bargain and pay the price. He answers that there never was a concluded agreement. That is met by the production of Mrs Stewart's copy of the missive of offer and acceptance, with the signature of witnesses added and a testing-clause filling up making it ex facie a probative writ. It is objected to this document by Burns that the signatures of the witnesses were appended ex intervallo, and that he had repudiated the bargain, and that there had been locus pœnitentiæ at all events until the missive was filled up, and that he had taken advantage of his power to repudiate. To this it is answered, on the other side, that there is no rule of law to prevent witnesses' subscriptions being added at any time, and that there was no intention of taking undue advantage of Burns in filling up the missive up. There is also a separate ground of action, that at all events interventus followed on the concluded agreement.

I am inclined to agree with the Lord Ordinary on both grounds of action. We are entitled to look at the missive, because it appears to be a probative document. No doubt at one time there was some discussion as to the proper time at which witnesses should subscribe, but it has now been settled that there is no circumstance to suggest an improper motive for the delay in obtaining the subsequent subscription of the witnesses, they may subscribe at any time. The object of the subscription of witnesses is merely to make it clear that what the deed bears to have been done was really done. There is no pretence here that the missive was not signed by Stewart and Burns, but it was so signed, and in the presence of these witnesses. If the witnesses were mere casual spectators of the act it would be a different case, but Mrs Stewart was present to advise and assist his mother, and Brechin, another witness, was the writer of the missive. It cannot, I think, be said that the witnesses were not intended to be witnesses. I do not dispute that there is some question as to whether the missive could be properly filled up after Burns had repudiated the bargain. If there was locus pœnitentiæ I do not think it could be filled up. There was a concluded agreement, and the missive itself is proof that there was. Then it was quite competent to fill the missive up, because so doing could not possibly affect the concluded agreement; it could only affect the proof of the agreement. It is not, however, necessary to put our judgment on the question whether Burns acted on the bargain in a most important manner. There was a bargain in the shop of the name of Spence in the occupation of it at that time, Burns was not going to remain as tenant, and was warned out by Mrs Stewart on the day of the bargain, and Mrs Stewart did not look out for another tenant for the same reason. But Burns, as purchaser of the subjects, proceeds to give possession of them to a man called Storrie, and on the strength of this an application

e for a license for the shop. The license is, however, refused, because No. 74.
 ee, who had taken another house close by, succeeded in impressing the strates with the idea that he had been badly treated by Mrs Stewart with Feb. 1, 1877.
 d to his former house, and got his license transferred to his new house, Stewart v.
 Burns' tenant's license was refused.

nothing was said in argument about Burns having bought a "licensed" e, but I think that phraseology was only descriptive. It was also said that Stewart had deceived Burns in not disclosing the nature of the dealings Spence. I cannot attach weight to this either, as Burns knew that Spence had to get a new lease, and he had the means of ascertaining the details of negotiation if he had thought it necessary to inquire.

On the term came, Mrs Stewart, on the faith of the bargain, is able to hand the subjects, but Burns, who had acted for some time as proprietor of the e, repudiates his bargain.

With that it was too late for Burns to throw up his bargain.

On the whole matter, I am inclined to find for the pursuer.

MR JAMDALE.—I am of the same opinion.

It is not to be supposed that the Court will in this, or in any case, depart from the safeguards which it is necessary to observe in connection with the writs. And I do not think we shall do so by sustaining as a probative document on which the pursuer, Mrs Stewart, founds in the present
 The defender's objections to the writ may be noticed in their order.

It is argued, first, that the witnesses had not been specially called and told to be witnesses of Mrs Stewart's and Mr Burns' signatures. That may be in a certain sense; they may not have been specially called and told, and witness the execution of this deed." That, however, is not always
 It is enough, and is usually in practice held to be enough, that the witnesses should be present and see the deed signed, or afterwards hear the parties make their signatures.

The objection taken by the defender raises the question whether the witnesses were entitled to adhibit their signatures ex intervallo, that is, after the lapse of about four months from the date when they had seen the principal subscribe the writ. It is settled law that the testing-clause of a deed may lawfully be filled up at any time before the deed is produced in judgment, and even after the death of the principal party or parties. I doubt, however, whether it was correct to say, as the defender's counsel did at the bar, that that was permissible on the principle of mandate or implied mandate on the death of the mandant the mandate would certainly fall, as I have already said, a testing-clause may be filled up at any time, even after the death of the principal party, providing there are sufficient witnesses for doing so. I rather think, therefore, that, independently of the principle of mandate, any party having a legitimate interest to do so may fill up the testing-clause of a writ whenever he pleases, providing he does so fairly and lawfully and for no improper purpose. In like manner I am disposed to think that ex intervallo, get the witnesses to adhibit their signatures. The question of time at which this may be done will depend upon circumstances.
 In the present case there is nothing, I think, to make the lapse of time which has been objected to objectionable.

The defender raised, as a farther objection to the writ in question, that

No. 74.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Stewart v.
Burns.

the witnesses adhibited the signatures to it on the call of the pursuer, after the defender, had intimated his resolution not to be bound. I confess that objection, which I rather think is well founded so far as the fact is concerned, impressed me a good deal at first, but, on consideration, I am now satisfied it is not maintainable in law. In getting the witnesses to adhibit their signatures when they did so, the pursuer neither did, nor desired, to alter any of the facts which had occurred; she only got the witnesses to testify to the truth of what had actually taken place, and she did not thereby affect the nature or substance of the transaction itself. I think, therefore, that if it were necessary for the Court to give judgment to hold that the pursuer was entitled to get the witnesses to adhibit their signatures at the time she did we could do so.

It is not, however, necessary for us so to determine, because there is evidence of rei interventus amply sufficient to validate and support the writ in question and render it effectual for the purposes of the pursuer, even if the witnesses' signatures and the testing-clause were to be altogether disregarded.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ALEX. GORDON, S.S.C.—HUGH MARTIN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 75.

Feb. 1, 1877.
Nicolson v.
Munro.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Banff, Elgin,
and Nairn.
I.

MARY ANN NICOLSON, Pursuer and Appellant.—A. J. Young.
DONALD MUNRO, Defender and Respondent.—Thorburn.

Process—Appeal—No appearance for the Respondent.—This was an appeal by the pursuer in an action of affiliation in the Sheriff Court of Elgin, and Nairn, in which both the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute assoltized the defender.

When the case was called in its order in the Short Roll of the Division counsel and agent for the appellant attended, but there was no appearance by either counsel or agent for the respondent.

The interlocutor-sheet bore a certificate by the Sheriff-clerk of the county to the effect that the appeal had been intimated to the respondent.

The Court heard the counsel for the appellant upon the evidence against the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. At the conclusion of his argument, there being still no appearance by either counsel or agent for the respondent, the Court continued the cause and intimated to the agent for the appellant to communicate with the respondent's agent in the country.

When the cause was called next day appearance was made for the respondent, and the following explanation of the previous non-appearance was given. The Edinburgh agents for the respondent had intimated to the original agents for the appellant that they were instructed to serve the respondent. The appellant's agency was, however, afterwards referred to her present agent, who did not know who were the respondent's agents, and did not send them copies of the prints. The case had accordingly been overlooked when it appeared in the roll. The Court accepted the explanation, and the appeal was subsequently dismissed on its merits.

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Chisholm v. Marshall, Jan. 17, 1874, ante, vol. i., 388.

THOMAS BOYNE PEGLER, Pursuer.—Rutherford.

No. 76.

NORTHERN AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT AND FOUNDRY COMPANY (LIMITED), Defenders.—Asher—Mackintosh.

Feb. 2, 1877.

Pegler v.
Northern
Agricultural
Implement Co.

Master and Servant—Contract—Liquid and Illiquid—Compensation.—The pursuer, a foundry company employed under a written contract an engineer, general manager of their business, with “the full control and direction” of subject always to such general and special instructions and directions in relation to his duties of manager” as the company might see fit to give through the board of directors.

An action brought by the manager two months after he had left the pursuer's employment for the balance of his salary, the company did not dispute their liability, but stated that it was the pursuer's duty to keep regular books, that a system of books had been arranged and prescribed to him, that he refused to keep the books on that system but had not done so, and that the pursuer had money in his hands belonging to the company to the extent of £200, the having failed to account for money received, men's time, and materials, at least that amount,” and pleaded that the action could not be maintained as the pursuer had accounted.

The defenders did not deny that the pursuer had at their special request remained in their service two months after the date when he had voluntarily terminated the contract, and that at that date no complaint had been brought against him.

The Lord Shand) that the pursuer's claim for salary under the written contract for his services as manager had become liquid without objection on the part of the defenders, and that the defenders' claim against the pursuer as a defaulter and intruder was an illiquid counter claim which could not be admitted as a defence to the action.

A written agreement was entered into between the Northern Agricultural Implement and Foundry Company (Limited), Inverness, of the first Division, and Thomas Boyne Pegler, engineer, Leeds, of the second Division, dated 22d June 1874, in the following terms:—“First, the said company of the second part shall serve the parties of the first part as manager of their business, and shall have the full control and direction of said business, subject always to such general and special instructions and directions in regard to his duties of manager as the said company of the first part may see fit to give through their board of directors or any committee of said board.” By the second article Mr Pegler's remuneration for his services as manager was fixed at £200 per annum. By the third article the company bound themselves to allot to Mr Pegler fifty shares of the company at the price of £500, which he bound himself to accept and to pay the £500. By the fourth article the company bound themselves to repurchase from Mr Pegler one-half of these shares at the same rate of price, in the event of his ceasing to be in their employment. Fifth, “The said party of the second part shall be bound to devote his whole time and attention to the duties of the manager for the parties of the first part; and shall not, by himself or others, either directly or indirectly, engage in any other business or any other office whatsoever.” The sixth article stipulated that the company might terminate the engagement by giving three months' notice in writing.

Mr Pegler entered upon his duties on 8th June 1874. He paid £500 to the company, and fifty shares were allotted to him.

On 6th August 1875 Mr Pegler wrote a letter to the directors of the company giving notice of his intention to leave their employment on 16th September, in terms of article sixth of the agreement, and requiring them to pay up twenty-five shares in the said company at the same date, according to article four in said agreement.” Mr Pegler remained in the employment till 20th January 1876.

No. 76.

Feb. 2, 1877.
 Pegler v.
 Northern
 Agricultural
 Implement Co.

On 16th March 1876 he raised this action concluding for declaration that the company was bound to take over twenty-five shares and to pay him £250, or otherwise for payment of £250 as the price of the shares and further, for payment of £72, 4s. 6d. in name of salary.

The pursuer stated;—(Cond. 6) "Following up the intimation contained in the letter of 16th August the pursuer intended to leave the employment of the defenders on the 16th of November 1875; but at special request of the defenders, as they, as was represented to him, did not then succeed in getting another manager, he continued in their employment till 20th January 1876. During the currency of his employment the defenders made no complaint to the pursuer of any failure of duty or breach of agreement on his part."

The defenders' answer to this statement was—"Admitted that in January 1876 the pursuer left Inverness. The defenders' statement is referred to Quoad ultra not admitted."

The defenders stated in their statement of facts, which was lodged 26th April;—(Stat. 1) "The pursuer was engaged as general manager of the defenders' company, and had the sole control of their business property from 8th June 1874 till he left Inverness in January 1876. It was the pursuer's duty, inter alia, to keep regular books recording the work done and the cost of the articles produced at the company's works, and "the whole transactions of the company's business. A system of book-keeping fitted to secure these objects was arranged and put into his hands, and he professed to keep the company's books on said system. It was also the pursuer's duty to keep himself informed as to the progress of the company's business, and to inform the directors if the business was proving unsuccessful. The statements in the answer are denied."

In his answer the pursuer, inter alia, "explained and averred that the pursuer, who is an engineer and practical mechanist, never undertook to keep the defenders' books, and it was no part of his duty to do so. The books were kept by another person employed for that purpose. The defenders were fully informed as to the state of the company's business."

The defenders further stated;—(Stat. 2) "The pursuer, in breach of his duty to the defenders, failed to keep or cause to be kept regular books, either on the prescribed system or any system. He also failed to keep the directors informed as to the state of the business. He repeatedly assured them that the business was prosperous and was being conducted at a profit, when the fact was, as he knew, or might have ascertained, that it was being conducted at a very heavy loss." (Stat. 3) "At the end of the year 1875 stock was taken by the pursuer, and a balance-sheet of the affairs of the company was made up under his directions. This balance-sheet shewed an apparent loss of the company's business during the year 1875 of £1971, 15s. 1d., a sum very little short of the whole wages and salaries paid by the company during the year."* In Stat. 4 the defenders stated that they were ready to pay the salary claimed and take over the shares on the condition of implementing his part of the agreement by rendering a proper account of his intrusions and management. The pursuer, however, failed to do so, the defenders are not aware to what extent the said deficiency of £1971, 15s. 1d. is one for which the pursuer is responsible, and they decline to settle with the pursuer till the account is cleared up." The defenders stated that an accountant employed reported that owing to the manner in which the books had been kept it was impossible to trace the deficiency. "The defenders believe and trust that on a just accounting it will be found that nothing is due by the pursuer." No. 76.

* This balance-sheet shewed the affairs of the company as at 31st December 1875, and was docketed by the auditor of the company on 10th February 1876, as having been examined with the books and vouchers and found correct.

Feb. 2, 1877.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) No relevant defence having been shown by the defenders' pleas should be repelled, and decree pronounced in favour of the conclusions of the libel. Pegler v. Northern Agricultural Implement Co.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having failed to perform his duty under the said agreement, and, in particular, having failed to keep proper books, or to supply proper information to the directors, and to render a proper account of his intrusions and management, the action should be maintained. (2) The defenders, not being due any sum to the pursuer, are entitled to absolvitor.

On 14th June 1876 the Lord Ordinary decreed against the defenders on the basis of the alternative conclusions of the summons."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The contract was mutual, and the pursuer was entitled to set off their claims under it against the claims of the pursuer. These claims were reciprocal and contemporaneous. A man who was entrusted with funds by his master could not retain them and claim his salary. If the pursuer had kept the company's books in a proper manner the claims of the company against him would have been disclosed in the books, and the pursuer could not have disputed them. He ought not to profit by his fault in neglecting to keep the books.¹

The pursuer argued;—The defenders' remedy was an action of count and reckoning. They could not plead their illiquid claims in compensation of the pursuer's claims, which they admitted to be due.²

In the discussion the defenders were allowed to amend their statement of facts, and on 16th January 1877 their amended statement was allowed to be added to the record on condition of payment of expenses on closing of the record.

The defenders then stated—(as an addition to Stat. 1)—That it was the duty of the pursuer to keep books recording, inter alia, "the men's time and labour, and the material used in each job, the various articles manufactured by the company's works and the cost of said articles." (In addition to Stat. 2)—"There is accordingly nothing in the books to shew how the pursuer has supplied to him on the company's account was disposed of, or the men's time charged for was employed." (In addition to Stat. 4) There are, however, various sums appearing to have been received by the pursuer which are not accounted for. There are also various discrepancies in the amounts taken credit for as paid for wages and as above-mentioned. There is no account of the disposal of the material or of the cost of men's time. . . . On the contrary, they aver that the pursuer has money belonging to them in his hands to the extent of more than £1200, he having failed to account for money received, and men's time, to at least that amount. The defenders have brought an action of count and reckoning concluding against the pursuer in the sum of £1200." The pursuer replied, "The pursuer is not liable for the sum of £1200."

The pursuer is not liable for the sum of £1200."

JUDGES.—It is quite clear in this case what were the terms upon

¹ Macmillan v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335; Macmillan v. Robertson, June 11, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 775.

² Personal and Domestic Relations (1st ed.) p. 429; Tait v. Mackintosh, 1841, F. C., 13 Scot. Jur. 280; Fraser v. Lang, Feb. 10, 1831, 9 S. 441; North-Eastern Railway Co. v. Napier, March 10, 1859, 21 D. 700, 21 Scot. Jur. 350; Taylor v. Forbes, Dec. 2, 1830, 9 S. 113, 3 Scot. Jur. 67.

No. 76.
 Feb. 2, 1877.
 Pegler v.
 Northern
 Agricultural
 Implement Co.

which the pursuer entered upon his employment, what was the rate of remuneration, and what the period of service. He was to be entitled to put an end to the contract on giving three months' notice. This he did on 16th August 1875 when he addressed to the defenders a letter in which he gave notice of his intention to leave their service on 16th November. He adds—"I shall request you to take up twenty-five shares in the said company on the said date, according to article 4 in the said agreement." Now, had this notice been accepted and acted on there could have been little doubt that as at 16th November 1875 the claim made by the pursuer for the value of the shares in this action would have been a perfectly liquid claim—that is to say, that the pursuer's right to the value of the shares was liquidated by the notice, and the amount is not doubtful. The pursuer's wages were also liquidated by the notice, because the salary was fixed and not disputed. But the defenders were not willing to let him go on 16th November. He was entitled to do so, but by arrangement he remained. He afterwards avers "that at the special request of the defenders as they, as was represented to him, had not then succeeded in getting another manager, he continued in their employment till 20th January 1876. During the currency of his employment the defenders made no complaint to the pursuer of any failure in duty or breach of agreement on his part." Now, this is a precise averment on the part of the pursuer, and it is not met in such a way by the defenders that they are entitled to say that they do not admit it. The averment that the pursuer accepted their special request in their employment is a fact within the defenders' knowledge, and they were bound either to admit or deny it; and their failure in doing so must be taken as a confession of fact that it was at their request he continued in their employment. The claims of the pursuer thus became due on the 16th of November, and the defenders were then bound to pay. The reason why they did not pay was that the pursuer was requested by the defenders to remain. The money has not been paid, and on 16th March 1875 the pursuer brought the present action.

Now, the first defence stated (for it is not disputed that the sum of money due under the contract) is that the pursuer undertook to do something for the defenders which he has failed to do, and that he is therefore not entitled to recover his claims under the contract. The awkwardness of their defence in this sight is, that it stands on the bare averment of the defenders. If it were averred that there was a distinct agreement, even a verbal agreement, in addition to the written contract, there might have been a difficulty in disputing it. But I do not so read the averment. The averment is that the pursuer undertook something not in the written contract, viz., that he undertook and agreed to keep the company's books. He was not bound to do so under the written contract, and it is not relevant to say that he undertook to do something which was outside that contract. But being under no obligation to keep books nevertheless he did so, say the defenders, and having failed in it he is not entitled to recover his claims under the contract.

I think this contention of the defenders is bad. If there had been an averment that the pursuer had failed to do something which he was bound to do under the contract that might have brought the case under the rule in the recent cases of Johnston v. Robertson, and Macbride v. Hamilton. But there is no such averment. In Johnston v. Robertson there was a distinct averment of a breach of one of the articles of the written contract. In Macbride v. Robertson although no precise clause in the written contract could be founded ce, and no allegations of a breach of such a clause could effectually be made, No. 76.

there was a distinct allegation of breach of contract, in so far as it was alleged t the clause of the contract specifying the time when it was to be executed had Feb. 2, 1877.
n departed from, and that another period had been substituted by a subsequent Pegler v.
bal agreement. But in the present case there is no allegation of a subsequent Northern ement, and therefore, in my opinion, the amendment which has been made Agricultural
; not come up to an averment of breach of contract entitling the defenders Implement Co.
efuse to pay the pursuer's claims.

ut there is another allegation, to the effect that the pursuer in the course of employment had sums of money in his hands belonging to the defenders, that he has failed to account for these. Even after the amendment has a made the averment is not specific. Without the amendment there was no ment of a claim against the pursuer at all, and as it now stands, in the absence my averment that the pursuer was bound by the contract to account for his omissions and failed to do so, there is no breach of the contract averred. In nt of fact and law this amounts to nothing more than a plea of compensation, uring under the disadvantage that it was plainly an afterthought. When record was closed there was no such allegation. There is nothing in the the contract on the matter of accounting. Of course when a man intromits funds belonging to another there is an obligation at common law to account.
failure to account, when pleaded in defence, is nothing more than a plea of ensation. It is quite settled that it is only against an illiquid claim, that a of compensation founded on an illiquid counter claim may be set up.
am of opinion that both these defences fall to be repelled, and that the pur-lentitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

MR DEAS.—I entirely concur with your Lordship. The two sums cond for by the pursuer are (1st), £250, being the price of twenty-five shares
e capital of the company at £10 per share; and (2d), £72, 4s. 6d. of salary to the pursuer as the company's manager from 8th September 1875 to 20th ary 1876. Both of these are liquid claims upon the face of the contract libelled
The stipulation that when the connection between the pursuer and the defenshould cease the defenders should take over from him the twenty-five shares e above price, came into operation, beyond all question, when he left the ders' service in January 1876. He had given the stipulated three months' e of his intention to leave as on 16th November 1875, and, as your Lord-has explained, it was at the special request of the defenders that he remained uary 1876. It is not disputed that he was entitled to leave the service e time he did, and it cannot be doubted that he was then entitled to the ated price of £10 for each of the twenty-five shares, and that the salary ed then became payable. The events which liquidated each of those claims recurred.

e rule which prevents illiquid claims being set off against liquid claims is led in justice. It is intended to prevent parties from being kept out of money by claims which may turn out to be altogether groundless, and h may be put forward for the mere purpose of delay. The wages or salary ervant is a strong instance of the reasonableness of this rule, for otherwise ervant might be indefinitely kept out of what is intended for his means of hood. As your Lordship has observed, no counter claim arises, on the face is contract, so as to be pleadable on that ground against the pursuer's claims.

No. 76.

Feb. 2, 1877.

Pegler v.

Northern

Agricultural
Implement Co.

I do not say that there may not be exceptional cases, but no exception can be listened to where the conduct of the party contending for it has indicated a want of confidence in his counter claim and prima facie there is nothing in its favor. The course of procedure seems to me to shew that that has been the case here. The summons was signeted on 16th March 1876, the record was closed on 9th June, and after parties had been heard decree was given against the defenders on 14th June. The case was argued on a reclaiming note to this Lord on 11th January of this year, and it then clearly appeared that the defender had stated no relevant defence on the record. They were consequently allowed to lodge an amendment, which was added to the record, and then, for the first time, they introduced the only averments on which their defence is now founded. Their own counter action was not served till about three weeks ago. No man is not to be kept out of his money by a defence got up ex post facto, which raises the strongest presumption that it is not well founded. That is not a matter of pleading but of substance.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion, for I agree that, on the face of the averments, there is no allegation of any breach of the express terms of this contract. The case might have been different if the allegation had been that the pursuer had failed to do something which he was expressly taken bound by that contract to do.

There is, moreover, a great deal, I think, in what has been said by Lord Mure as to the injustice, at this stage of the litigation, and in the admitted facts of the case, in allowing the defenders to go into an accounting as a defence to the pursuer's claims. As stated in the sixth article of the condescendence, the pursuer remained in their employment, at their request, for two months longer than he had intended to do, and it is averred that during all that time they made no complaint of any failure or breach of agreement on his part. Now, these were facts within the defender's knowledge, and they were bound, according to the ordinary rules of pleading, either to have admitted or denied them. But they do not deny them, and we must, I think, deal with the case on the footing that the pursuer was bound at the defenders' request, and that no complaint was made. So standing the facts, the pursuer left the defenders' service in January 1876, and it is averred from the docquet attached to the balance-sheet, founded on by the defender, that on the 10th of February the balance-sheet was examined by the pursuer, compared with the books and vouchers, and found to be correct. The pursuer's action was raised on 16th of March, and defences lodged on the 26th of March, but neither in these, nor in the revised defences, is there, in my opinion, any such defence stated as is relevant to be sent to proof as against the pursuer's claim. The fact that this now unusual course was taken of allowing the pursuer to revise their pleadings is, in the view I take of the case, much against the defenders. For they had thus full opportunity of stating under that revision what they have now added to the record. They, however, did not do this, but the record being closed in the shape in which the Lord Ordinary closed it.

Taking the case, therefore, as stated in the original record, I do not think the Lord Ordinary could have come to any other conclusion than he did. There was nothing more upon the record than a vague statement of the pursuer's failure to keep books and to account for the funds. That judgment was and on 14th June, and it was not until the case appeared in the roll for No. 76. in January that there was any proposal to amend, and now, having Feb. 2, 1877. an amendment, they propose to go into an accounting. In these circumstances, and apart altogether from the question of relevancy, on which I concur, Pegler v. Northern Agricultural Implement Co. it would be a great injustice to the pursuer to refuse to allow him to claim his wages, and the sums due on the shares, until this accounting is done, and I agree with your Lordships that the defences to this action should be allowed.

SHAND.—I differ in opinion from your Lordships. I think the defences want as an answer to the pursuer's claim, and that the defenders should produce a proof in support of their averments.

In question, it appears to me, is one of pleading, and of pleading only. There can be no doubt that the defenders in an action at their own instance maintain the claim which they here state in defence. But as matter of fact they say they are entitled to have their claims entertained and decided in this action as an answer to the pursuer's demands.

The case is founded on an agreement between the pursuer and defenders, contained in the 2d and 4th articles of that agreement. The 2d article deals with the rate of remuneration which the company were to give. The 4th article states that the defenders shall in the pursuer's option take back from him shares in the company at a certain value in the event of his ceasing to be employed. Founding upon that agreement, the pursuer asks a balance of his wages, and that the company shall take over the shares and pay for them. The defenders, founding also on the agreement, say that the pursuer is not entitled to these payments, because he has failed to perform his duty; and they say that he has £1200 of their funds in his hands of monies intrusted to him in the performance of his duties under the agreement. I think it is wrong proceeding to compel the defenders to pay the pursuer's salary for the shares when they have stated in defence that the pursuer has not put them in his hands, arising out of intrustments under the same contract, to the extent exceeding his claims. The defence is based upon the same document which is the foundation of the action.

The case, as originally presented, was no doubt loose and vague. But it is averred that it was only precision of averment that was wanting. The defence maintained is not new. It was stated before the amendment was made, and it is now averred with greater precision and accuracy. Taking the case as presented to the Lord Ordinary, I am not prepared to say that I differed from his Lordship in the conclusion to which he came. But if I agreed with him, it would have been entirely on the ground that the averments of the defenders were not precise or specific enough. The averments seem to me to put the matter in a different position.

I think this is a proper case of liquid and illiquid claims, nor a case of application of the ordinary rules of pleading as to compensation. The Lord Ordinary does not propose to mix up claims which are unconnected with each other, but to seek, as I think legitimately, to have the claims of both parties arising out of the same contract, and not those of one party only, made the subject of one decree. The statute 1592, cap. 141, properly comes into operation where a claim is made to plead compensation on a debt arising out of a different contract, as I stated in the case of Macbride v. Hamilton, that "the

No. 76.

Feb. 2, 1877.
 Pegler v.
 Northern
 Agricultural
 Implement Co.

sound general rule, which may be the subject of exceptions arising from circumstances, or the special terms of a particular contract, is, that in a mutual contract a party in defence is entitled to plead and maintain a reduction or extinction of a sum due under his obligation, where such arise from the failure of the pursuer to fulfil his part of the contract; I may add that any other rule is, in my opinion, likely to lead to injustice done, and to two litigations where one would frequently be sufficient.

An opinion has been indicated in the case of Macbride v. Hamilton, and by some of your Lordships in the present case, that such counter claim defences should only be held relevant as are founded upon some express promise in the contract. I doubt whether this suggestion affords either a satisfactory or a reasonable ground of distinction. Indeed, I think the ground of distinction is not sound. There are many obligations which are not to be found stated in a contract, but which are implied just as plainly as if they were expressed. I venture to think the sound principle is rather this, that the defence be founded on an obligation fairly arising out of the contract, the performance of which is reciprocal to and contemporaneous (viz. capable of being prestatable at the same time) with the obligation which is the foundation of the action, then the defence is good. I do not think the question is one of liquid and illiquid claims. The case of Macbride v. Hamilton is an authority to the contrary. There the articles the price of which was sued for had been manufactured and delivered, and there was no dispute as to the amount of the claim. The claim in defence was one of damages of uncertain amount, and disputed, and a proof was allowed in order that the counter claim might be established. I agree with what your Lordship in the chair said in the case of Scottish North-Eastern Railway Coy. v. Napier—"The case of Tait v. Napier suggests that a counter claim which may be resolved into a claim of damages may be sustained by way of compensation. If a servant brings a claim for wages, the answer to that claim is an allegation of the servant's misconduct during the period of the service for which the wages were claimed, that would be an answer in law to the demand in toto." In the case put, where the claim is for liquid and the damages illiquid, the counter claim is accepted as a defence properly so where it arises upon the same contract.

So much for the general rule of law, and I now apply it as so stated to the particular case. One specialty to which reference has been made is that the pursuer remained in the defenders' service for two months longer than he was bound. That does not appear to me to make any difference. I regard the arrangement here as in no way different from what frequently happens in the case of leases and contracts of service. These are prolonged on the footing that the agreement which has been in subsistence is to continue in all its stipulations to regulate the relations of parties. It is said that as at the 16th November the pursuer's claims were liquid, and that the fact of his remaining for two months longer in the employment is the only reason why his claims were not liquid. But I do not think the case can be taken on the footing that if the pursuer had left the defenders' service at the date for which he gave notice this defence would not have been stated. It is only reasonable to suppose the defenders would have made the investigations which disclosed the ground of defence as soon or later, when the pursuer left their employment.

A second specialty has been referred to—I do not know how far it applies into the opinions which your Lordships have expressed—I mean ch took place before the amendment was made. The amendment was made by way of introducing a new defence but in terms of the Act of Parliament, which provides that all such amendments as may be necessary "for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties" shall be made, and the defenders were subjected to the penalty in payment of expenses. The case is just one of the class to which this beneficial provision of the statute was intended to meet. The Court hereby enabled to determine the question in dispute between the parties without being obliged to turn one of them out of Court, leaving him the right of a second action.

What are the claims and counter claims? The pursuer asks his wages, and what was paid by the defenders for the shares he took under the original agreement. The defenders say, "You misconducted yourself when in our employment, and when you left you did so with a considerable sum of money belonging to us in your hands." It is said that the first of these defences does not arise under any stipulation of the contract. I do not think it necessary that it should. If it be necessary, I am of opinion that it does. The pursuer undertook to be the "general manager" of the business of the company, and by the agreement the full control and direction of said business was committed to him. I consider that under this agreement it was quite as much the function of the pursuer as general manager to attend to the mercantile department as to the technical part of the business. He was bound to keep the books—I do not think in his own hands—but with the assistance which he was entitled to derive from his employers. The defenders say that he undertook to keep the books on a proper system, but failed to do so, and left them in complete confusion. That is a relevant averment, although there is perhaps this point against it that the defenders did not apparently find fault with him on this subject before he was leaving their employment. The only doubt I have about the relevance of this averment is that, seeing the pursuer was so long in the defenders' employment, they ought at an earlier date to have enforced their directions about the books.

When I come to the other averment of the defenders I see no reason to doubt its relevancy. They state now in the amended record that there are sums unaccounted for, and that the pursuer has a sum of not less than £1200 in his hands belonging to them in respect of his intromissions as manager under the agreement. Suppose that the defenders, instead of saying that there was due them a sum of £1200, had produced a state shewing the various sums due by him, I cannot suppose that this judgment goes so far as to decide that in such a case the pursuer would have a right to decree in the face of such evidence. It seems to me to make the case worse and not better for the pursuer that he left the books in such an incomplete and confused condition that a clear and detailed statement cannot be given.

Far from thinking that it would be an injustice to the pursuer to refuse to grant him an instant decree, I regard it as a case of injustice to the defenders that, although they alleged that the pursuer has £1200 of their money in his hands, they are nevertheless now compelled to pay the sums of smaller amount claimed for as salary and as the price of the shares, and should be obliged thereby to bring another action; and I think there is no rule of law or of pleading which requires that this injustice should be done. I am of opinion that the whole case should be sent to proof.

No. 76.

Feb. 2, 1877.

Pegler v.

Northern
Agricultural Implement Co.

No. 76.

Feb. 2, 1877.

Pegler v.

Northern

Agricultural
Implement Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Recall the interdict to repel the defences, and decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of £250 and £72, 4s. 6d., with interest from date of citation," &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1877.

Wyper v.

Carr and Co.

P. and R. WYPER, Pursuers.—*Guthrie Smith.*HARRISON CARR AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Lord-Adv. Watson—M'Laren.

Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem.—Arrestments ad fund. jur. used by a pursuer in the hands of the trustee on the bankrupt estate of a party against whom the defenders had a contingent claim. Plea of no jurisdiction sustained, in respect that it was proved that there were no assets in the hands of the trustee.

1ST DIVISION.

Lord Shand.

B.

THIS was an action by P. and R. Wyper, coalmasters, Motherwell, against Harrison Carr and Company, coalmasters, Newcastle, for payment of £149, the price of a cargo of coals sold and delivered by the pursuers to the defenders on the order of their accredited agent Mr. Lindsay. The defence on the merits was that the defenders had purchased the coals, not from the pursuers, but from Lindsay, who was their agent, and that he having become bankrupt, and absconded, they were bound to account to the trustee on his estate for the price.

The pursuers used arrestments ad fundandam in the hands of the trustee on Lindsay's estate, and averred (Cond. 5) that they had funds belonging to or claimed by the defenders sufficient to subject the estate to the jurisdiction of the Court. This was denied by the defenders, who stated (1) a plea of no jurisdiction.

A proof with regard to the question of arrestment was led, and the following points were established—(1) That if the defenders were not debtors to Lindsay for the price of the coals they had a claim against him, but that if they had bought the coals from him as a principal and were indebted to him for the price the balance was the other way. (2) That there were no assets of Lindsay's estate.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the arrestments used by the pursuers the defenders have become liable to the jurisdiction of the Court in the present action : Repels the defenders' plea in law," &c. *

* "NOTE.—The evidence appears to me to shew that the defenders had a contingent claim against the bankrupt estate of Mr Lindsay, merchant and owner in Leith, which would entitle them to have dividends laid aside under the Bankrupt Statute in any division of the estate, and which they were entitled to have made the subject of a valuation under the 53d section of the statute.

"The bankrupt, in January of this year, sent to the defenders two cargoes of coals, one by the 'Ariel,' of the value of £228, and another by the 'Dwight,' of the value of £149. If it be assumed that the parties who supplied the coals became creditors to Lindsay only, and not to the defenders, the defenders would be debtors to the bankrupt estate. But the pursuers maintain that Lindsay acted as an agent only, and that the defenders are their debtors, and that the defenders who supplied the 'Ariel's' cargo have intimated a similar claim, although they have not followed it up by raising an action. It is clear that if either of the claims be well founded, the defenders, who paid Lindsay for the cargoes, have a claim for re-payment. They are therefore, I think, entitled to claim the values of the cargoes in the sequestration, to the effect of having defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—When the subject arrested was on a bankrupt estate, the claim must have been lodged in terms of statute ; a mere possibility of a claim was not sufficient. In a bankrupt estate, until a claim was lodged, the relation of debtor and creditor was not constituted.¹ The subject must be one which would be in execution.² Let it be assumed that in a case of accounting, if it were not clearly shewn that a balance was due, arrestment is competent, although no case has gone that length ; but here it is proved that there was nothing to arrest. The pursuers argued ;—If there was a prima facie case of indebtedness which will sustain the jurisdiction.³ It was not necessary for arrestment ad fundandam that there should be a subject arrestable in execution. The rules were different.⁴ In Trowsdale's case it was only laid that the thing arrested must have an exchangeable value. In that case there was no difference between arrestment ad fundandam and arrestment in execution.

JUDGMENT.—This is an action to recover £149, the price of a cargo of goods to have been delivered by the pursuers on the order of Lindsay, the agent of the defenders. The defence on the merits is that the defenders did not receive from Lindsay as a principal, and had no transaction with the pursuers. There is a preliminary defence that the defenders are foreigners, and have no domicile subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, and, in particular, that the arrestments which have been used to found jurisdiction have not attached to the goods.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained the arrestments as sufficient, and in his note has pointed out two difficulties, both of which require serious attention. (1) It is plain by the evidence that if the pursuers fail in this action then they will have no claim against the arrestee, who is the trustee on the bankruptcy of Lindsay. The action being for recovery of the price of the goods, if the pursuers fail, the defenders will have no claim for repetition of the price.

The Lord Ordinary has to meet the contingency of the shippers establishing direct claims against them. Their own view is that they must be guaranteed against claims by the shippers of the cargoes before they can come to any settlement with the trustee. In this state of matters I am of opinion that the defendants have an interest in the bankrupt estate which is arrestable, and which, if the goods are arrested, is sufficient to found jurisdiction—Lindsay v. North-Railway Company, Jan. 27, 1860, 22 D. 571, 32 Scot. Jur. 221, and Jones there cited, June 30, 1831, 9 S. 856, 3 Scot. Jur. 564. The Lord Ordinary maintained that even though there might be an arrestable interest in the estate of a contingent claim where there was obviously a fund for division, it did not apply to the present case, as the trustee has been unable to pay the claim. I do not think, however, that in a question of this kind the court should enter on an inquiry as to the probability of a bankrupt estate yielding or not. The estate may yet be discovered ; the bankrupt may acquire a fortune ; he may succeed in acquiring property in business which he would not have made over to his trustee, and these considerations are, I think, sufficient to meet the argument founded on the peculiar circumstances of Lindsay.

Lindsay v. Williamson, Nov. 19, 1835, 14 S. 27, 8 Scot. Jur. 20.

Trowsdale's Trustee v. Forcett Railway Company, Nov. 4, 1870, 9 Macph. 49, 31 Scot. Jur. 51.

Dow and Dobie, Feb. 2, 1869, 7 Macph. 449, 41 Scot. Jur. 246.

North v. Hope, July 1, 1865, 3 Macph. 1049, per Lord Curriehill.

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1877.
Wyper v. Carr and Co.

No. 77.
 Feb. 2, 1877.
 Wyper v.
 Carr and Co.

it from Lindsay's estate, or for credit to that amount in an accounting, if no such claim exists, it is proved that the balance will be against the debtors in an accounting with Lindsay, though if they have this claim, it will be in their favour. Thus it depends on the success of the pursuers whether the debtors are creditors on Lindsay's estate or debtors to it. If the pursuers succeed in arrestments have attached funds,—if they fail, they have not. The difficulty in this consideration,—If the Court has jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment condemnator, it must also have jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment absolutor. But here, if the pursuers were to fail, if we found that Lindsay was a partner, our jurisdiction would be at an end, and we should not be able to pronounce judgment of absolutor. But I suggest that merely as a difficulty, I think the case before us turns on a clearer ground.

(2) The evidence shews that, though the bankrupt has absconded, there is no reason to suppose that there is any part of his estate which is not known to the trustee; and the state of affairs is, that so far from there being any assets, there is not money enough to pay the expenses. The Lord Ordinary very properly says that the Court cannot enter into an inquiry as to the probability of the estate yielding a dividend; and if the matter were uncertain there would be a great deal of force in that consideration. But it is already certain on the evidence of the trustee that the estate cannot pay anything.

If so, the arrestments have attached nothing de facto, and therefore the Court is prepared to say that they have founded jurisdiction. The doctrine has never been carried so far; and I am not disposed to carry it further than it has been carried in practice.

It is suggested by the Lord Ordinary that though there are no assets at present something may happen hereafter to produce them,—the bankrupt may succeed to an estate before he is discharged, or set up in business with his own money, and these acquisitions would fall to his creditors. That is quite possible, but then in order to found jurisdiction it would be necessary to hold that the prospective estate vested in the trustee now, whereas by the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act¹ it is provided that it vests only from the time when required by the bankrupt. Is it possible to say that the bare possibility of something coming in hereafter constitutes an arrestable interest or account? I think not, and in this point of view the trustee stands in a different position towards a creditor from the bankrupt himself. Before his sequestration the bankrupt is liable to pay his debts absolutely, and that liability subsists for his whole life. But the trustee is only bound to distribute the funds as they come into his hands. Therefore his indebtedness is measured by the amount of the funds in his hands. The moment he discharges himself of the whole of the funds in his hands his indebtedness ceases. If he never has any it never exists. But, on general grounds, I am of opinion that where it is demonstrated here, that there is no existing indebtedness or accountability, arrestment cannot be founded, and cannot found jurisdiction. I am therefore obliged to dissent from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—If an action in which arrestments to found jurisdiction have been used is allowed to go on without objection, it will not do for the

¹ 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 103.

g, in the event of its turning out in the end that there was nothing to arrest, No. 77.
 it must be held there had been all along no jurisdiction.
 it when the objection is taken in limine, we always allow investigation, and Feb. 2, 1877.
 depends upon the result whether the jurisdiction is to be held well founded Wyper v.
 & Carr and Co.
 If it turns out that there is nothing to attach, then there is no jurisdiction on the whole I think that is the result in the present case.

MR. MURE.—I concur in the first part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The case of Lindsay v. The North-Western Railway, and the other cases cited to, are, I think, distinct authorities for holding that a contingent claim on a bankrupt estate, or an interest in that estate, may be attached by arrestment so as to found jurisdiction. But in this case the question is whether there are any funds of the defenders in Lindsay's hands which admit of being attached; because, in order to found jurisdiction, there must be something to which something that can be laid hold of and fixed by the arrestment, and it may not matter how small the amount of that fund or interest may be, if there is no such fund then the arrestment is bad. Now, on the evidence it is clear that there is here no estate. The trustee says that the estate may pay a penny in the pound, and that it will not even yield enough to pay the expenses already incurred. So that as there is at present nothing to which I am of opinion that the arrestment cannot be sustained.

The Lordship's observations on the 103d section of the statute obviates any question as to the possibility of some succession afterwards emerging, because the debt would not vest in the trustee till the date of the succession; and if it should occur, a new action may be raised and fresh arrestments used.

MR. SHAND.—Having had the benefit of additional argument and your Lordship's views, I have come to be of the same opinion, namely, that it is not sufficient that funds have been attached sufficient to found jurisdiction.

I am of the opinion that the defenders have a contingent claim on the bankruptcy of Lindsay, which is a proper subject of arrestment.

It appears that the defenders have settled with Lindsay for the coals. But as the present pursuers, having intimated a claim against the debtors for the price, I think the defenders have a right to call on Lindsay's debtors to set apart a sum to meet the contingency of their being obliged to pay the price, as well as the contingency of their being in the same way required to repay a second time for the "Ariel's" cargo.

As to the second point, if it appeared that the trustee was really without any effects, though they were not ingathered, I should say the arrestment was still good. But on a renewed consideration of the evidence of the case I think the proof shews that he was not vested in any estate. He had no inquiry, and could find none. Future acquisitions by the bankrupt doubtless give the trustee a claim to recover, but the right to these would be in him after it had been acquired by the bankrupt himself. I am of opinion that the arrestment has attached nothing.

The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor: Sustain the first plea in law stated for the defenders: In respect whereof dismiss the action, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 78.

WILLIAM YOUNG, Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Perth, Pursuer and Respondent.—*Balfour—Keir.*Feb. 9, 1877. ALEXANDER GOW, Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Caputh, Defen-Young v. Gow. and Appellant.—Asher—Mackay.

Poor—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 70—Parish—mission of Liability.—Held, in conformity with Beattie v. Arbuckle, Jan. 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 330, that where one parish has deliberately admitted another liability for the support of a pauper, it cannot withdraw that admission and open up the question of liability on the ground that the admission made in error either as to the facts or as to the law.

Poor—Liability of Parishes inter se—Mora.—A parish after admitting liability for a pauper's aliment to a relieving parish and paying its advances subsequently intimated withdrawal of the admission, which the relieving parish refused to accept. The relieving parish, founding on the admission, frequently applied for payment, and ultimately after seven years raised an action. That the action was not barred by mora.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perthshire.
M.

AGNES HENDERSON or CAMERON, a married woman, deserted her husband, had resided in Perth and maintained herself by her industry for many years prior to 24th November 1866. At that date she became chargeable as a pauper.

The pauper had been married to Alexander Cameron, a native of Perth, who was killed in the parish of Caputh, but had been deserted by him in 1838. Cameron had not since been heard of.

On the pauper becoming chargeable, the statutory notice of charge was given by the inspector of the parish of Perth to the inspector of the parish of Caputh.

On 28th November and 5th December 1866 the inspector of Perth wrote to the inspector of Caputh directing his inquiry to certain points of information as to the pauper's history; and on 20th December the latter replied stating the result of his inquiries, and adding, "if the parish is liable, but I will write you again should I find anything to the contrary."

At a meeting of the parochial board of Caputh, held on 8th April 1868, the claim for admission of liability to the parish of Perth, in respect of the pauper Margaret Cameron, was submitted by the inspector of Perth, the meeting having considered the claim, "instructed the inspector of Caputh to admit liability." This the inspector thereafter did by letter addressed to the inspector of Perth. The advances made by the parish of Perth in support of the pauper were repaid down to 11th April 1868.

At the meeting of the parochial board of Caputh, held on 11th April 1868, it was determined to withdraw the admission given in the year 1866 to the parish of Perth of liability for the pauper Margaret Cameron, in respect that after her desertion by her husband, and prior to her becoming chargeable, she had acquired a residential settlement in Perth on her own account. The inspector of Caputh accordingly wrote by direction of his board withdrawing the admission and declining to pay the advances further in the case.

On 7th April 1868 the inspector of Perth wrote to the inspector of Caputh—"I cannot accept your withdrawal of liability in the year 1866. Had her husband been an Irishman, in the circumstances you would have had good reasons, but I would like to know where you have got to shew that the deserted wife of a Scotchman can acquire a settlement in right. If you are to abide by your retractation, please let me know what steps may be taken in the case." At the meeting of the parochial Perth on 8th April 1868 the inspector reported the withdrawal of admission by Caputh, and that he had refused to accept of the same. And minute of meeting of the parochial board of Perth of 21st April and May 1869, 28th May 1872, 22d June, 31st August, and 28th September 1875, all bore reference to the case as still standing unsettled between the two parishes.

Letters also passed between the inspectors of the two parishes on 1st 8th May 1868, 23d April, 13th June, and 14th November 1872, 22d August 1873, 28th April and 2d July 1874, and 2d April 1875, relating to the subject. In this correspondence the inspector of Perth took up the position, not that the admission of 1867 once given was binding, but that the admission itself was in accordance with the facts of the case and the law applicable thereto, which the inspector of Caputh denied, and required the inspector of Caputh to renew the admission to avoid the expense of an action.

The action was ultimately raised by the inspector of Perth against the defender, Caputh, on 8th October 1875, to recover the amount of expenses for support of the pauper from 11th April 1868, and for relief of the advances thereafter to be made.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The pauper being a proper object of relief, and the advances sued for having been properly made, the defender, as inspector foresaid, is liable in repayment of the same, interest and expenses, in respect of the admission condescended on by the defender, which cannot be withdrawn.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The original admission of liability having been in excusable error as regards the law applicable to the circumstances (then undecided), the defender was justified in subsequently withdrawing the admission, and repudiating liability. (4) Defender having repudiated liability in April 1868, the claim of pursuer for aliment prior to the raising of the present action is extinguished by mora.

Sheriff-substitute (Barclay), on 23d March 1876, applying the law to the above facts, found—"Firstly, That the pursuer, notwithstanding the admission of liability by Caputh in 1856, having homologated the admission of liability in 1868 by the defender, and in respect of the advances following thereon, cannot recover for the advances since made to the pauper prior to the date of the action: Secondly, and separately, as to the conclusion for relief of future aliment, the pauper resided in the parish of Perth since the desertion of her husband for a period much longer than necessary for acquiring a residential habit therein, has acquired such, and cannot, in the want of proof of her husband being alive during that period, be sent to the parish of her birth: Therefore assolvies the defender from the conclusions of the action: Finds him entitled to costs."¹

The question of mora dealt with in the first branch of his interlocutor, the substitute in his note referred to Hay v. Jack, Feb. 15, 1853, 15 D. Scot. Jur. 234; Lemon v. Cameron, Jan. 19, 1864, 2 Macph. 454, 36 D. 233; Beattie v. Wood, Feb. 9, 1866, 4 Macph. 427, 38 Scot. Jur. 233; Beattie v. Greig, July 9, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 923. On the second question of settlement, the case of Greig v. Simpson and Craig, May 16, 1876, 13 D. 642, not having been decided at the date of his interlocutor, the substitute referred to the following cases—Pennycuik v. Heritors of Glasgow, March 3, 1813, F. C.; Gray v. Fowlie, March 5, 1847, 9 D. 811, 13 Scot. Jur. 363; Hay v. Skene, June 13, 1850, 12 D. 1019, 22 Scot. Jur. 286; Michael v. Adamson, Feb. 28, 1863, 1 Macph. 452, 35 Scot. Jur. 286; Hay v. Knox, June 28, 1850, 12 D. 1112, 22 Scot. Jur. 513; Hay v. Macdonald, Feb. 24, 1860, 22 D. 872, 32 Scot. Jur. 366; McRorie v. Cowan, March

No. 78. The Sheriff (Adam), on 19th June 1876, on an appeal, pronounced the interlocutor :—"Sustains the appeal, and recalls the interlocutor appealed from : Finds it proved that on the 20th December 1866 the inspector of the parish of Caputh admitted liability for the support of the pauper in his letter of that date : Finds that no facts or circumstances have been proved which are relevant to relieve the defender from the effect of the admission : Therefore finds that the parish of Caputh was effectually bound by the said admission, and that the same is still effectual : Therefore decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons : Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

Feb. 9, 1877.
Young v. Gow.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued :—A series of cases enumerated by the Sheriff-substitute led up to the decision in the recent case of Greig v. Simpson,¹ whereby it was determined that a deserted wife was in the same position as if her husband was dead, and was therefore capable of acquiring a residential settlement. The decision therefore in the present case given in April 1867 was clearly given under error in law. The question was, was that admission, though given under error in law, permanently binding? The judgment of the Sheriff was founded solely on the case of Beattie v. Arbuckle.² If that judgment was sound, it was certainly applicable to the present case, though a distinction might be drawn that here the admission had been only given on for one year, and therefore the parish to which it had been given was hardly be prejudiced by its withdrawal, while in Beattie v. Arbuckle it had been acted on for six or seven years. But that judgment was a recent one and stood alone, and had not yet been followed.

The older Scotch law with regard to the effect of an admission under error in law was given in Bell's cases, 11 and 534. So far as payments under error in law were concerned, the older law was certainly altered by the case of Sinclair v. Wilson Maclellan,³ which decided that a condictio indebiti did not lie on a 7, 1862, 24 D. 723, 34 Scot. Jur. 365; Mason v. Greig, March 11, 1867, Macph. 707, 37 Scot. Jur. 348; Johnston v. Wallace, June 13, 1867, Macph. 699, 45 Scot. Jur. 422.

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff is of opinion that in this case a deliberate admission of liability was, after investigation, made by Caputh, which was afterwards acted on. He thinks therefore that the case falls within the principle of Beattie v. Arbuckle, January 15, 1875, 2 Rettie, 330, and that this admission of liability cannot be retracted by Caputh on the ground averred.

"The Sheriff thinks that this is conclusive of the case against Caputh. It does not appear to him that there is any evidence in process that Perth acquiesced in the withdrawal by Caputh of its admission of liability, and abandoned its claim against that parish. On the contrary, Perth from the first refused to accept of such withdrawal, and the evidence in process shows that although Perth took no active steps to enforce its claims of relief, it repeatedly demanded for payment. Caputh was perfectly well aware that Perth did not abandon its claims, but was insisting on them, and, in these circumstances, it appears to the Sheriff that there is no room either for the mora or prescription.

"The Sheriff thinks that this is a hard case for Caputh, as he has no doubt that, but for the admission made in 1866, Caputh would not have been liable—Greig v. Simpson and Craig, 16th May 1876, 3 Rettie, 642."

¹ May 16, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 642.

² Jan. 15, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 330.

³ H. of L. Dec. 7, 1830, 4 W. and S. 398; see also Dillons v. Mersey Canal Company, Sept. 17, 1831, 5 W. and S. 445.

In that case there were dicta of Lord Brougham reported which further. But these dicta were obiter merely, and the principles which Lord Brougham there applied to repetition of money paid under error in law, and thought should be applied to obligations undertaken under error in law, had never been so applied in practice. The result of judgment and its effect upon the latter class of cases was very recently considered in Dickson v. Halbert.¹ That was a case of an obligation created by a discharge of claims, and it was held not binding when granted under error in law. The present case was one of an obligation created by an admission. That surely was a fortiori of the case of Dickson, and if the obligation in that case was not binding, how could it be in the present.

No. 78.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Young v. Gow.

The strength of the opposite view mainly depended on the case of Sinclair Wilson and Maclellan, already referred to. But that case, though on appeal, was really decided in accordance with views then current as to English law. Yet English authorities now doubted whether the rule there laid down could be supported even as to a debiti.²

When an extrajudicial admission was never held permanently valid unless something had followed which put the party to whom it related in a worse position than before it was made.

JUDGMENT.—That, as applicable to an admission of liability for a debt, is hardly consistent with the terms of the 70th section of the Poor-Law Act.³

The section only refers to the temporary effect of an admission, and is subject to its withdrawal on the discovery that it had been given under mistake. As soon as the respondent found the withdrawal of the admission, it was his duty to proceed under secs. 71 and 72 of the Poor-Law Act. Consideration of these provisions confirmed the view that section 70 referred to the temporary effect of an admission. It was not applicable to the present case that the relieving parish had suffered any loss from the admission having been made and left unwithdrawn for nearly a year. There was therefore no ground for excepting this from the ordinary rule that an extrajudicial admission was not binding unless the adverse party was prejudiced.³ The Sheriff-substitute had rightly held that the respondent was barred from now putting forward his claim.⁴ The objections to the respondent were not called upon.

¹ 17, 1854, 16 D. 586, 26 Scot. Jur. 266; see also Purdon v. Rowat's Dec. 19, 1856, 19 D. 206, 29 Scot. Jur. 99.

² Phibbs v. Phibbs, May 31, 1867, L. R. 2 English App. 149, Lord Westbury, p. 170.

³ Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 70, enacts that where relief for a poor person is made by any poor person entitled to relief the officer of the parish shall, notwithstanding such poor person may not be settled in the parish, "afford to such poor person such interim maintenance as may be judged necessary until the parish or combination to which the person belongs be ascertained, and his claim upon such parish or combination be otherwise determined, or until he shall be removed."

⁴ Macdonald v. Beattie, May 12, 1860, 22 D. 1064, 32 Scot. Jur. 488; Macdonald v. Taylor and Craig, Nov. 26, 1863, 9 Poor-Law Magazine (1867), p. 1.

⁵ Lunacy Board v. Bremner and Elder, July 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 24, 1875, ante, vol. ii. (H. of L.) 136.

⁶ As referred to in note, p. 449.

No. 78. LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pauper became chargeable in 1866 towards the end of the year. She was residing in Perth, and the inspector Feb. 9, 1877. Perth at once gave the statutory notice of chargeability to the inspector of Caputh, and claimed relief from that parish as the parish of settlement. A few days later, on 28th November 1866, the inspector of Perth wrote to the inspector of Caputh, stating that the pauper was resident in Perth, that her husband Alexander Cameron, was born in Dunkeld, in the parish of Caputh, that he had deserted the pauper twenty-eight years ago, and had not since been heard of. He then suggests a source from which information as to the history of the pauper's husband may be obtained, and concludes by saying,—“I claim relief for you in respect of husband's birth. Your admission and instruction will be sufficient.” The correspondence continues at intervals for two or three months, until 8th December 1867, when we find the parochial board of Caputh, having before them the information collected by their inspector on the subject, deliberately instructing their inspector to admit liability. The letter written by the inspector of Perth in consequence of these instructions has not been preserved. But there is no doubt that it was sent. From that time the pauper was maintained in the parish of Perth, at the expense of the parish of Caputh, until the following year, when (on 6th April 1868) the parochial board of Caputh having got more light upon the law, instructed their inspector to withdraw the admission of liability with the view of throwing the liability for the pauper's support on the parish of Perth, in which the pauper then appeared to have her settlement in her own right. That is at once met by the parish of Perth by a letter of 7th April 1868 refusing to accept the withdrawal of the admission of liability. A correspondence goes on between the two inspectors from that time down to the raising of this action, the inspector of Perth standing out throughout on the admission of 1867, and the inspector of Caputh maintaining as consistently, that he was not bound by that admission.

In these circumstances the question which now arises is, whether the parish of Caputh is bound for the future maintenance of this pauper in consequence of the admission of liability made in 1867? Now, it appears to me that the case of Beattie v. Arbuckle,¹ is directly in point. The Barony Parish was in that case the relieving parish, but it was also the parish which, but for the admission of liability made by Cambuslang, would have been liable for the support of the pauper. In that case the Judges of the other Division held unanimously that the admission could not be withdrawn, but was permanently binding on the parish making it.

It would require very strong reasons to induce us to go back upon that judgment, and, indeed, we could not do so according to our practice without inconsistency with the other Division, or, if necessary, with the whole Court. I only should I require strong reasons to induce me to go back upon that judgment, but I am quite satisfied that no good reasons exist. I quite concur on the grounds on which that judgment was based, and think further that it is a most excellent and salutary rule in connection with this branch of the administration. I am of opinion that an admission of liability by one parish to another is not to be lightly made; but, being made, is absolutely binding. I am not at all afraid that, as ingeniously suggested by Mr Mackay, the effect of this stringent rule will tend to prevent parishes making admissions.

¹ Jan. 15, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 330.

increase litigation. I am rather of opinion that by inducing parishes to do what they are doing before making admissions it will tend to increase litigation.

No. 78.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Young v. Gow.

The only distinction which Mr Mackay was able to draw between the case of Beattie v. Arbuckle and the present was that in the former the admission had acted on for a considerable number of years, and in the latter for only one. This is quite true. But to make any distinction between cases in respect of the length of time during which an admission has been acted on, provided the admission has been deliberately made, would, I think, be at once to disturb the law and take away its utility; and, therefore, I can give no weight to that distinction.

The pursuer, however, further contended that the pursuer here is barred by mora. This is a plea of which I cannot see the applicability to the present case. The admission was made to withdraw the admission in 1868. But there has been no acquiescence in the withdrawal. The inspector of Perth has continued to say, "You shall not withdraw your admission. You stand confessed, and you are bound to it." After consistently maintaining this position for seven years, his correspondence he is at last driven to raising this action. To say that he is barred by mora would be a most extravagant application of the law.

DEAS.—The case of Beattie v. Arbuckle appears to me to be directly applicable to the present case. There was there an admission of liability, the admission was acted on for several years. Here the admission was only for one year; but that, I think, shews quite sufficiently the deliberation with which it was made, and that it had the sanction of the parochial board. Apart from the inference to be thus drawn, there is, in the present case, ample direct evidence of careful deliberation before the admission was made. I do not mean to say that an admission rashly made by an inspector without proper inquiry, and the sanction by his board, would be equally binding. But that was not the case here any more than in Beattie v. Arbuckle. The question, in that case, was most deliberately considered by the Judges of the other Division, and unanimously decided. In relation to the poor-law we should be slow to disturb what is undisturbed. It has been settled, even although we might otherwise have been inclined to differ. But, upon the merits of the case of Beattie, I am satisfied the reasons preponderated in favour of the judgment.

As to the plea of mora, which has been attempted to be set up, I think nothing in it. It is just an innominate plea of prescription, without a foundation.

THE CONCURRED.

LAND.—The case of Beattie v. Arbuckle is a direct authority here, and the correctness of the judgment I am quite satisfied. Where an admission is made by one parish to another, the inspector of the parish to which it is made is entitled to assume that he need take no farther trouble in the case. Being admitted, it becomes unnecessary to preserve the evidence which has been required for litigation in a case of disputed settlement, and the very well be that important evidence is thus entirely lost. It is not

No. 78. to be forgotten that in the majority of cases in which parochial inspectors have to search for evidence of settlement such evidence is only to be obtained in a migratory population of the lowest class, often most difficult to trace, as they move about. If, therefore, an admission is not to be held binding, but may be withdrawn at pleasure, and, it may be, after it has been long acted on, serious damage may be suffered by the parish to which the admission has been made. If it be assumed that the admission has been given in error, the case is generally in which matters are no longer entire. The admission has been acted on, and the parish receiving it would be put to a great disadvantage by its withdrawal. It is therefore far more salutary in practice to have one general rule giving full effect to an admission once deliberately made than to have in each case, as it arises, an inquiry as to whether the parish to which the admission has been made would or would not be really prejudiced through the loss of evidence otherwise, by its withdrawal.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the parochial board of the parish of Caputh, by their minute dated 8th April 1877, admitted liability for the support of the pauper, Agnes Henson or Cameron, and instructed their inspector to intimate to the inspector of poor of the parish of Perth, which was accordingly done: Find that, in pursuance of this admission of liability, the inspector of poor of the parish of Caputh paid to the inspector of poor of the parish of Perth the alimentary advances expended by that parish on account of the said pauper, and continued to make subsequent advances for some considerable time: Find that the facts or circumstances have been proved which are relevant to relieve the parish of Caputh from the effect of the said admission: Find that the parish of Caputh was effectually bound by the said admission, and that the same is still effectual: Therefore allow the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses &c.

LINDSAY, HOWE, TYTLER, & CO., W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents

No. 79. ROBERT BALFOUR, Pursuer and Appellant.—Balfour—Moncrieff—SMITH AND LOGAN, Defenders and Respondents.—Asher—McKinnon
 Feb. 9, 1877.
 Balfour v.
 Smith and
 Logan.

Condictio indebiti—Essential Error—Bill of Exchange—Overpayment—Proof.—A raised an action against B and Co., contractors, whom he employed to execute joiner work, for repetition of £100, alleging that on March B had urgently requested payment of the balance of the account he stated to be £104, 19s.; that A being at the time at a distance from his place of business, and having no means of checking the statement, made payment of £4, 19s. in cash, and by bill for £100, receiving from B an acknowledgment of £1004, 19s., marked "settled," with a receipt in full of all demands for joiner work. That A, on getting his cheques from the bank on 2d April, discovered that he had paid B and Co. £1104, 19s., and mentioned the matter to the defenders, and that B and Co. then denied that they had received more than £1004, 19s., and that A had to retire the bill. B and Co., in their defence, stated that the £100 had been agreed to be paid for B acting as architect, and (1) that there was no relevant statement to support a condictio indebiti, and (2) that, as the payment was by bill, the proof must be restricted to the oath.

Held (1) that A's averments were relevant and sufficient to sustain the action, and (2) that proof prout de jure should be allowed.

Bill of Exchange—Value—Overpayment made by Bill—Bill of Exchange

*tion—Proof—Held, per Lord President and Lord Shand (dub. Lord Deas Lord Mure), that when a payment has been made by bill, which is after- No. 79.
s duly retired, the acceptor, in suing for repetition of the amount in the Feb. 9, 1877.
n the ground that the payment so made by the bill was made in error, was Balfour v.
e same position in regard to proof as if the payment had been made in Smith and Logan.*

It was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock at the 1st Division.
nce of Robert Balfour, cabinetmaker in Glasgow and Beith, against Sheriff of h and Logan, joiners in Beith, for recovery of a sum of £100, alleged Ayrahire.
ve been overpaid them on a contract for joiner work. M.

The pursuer's averments were;—That, in 1872, the defenders made offer acute for £1004, 19s. the joiner work of a new manufactory at Beith the pursuer was about to erect. Their offer was accepted by him, the work executed. That this sum of £1004, 19s. was the total ent of the defenders' claims against the pursuer up to and including March 1874. That, while the contract was in progress, the pursuer at six several times to the defenders in various sums £1000, the last these payments being on 9th February 1874. These payments to not were vouched either by the defenders' I O U's or by bank-notes and receipts, with the single exception of a payment by cheque £100 on 9th February 1874, for which the defenders had promised but not to send a receipt. That, on Saturday, 14th March, the defender called on the pursuer at his house in Beith, his works not being on that day. (Cond. 7.) "Mr Smith said that his was in need of cash to pay their workmen's wages that day, and asked out of the balance due to his firm on the account No. 14 of process, the balance he said was £104, 19s. The pursuer had no means at all, his books being in Glasgow (where his principal office was, and his business books were kept), to ascertain the amount of previous payments that had been made by him to the defenders, but he said to much that his impression was he did not owe the defenders so much £104, 19s., and asked if he, Mr Smith, had examined the markings of payments in the defenders' books, which he said that he had done just before coming down, and that the balance of £104, 19s. was correct."
The pursuer then paid the £104, 19s. demanded, £4, 19s. in cash, the remainder by his acceptance at four months for £100. At the time the pursuer received from the defender Smith an account, No.
process, for £1004, 19s. marked "settled, Smith and Logan, March 74," and gave Smith this holograph writing, No. 17 of process.—

I O U's that I may have got from you in place of receipts are cancelled by receipt in full of all demands regarding joiner con-for building workshops for me in Beith. ROBT. BALFOUR. To Smith and Logan, joiners, Beith." (Cond. 9.) "The said account is charged by the defenders in consideration of previous payments to them, and of their receiving on 14th March the said acceptance £100 and £4, 19s. in cash, and the said acceptance was granted by the defender and the said cash paid by him as the supposed balance remaining due to the pursuer to the defenders on said account, and the defender took the acceptance and cash as the balance of said account." That the pursuer was prevented from finding out the mistake for some days in consequence of having, on Monday, 16th March, to go on business to London where he was detained for more than a week, and farther, on his return home, by reason of the defenders having neglected to send a receipt received for the £100 paid on 9th February 1874. On getting up his accounts from the bank soon after 2d April, the date of the bank's balance, the pursuer at once perceived the mistake, and communicated with the

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Balfour v.
Smith and
Logan.

defenders. Not hearing anything from them, the pursuer, shortly before the bill of 14th March for £100 fell due, wrote to the defenders the following letter:—"Glasgow, 4th July 1874—Gentn.,—The bill I gave you some time ago, and which, as I shewed your Mr Smith by your receipts, was overpaid, falls due on 17th of this month. You will of course require to lift this bill, and I shall be glad to have a note from you per return stating that it is your intention to do so." On 15th July 1874 he wrote again in similar terms. To these letters no reply was received, and the pursuer was obliged to retire the bill when it fell due. Thereafter, and subsequently to the date of these letters, the pursuer and the defender Smith had two meetings on 5th and 7th September 1874 at the bar of the Court of Session. At these meetings Smith maintained that, inclusive of the acceptance for £100, he had received from the pursuer £1004, 19s. 6d. and not £1104, 19s. 6d. as the pursuer contended. "The payment of £100 by acceptance on 14th March 1874 was treated by the pursuer and defender Smith as a payment on account for the joiner work (No. 14 of process) and not on any other account whatever, nor was any other account or claim by the defenders against the pursuer than the account (No. 14 of process) spoken of as having been discharged and settled by the said acceptance or at the time the same was granted."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is entitled to restitution of the said sum of £100, with interest as concluded for, the said sum having been paid under an error in fact on the part of the pursuer. (2) The sum having been overpaid under circumstances in which the pursuer is not the means of ascertaining the true state of the defenders' account, the pursuer is entitled to repayment. (3) The defenders having contributed to the error in fact under which the said overpayment was made, are liable to repayment of the sums sued for.

The defenders denied the material statements of the pursuer, and maintained that the defender Mr Smith was an architect as well as a joiner, and that such had been employed by the pursuer to make plans and specifications for the buildings which he had lately been putting up in Beith, and to superintend their erection. That the usual architects' fees for such services would have far exceeded the sum of £100, but that the defenders had restricted their remuneration to this sum. (Stat. 3) "On the 14th March 1874 the defender Smith, who had prior to that date received £1000 to account of the items contained in the account, No. 14 of process, went to the pursuer's house for the purpose of receiving payment of the balance of £4, 19s. 6d., and also of getting his architect's fee adjusted. He explained to the pursuer that architects usually charge 5 per cent on the cost of erection of the buildings, but it was arranged between the parties that the defenders should receive the before-mentioned architect's fees, and the pursuer granted his bill for that amount, and the pursuer, in pursuance of process, and paid the balance of the account, No. 14, in cash to the parties thereupon granted mutual discharges to each other in connection with said contract, and extras or jobbings (Nos. 14 and 17)."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The summons is defective, and should be dismissed, in respect that it is not therein stated that the alleged payment was made by the pursuer to the defenders through ignorance or error. (2) Assuming that an overpayment, such as is alleged, had been made, the pursuer is precluded from seeking repetition, the error being solely imputable to his own gross negligence, as he could at all times, from documents in his possession, have ascertained what sums had been paid and had to pay. (4) A denial that defenders were overpaid by pursuer on the contract mentioned in the summons, or that the pursuer received the sum of £100 on 14th March 1874 towards payment the said sum was paid to defenders by bill for the plans, schedules, &c., No. 79. mentioned in article 2 of their statement of facts.

The Sheriff-substitute (Anderson) repelled the first plea for the defenders, sustained the relevancy of the action, and allowed parties a proof of their averments. Feb. 9, 1877. Balfour v. Smith and Logan.

The Sheriff (Campbell), on appeal, recalled this interlocutor, and found grounds of action as set forth on record not relevant or sufficient in to warrant the conclusions of the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Sheriff had held that as the mistake was blamable, and the pursuer had the means of avoiding it in his own hands, failed to use them, he was not entitled to recover, and he founded on Wilson and Maclellan v. Sinclair.¹ But the dicta in that case were obiter, did not state correctly the law of Scotland. It was not necessary that the mistake should be unavoidable. It was sufficient if the party claiming repetition had not (1) waived inquiry, (2) intended to make a donation, or (3) paid in implement of a natural obligation.² The law laid down in Wilson and Maclellan's case had been rejected even in England.³

Further, there was a sufficient averment which received support from the consideration of the document produced (and the present was an action of relevancy merely) that the mistake was induced by the suggestion of the defenders, or at least of one of them. That was sufficient in any view to entitle the pursuer to repetition.⁴

Argued for the defenders;—There was nothing to connect the settlement of the defenders' account with the granting of the bill. They were entitled to have the transactions looked at separately, and then it was seen what the bill really amounted to, namely, not a condictio indebiti, but an attempt to bind a bill and deprive it of its ordinary privilege. The pursuer's plea really meant not that he had made an overpayment, but that the bill was granted without value. This could only be proved by writ or oath. The bill was current, non-onerosity could in the ordinary case only be so proved. In the case where an exception had been made there had always been prima facie evidence of something suspicious. Mere averment was not sufficient. All that there was here was an averment on the one side that the bill had been granted in error, accompanied by the production of certain documents, and an averment on the other that the granting of the bill was an onerous transaction. There was nothing on record to raise a suspicion—nothing which in a suspension of a threatened charge would have warranted proof prout de jure. The present case must be treated as in the same position, otherwise the privilege accorded to a bill would be withdrawn so soon as it was retired, and the objection of non-onerosity, which on one day could only be proved by writ or oath, might the next be proved prout de jure. Farther, on the question of relevancy, this case came directly within the judgment in Wilson and Maclellan v. Sinclair. The pursuer here had means of knowledge, of

¹ 7, 1830, 4 W. and S. 398, 3 Scot. Jur. 123.

² 1, 7, 9; Ersk. 3, 3, 54; Brown v. Graham, March 7, 1848, 10 D.

³ See Leading Cases (7th ed.), vol. ii. pp. 421 and 427; Kelly v. Solari, Mees. and Wel. 54; Townsend v. Crowdy, 1860, 8 C. B. Rep. N. S. wall v. Tomlinson, 1871, L. R. 6 C. P. 405; Kendal v. Wood, 1871, Ex. 243.

⁴ See Monkland Canal Company, Sept. 17, 1831, 5 W. and S. 445, 4 D. 28.

Mon v. Taylor, Nov. 4, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 75.

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Balfour v.
Smith and
Logan.

which he did not avail himself, and could not now be heard to plead essential error caused by his own negligence.

Replied for the pursuer;—(1) He was in the same position now as he had paid in cash. The bill was removed by his retiring it, and the result was simply that, through whatever medium, the defenders had paid £100 too much. The law applicable to bills of exchange did not enter at all into the question. But (2) taking the argument as if the bill were still current, the averment was not that the bill was an accommodation bill in which case the question of value could probably only have been referred to writ or oath. But here the pursuer's case was that he had paid under essential error as to value; that he had believed he was granting a bill for value, when, in truth, he was not. Such a case was an exception to the general rule. Besides, there were circumstances appearing on the record, and on the productions, which raised a prima facie case of suspicion. In such cases the Court was in use to allow a proof at large.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that the pursuer was owing the defenders an account for joiner work amounting to £1004, 19s. And there is as little doubt that the whole of that account was paid, prior to 14th March 1874, in the various instalments set out on record, excepting the small balance of £4, 19s. That was the state of the account on 14th March 1874, when the pursuer and the defender Mr Smith met in Beith and made a settlement of the balance of that account. But, instead of then paying £4, 19s., the pursuer paid that he paid £104, 19s. in the circumstances condescended on.

Article 7 of the pursuer's condescendence sets forth—(reads article 7, supra, p. 455). It is further averred that the pursuer was much hurried in the day in question, being on the eve of leaving on a business visit to London. And he gives a satisfactory enough account of the lapse of time which elapsed before he found out the error which he had made.

When the mistake was ascertained, observe what followed, according to the pursuer's statement. He first made a verbal communication to the defender Mr Smith, who undertook to look into the matter, but took no further notice. He then wrote the letters of 4th and 15th July, which were not read. And lastly, there were the two meetings in September at the bank. Throughout the whole of this time, the pursuer avers, the defenders were satisfied that they were entitled to the payment of £104, 19s. made on March 14th on their account for joiner work, and for nothing else. They make no mention of any other claim against the pursuer, or that his acceptance of 14th March for £100 was given in settlement of any other claim distinct from their claim for joiner work.

The question is whether these averments of the pursuer are relevant to sustain an action of repetition of the £100 as paid under essential error. They are relevant for that purpose, and that the Sheriff is mistaken in his decision. It is quite true that a party, having made a payment

¹ Anderson v. Lorimer, Nov. 21, 1857, 20 D. 74, 30 Scot. Jur. 50; v. Taylor, Nov. 4, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 75; Smith v. Stark, Dec. 16, 1874, S. 150, 4 Scot. Jur. 191; Beveridge v. Henderson, Nov. 25, 1841, 4 Scot. Jur. 37; Macdonald v. Langton, Dec. 23, 1836, 15 S. 303, 9 D. 172; Bannatyne v. Wilson, Dec. 13, 1855, 18 D. 230, 28 Scot. Jur. 9; Bell v. Dryden, Nov. 25, 1824, 3 S. 320; Hunter v. Georges's Trustees, 13, 1834, 7 W. and S. 333, 6 Scot. Jur. 312.

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.

Balfour v.
Smith and
Logan.

before he can recover, shew that the error was not induced by his own mistake, but was due to adverse circumstances, or to the proceedings of the other party. If, however, the averments of the pursuer here are true, the error was wholly brought about by the statement of the defender Mr Smith, and if made as averred in article 7 of the pursuer's condescendence they are true, and false in the knowledge of the defender. To say that that is not sufficient to sustain the relevancy of the action is most startling.

The defender has suggested in debate that an additional difficulty is introduced by the payment having been made by bill and not in cash. Had the payment been made in cash I think there would have been no more to say. What I ask, is the peculiar effect of payment by bill? It is merely to postpone receipt of the cash by the payee during the currency of the bill. At the time of the four months in the present case the defender was to recover, and he got £100, which was just £100 in excess of his claim on his account with the bank. I am therefore at a loss to see what difficulty is introduced by payment having been made by bill. If we were here in a question with an acceptor, or between drawer and payee, during the currency of the bill, undoubtedly the acceptor would not be able to refuse payment except on a plea of non value by writ or oath, unless, indeed, he could qualify circumstances so as to enable him to overcome the strict rule. But the bill has been retired by the acceptor paying the sum due on it. Now, it seems to me that the privilege of retiring bills and promissory-notes must be something very different from what we have always understood it to be if it can interfere with the course of law in a case like the present.

When a bill is retired by the acceptor when it falls due, what more does the holder want? Is it not just as if he had got cash at the time the bill fell due? If he got through error more than he should have got, what is the difference between his getting it in actual cash or through the medium of a bill? He has therefore, been able to see no specialty in the case. The question still remains whether the sum paid by bill by the pursuer to the defender was due, or whether it was paid under error such as will entitle the pursuer to recover. The averments are sufficient. But of course they must be proved. I am, therefore, recalling this interlocutor, and sending the case to proof in the ordinary way.

DEAS.—As regards the relevancy of the action I certainly think it was necessary that something more should be said than merely that an overpayment had been made. But I think the vagueness of the summons in this respect was amply supplied by the statements in the condescendence, and therefore that the defender was wrong in throwing out the action as irrelevant.

The fact, however, of the payment having been by a bill raises a question of immateriality with respect to the mode of proof. The account, which bears to have been led on 14th March, does not shew on the face of it when and in what way partial payment had been made.

It had been the practice to receive and credit, in an account current, bills when discounted as partial payments, and to restore the contents to the debit account when the bills were not duly retired by the proper debtor, there has been room for regarding the bills as mere items in the account current, and not entitled to the extraordinary privileges of bills of exchange. But there is nothing of that kind here. The payments by the appellant were sometimes

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Balfour v.
Smith and
Logan.

made in cash and sometimes by cheques on his bank account. A peculiar mode of acknowledging the payments was occasionally adopted by the respondents, granting their I O U's in place of receipts, and afterwards receiving back the I O U's cancelled. But that peculiarity does not affect the present question. The material fact bearing on the mode of proof is that the bill referred to is only bill, so far as appears, which passed between the parties. It was given subsequent to the last item charged for work in the account, and bears the words "for value received," and not "for value in account." These circumstances are strong in favour of the defenders' right to stand upon the bill as proof of debt, unless gainsayed by their writ or oath.

I am not satisfied that because the bill was ultimately taken up from the account by the pursuer this made the defenders' position with respect to the mode of proof no better than if the question had been one of error in making a payment. In a question with the bank the pursuer could not avoid making the bill. There was no error in making that payment. The error, if there was one, was in granting the bill; and in dealing with that question of error, the court disposed to assume that the defenders are in the position of having their claim vouched by a bill, so that an exceptional case must be made out against them to deprive them of that advantage. But, taking the case so, I have come to the conclusion that this is one of those exceptional cases in which proof by bill is admissible. Among the circumstances which lead me to this conclusion are the following:—

First, The defenders' averment of value in the record is accompanied by an allegation of specific value, viz., in architect's fees, said to be incurred by Mr Smith, one of their partners, and communicable by him to the firm.

Second, Nevertheless, there is no distinct averment of the employment of Mr Smith as an architect in the record. The claim is rather rested thereon as a general employment.

Third, It is quite common for builders to furnish sketches or plans of buildings as were here contemplated, on condition of getting the work done. I looked at what are called the plans in process, and they appear to me to be of the kind I have mentioned. There is no plan among them bearing the signature of either by an architect or anybody else. There is not even a signed specification. The plans, such as they are, are apparently by different hands, and many of the so-called specifications are just unsigned pencil notes, all very much as might be expected where the tradesmen had undertaken to supply their own plans.

Fourth, It has been attempted by the defenders to represent that the meeting of 14th March, at which the account for joiner work was settled and granted, was really a meeting for the purpose of settling Mr Smith's account as architect. But it is not alleged that any account for these fees had been rendered or that any discharge for them was given in exchange for the bill.

Lastly, The letters of July tell against the defenders. It is inexplicable if the true state of matters had been what they now aver, no claim should have been asserted to architect's fees, and not a word of answer, denial, or explanation given by the defenders to the pursuer's calls upon them to retire the bill as overpayment.

Putting all these things together, and taking the case as one of privilege in granting to a bill, I still think that there is enough to take it out of the grasp of writ or oath, and to authorise an allowance of proof before answer jura.

LORD MURE.—On the first point I have no doubt that there is here a relevant set out in the record. I have looked into the judgment of Lord Brougham in the case of Wilson and Maclellan, and I can find nothing in that judgment, taken by itself, which can be held to foreclose the pursuer from asking a full averment. But in the subsequent case of Dixons v. The Monkland and Company, 5 Wil. and Shaw, p. 447, Lord Brougham uses expressions which seem to me exactly to meet the present case. He there says,—“I do not think that it is necessary, in order to dispose of this case, to raise the general question whether a party can recover money paid under a mistake in law, or without the knowledge of all the facts, when there is nothing against good conscience in retaining the money—that is to say, where the payer has not been induced to pay by any ignorance impressed upon him, as it were, by the person owing it to be paid, or any other fraudulent interposition which would make contrary to a good conscience for him to retain it.” Now, there is here, I think, a sufficient averment of ignorance impressed upon the pursuer by Smith. There is a distinct statement by the pursuer that he was in doubt whether the sum claimed was due, that he had not his books at command to examine, and that he was assured by one of the defenders that the sum was due, and that on trusting he paid it. That, I think, is quite sufficient to satisfy even the most liberal interpretation of the judgments in the cases above referred to.

On the second question, there is more difficulty, from the fact of a bill having been used in one view, the medium of payment. But looking to the facts, so far as they appear on the pleadings and productions, I think the difficulty disappears. A bill was certainly granted. It was discounted, and subsequently retired by the bank, the money having been paid by the bank to the defenders, and the question raised is whether by means of that bill an overpayment was made by the pursuer to the defenders. Now, there is no doubt that a payment to the bank on account of the bill was made over and above the sum due on the account for joiner work. The defenders, however, say that the payment represented by the bill was not on account of joiner work at all but of Smith's services as architect, and that, in respect of the bill, this alleged transaction can only be inquired into by writ or oath. But the way in which this comes out as alleged in the record, coupled with the other circumstances, and particularly the fact that the bill is drawn by Smith and Logan, while the contents are alleged to be a payment to Smith alone, raises, to my mind, a very special case, and a description which, even if the question had been raised in a suspension of the bill, would, I think, have fallen under the exception to the rule, and in which a proof at large, but before answer, would have been allowed on the authority of the class of cases of which York v. Gossman, 23 D. and Smith v. Little, 8 D. p. 265, are illustrations. That being so, the pursuer is not, I think, in a worse position in the matter of proof than he would be if the alleged overpayment had been made directly in cash.

SHAND.—I concur in your Lordships' judgment.

On the first point, I cannot doubt that the statements made in article 7 of the pursuer's condescendence are relevant. Assuming the correctness of these statements, the defender obtained the overpayment in consequence of his own misstatements, which were erroneous. If a tradesman, by sending in his account for payment, and thus by plain implication representing it to be still due, obtains payment twice, it is surely too plain for argument that he could

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Balfour v.
Smith and Logan.

No. 79.

Feb. 9, 1877.
Balfour v.
Smith and
Logan.

not be heard to maintain that he was entitled to keep the money because if customer had examined his vouchers he would have found the first receipt, and avoided the mistake. The present case is substantially the same. The money is said to have been paid under the mistaken belief, in fact, that it had not been paid already. If that be established the pursuer is entitled to repayment; I may add that, in my opinion, the fact that the defenders' representations induced the error is not essential to the pursuer's success. The defender has no right to retain money paid to him under a mistake in fact, which is the case in this.

I am satisfied that the sound rule applicable to such cases is that stated by Mr Justice Williams in the case of Townsend v. Crowdy thus:—"Since the case of Kelly v. Solari it has been established that it is not enough that the pursuer has the means of learning the truth, if he had chosen to make inquiry. The limitation now is that he must not waive all inquiry."

On the second question, whether the pursuer is shut up to proof by oath, I am quite clear that he would not be so in a reduction of the bill on the ground that it had been granted under error as stated on the record. If the averments are relevant, and a reduction is not insisted in, is there any reason for limiting his proof while you give him his full remedy in this action? I think not.

But apart from this, the bill no longer stands in the way as an operative bill. It is now merely a piece of evidence which is mainly useful for showing how the alleged overpayment was made. Therefore, though conceding that the bill is not a bill, and that had we been dealing with the bill during its currency, and that out a reduction in an action for payment, there would have been a bar to the proof to writ or oath, I hold that the bill being out of the way of nothing to preclude a proof at large of the footing on which the overpayment was made, though made in the form of a bill.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and remitted the bill to him to allow the parties a proof of their averments in common.

JOHN CARMENT, S.S.C.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 80.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Clift v. Portobello Pier Co.

HENRY CLIFT, Appellant.—Campbell Smith.

THE PORTOBELLO PIER COMPANY, Respondents.—Kinnear—A. J. Kinnear.

Public Houses Regulation Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. c. 58, secs. 19 and 20).—Transfer of Certificate—Master and Servant.—A public company, as part of a refreshment room, engaged a manager on a written contract of service of the conditions of which was that he was to apply in his own name for a license to sell exciseable liquors on their premises, which license he was bound to assign to such person or persons as the directors may require. His engagement was terminable at a month's notice by either party. He obtained the license at the company's expense, and during its currency was summarily dismissed without a month's notice. The company applied to the Sheriff for an order that he should assign the license to their nominee.

Held (1) (dub. Lord Shand) that, even if rightfully dismissed without notice, he was not bound to execute an assignation of the license, which could only be transferred by the act of the licensing magistrates; but (2) that as the license was the property of his employers, he was bound to deliver it up to them if wrongfully dismissed.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
M.

ON 2d May 1876 Henry Clift was engaged by the Portobello Pier Company, on a formal written contract of service, to act as manager of their refreshment room. His engagement was to commence at 1st June 1876 and to be terminable by either party on a month's notice in writing.

was one of the conditions of the contract that Clift should apply for No. 80.
 tificate and license for the sale of exciseable liquors in the company's shment rooms, "which he shall be bound to assign to such person or ns as the directors may require."

Feb. 10, 1877.
 Clift v. Porto-bello Pier Co.

ift accordingly applied for and obtained a certificate and license to from 15th May 1876 to 15th May 1877.

126th June 1876 Clift was dismissed from the service of the Porto-Pier Company without notice,—as he asserted, unjustifiably,—and as ompany maintained, for sufficient fault.

these circumstances the Portobello Pier Company presented a petiin the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Clift, praying the Sheriff ally to "ordain the respondent to assign and deliver the said certifi-and license to and in name of D. S. Fraser, who has been appointed amateur in room of the respondent."

he respondent pleaded in defence;—(1) The petitioners' statements not relevant or sufficient to support the prayer. (2) The application competent. (3) The respondent having been improperly dismissed, bound to assign the license. And (4) It is contrary to public policy the prayer of the petition should be granted.

he Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 10th July 1876, pronounced this leucator:—"Finds that on 2d May last the respondent became the oners' pier-master and manager, under an engagement terminable by party at a month's notice in writing: Finds that on 27th June last tioners dismissed the respondent without such notice: Finds that ult of any justification of this step, the same must be held illegal, violation of the contract between the parties: Finds that the petibeing in breach of one part of their engagement, are not entitled to against the respondent another part thereof: Further, et separatim, that the engagement between the parties not having been brought close habili modo, the same must be held as subsisting, as also pondent's right to hold and retain the certificate and license in as an incident thereof: Therefore, and in respect of the foregoing ga, sustains the defences to the foregoing effect: Dismisses the peti-Finds the respondent entitled to expenses," &c.

1 Sheriff (Davidson), on appeal, on 14th July 1876, pronounced this cutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the dent has been dismissed from the service of the petitioners, and is bound to assign the certificate and license, which he obtained servant, to such person or persons as they may require: Thereterns and ordains the respondent forthwith to assign and deliver l certificate and license as craved: Finds the respondent liable in 20," &c.

respondent appealed to the Court of Session.

ed for the appellants:—

That was demanded from him by the respondents was that he execute a deed which would have no legal validity. A transfer cense could only be effected by the licensing magistrates in the provided by the Home Drummond Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 58), secs.
 120. They had inserted in their agreement of service a con-which was contrary to public policy, and could not therefore be
 d. The petition should therefore be refused. 2. Even if the conwas legal, it was a part of a mutual contract, and a party to such who had failed to implement his part, as the respondents had y dismissing him without notice, could not sue for implement of posite part.

ued for the respondents;—Such a deed as they required the appel-

No. 80. lant to sign was necessary under the circumstances to enable them to maintain a transfer of the license to their new manager, in terms of the statutory enactment founded on by the appellant. He had been dismissed without sufficient fault, and was therefore not entitled to notice, but he was thereby absolved from his obligations under the contract.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Clift v. Portobello Pier Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If, after Clift had been dismissed by the Portobello Company, they had in simple terms requested him to hand over the certificate by which he was entitled to sell spirits on their premises, I should have thought that they were quite entitled to make the demand. I agree in the conclusion that when a servant is dismissed, under whatever circumstances this may be, he is bound to leave behind him whatever is the property of his master. The certificate was the property of the company, although it was taken in the name of Clift. But they have mistaken their position, and have presented a petition the prayer of which, as it stands, we cannot in any circumstances grant. The petitioners have mistaken their remedy. No man is entitled to assign a certificate for the sale of spirits. The only way in which it can be transferred is by act of the licensing magistrates, just as some kinds of property may be transferred by decree of this Court which cannot be assigned. The petitioners seek their right under the contract, that the assignment shall be granted, and it was given in terms of the prayer of the petition Clift would be bound to assign the certificate to Donald S. Fraser. No doubt, under the contract he was to assign the certificate,—that is, he was bound to do so if he could; and if it were in his power to assign it, there is a great deal of force in the contention that his masters are not entitled to enforce that part of the contract which they do not perform their own part of it. But I do not think that the company can assign the certificate. It was the property of the company, and I think, therefore, they are entitled to have delivery of it; but I do not think that they are entitled to ask that it shall be assigned to them.

I am, therefore, disposed to advise your Lordships to pronounce an order for delivery of the certificate. But inasmuch as the company have mistaken their remedy, they must be held liable in expenses.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. The petitioners aver that—"By the said contract it was agreed that the respondent should apply for a certificate and license for the sale of liquors, which certificate and license he is bound to assign to such person or persons as the petitioners, through their directors, should require." He applied for the certificate, and it appears to me that he did so practically as the servant of the company. It is true that therefore the certificate was their property. If the company had given him a month's notice of his dismissal, and demanded the certificate, it is clear that he had no power to retain it. If the petitioners thought that the possession of the certificate would be a facility for their obtaining a transfer they were entitled to get it.

I do not, however, concur in your Lordship's view that assignment is an incompetent form of dealing with the certificate. It is true that no assignment is complete and effectual without the sanction of the licensing magistrates, but if the employers thought that the transfer of the certificate would be facilitated by an assignment, it was, I think, competent to stipulate for this. As, however, copy of the certificate is enough for the pursuers' purpose, I am not disposed to differ on that point.

I do not think it makes any difference that the petitioner was dismissed on a notice and without justification. A contract of service is peculiar in this respect, that although the parties to it may stipulate for notice, yet the master terminate the contract at any time, and the servant is then bound to leave service. He cannot longer insist in remaining in the house, or office, or other premises of the master, against the master's will; but must make his pecuniary arrangements, and if necessary enforce it. On the day Clift left the company's service he was bound to give up the certificate, and also, in my opinion, to assign it if not subject to the condition that the assignation should only be acted on in effect of obtaining the transfer by the magistrates. If the petition had been remedied to this limited effect I should have been disposed to give it; but that the certificate should be assigned to Donald S. Fraser, without making that Fraser was not at once to act upon it, and to continue to do so without any transfer by the magistrates. This might possibly have exposed the petition to serious consequences. I am not, therefore, prepared to grant the prayer of the petition without qualification, and with that result.

As to the question of expenses I am not disposed to differ. But, looking to the facts of defence, which shew that the defender claimed a right of property in the certificate, I rather think no expenses should have been allowed to either

No. 80.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Clift v. Portobello Pier Co.

His interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated respectively the 10th and 14th July 1876: Decern and ordain the appellant to deliver to the respondents, the Portobello Pier Company, the certificate mentioned in the record: Find the respondents, the Portobello Pier Company, liable to the appellant in expenses, both in the Sheriff Court and in this Court," &c.

THOS. LAWSON, S.S.C.—W. N. MASTERTON, S.L.—Agents.

ANDER GREIG (Inspector of New Deer), First Party.—Asher—Jameson.

No. 81.

ROSS (Inspector of Nigg), Second Party.—Kinnear—Taylor Innes.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Greig v. Ross.

Settlement of Illegitimate Child—Forsfamiliation.—Held that an illegitimate child, living apart from his mother, on attaining the age of puberty was forsfamiliated, and had then a settlement in his own right in the parish in which he resided.

Settlement.—Held that permanent disability to earn a livelihood, when incurred with mental incapacity, did not prevent a pupil from having a settlement in his own right when he reached the age of puberty and was forsfamiliated.

ROSS or PIRIE, who was the illegitimate son of Alexandrina Ross, born in the parish of Nigg on 5th May 1860. He lived with his mother in Nigg from his birth until October 1868. His mother was in service a year after his birth, but contributed to his maintenance until his marriage to George Robertson, in 1868, when George Ross went to Nigg with her and her husband, first in Aberdeen, and afterwards in Glasgow. George Ross, while supported by his mother's husband, earned a salary varying from 2s. 6d. to 4s. a-week. In September 1871, when

2D DIVISION.
I.

No. 81. George was eleven years and four months old, he met with an accident from which he never fully recovered. Robertson died in November 1872, having his settlement in New Deer. George continued to live with and be supported by his mother until February 1873, when his mother's mother took him to her house in the parish of Raheen. Immediately on his arrival there application was made on his behalf for parochial relief, as having no occupation, and being wholly disabled. On 6th March 1873 he was ordered by the inspector to be committed to the poorhouse, and this order was confirmed by the parish board on 26th April. His grandmother refused to send him to the poorhouse, and, with occasional charitable assistance, supported him in her house until 24th December 1874, when he was allowed to go out. He was then fourteen years and seven months old. Statutory notice of this relief was given to the parish of Nigg, as the parish of his birth, and to the parish of New Deer, as the parish in which was his mother's settlement as derived from her husband. The inspectors of these parishes presented a special case to the Court setting forth the above facts, and submitting the following questions:—“(1) Whether the pauper, George, or Pirie, is chargeable on the parish of Nigg as the parish of his birth? Or (2) Whether said pauper is chargeable on the parish of New Deer as the parish of his mother's settlement?”

Argued for the first party;—A legitimate child, whose father was living on attaining puberty, had its settlement in its birth parish, and retained the settlement derived from its father.¹ An illegitimate child took its derivative settlement from its mother;² but the tie was severed on the child becoming a minor pubes. There being no patria potestas the child then had a settlement in his own right in the parish of his birth.

Argued for the second party;—(1) It was admitted that at the age of puberty the child took his settlement from his mother, and his settlement was not lost by the child attaining the age of puberty. In the case of Craig, founded on, the child had been for some years in the mother's house. Its father had been dead for some time.³ More was the case of a legitimate child, which was in a different position than that of an illegitimate child. This child had been maintained by his mother until he was fourteen years old, and the mere fact of his attaining fourteen years of age did not make him independent. The mere fact of the death of a child's father had been said by Judges, by a majority and minority in Craig's⁴ case, not to emancipate the child when he had attained puberty. That point could not therefore be said to have been settled in that case. In other cases, however, it had been said that the mere attaining of puberty did not forisfamiliate or emancipate a child.⁵ The mother was held to come into the father's place on his death, as head of the family.⁶ (2) An offer of the poorhouse

¹ Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, July 18, 1863, 1 Macph. 1172, 35 Scot. Jur. 670.

² Hay v. Thomson, Feb. 6, 1856, 18 D. 510, 28 Scot. Jur. 191; Cairns v. Adamson, Feb. 28, 1863, 1 Macph. 452, 35 Scot. Jur. 286.

³ Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, supra, Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion.

⁴ Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, supra, Lord Ormisdale, p. 1189, 35 Scot. Jur. 1194.

⁵ Fraser v. Robertson, June 5, 1867, 5 Macph. 819, 39 Scot. Jur. 435; nan v. Waite, June 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 908, 44 Scot. Jur. 496.

⁶ Ferrier v. Kennedy, Feb. 8, 1873, 11 Macph. 402, Lord Deas, 40 Scot. Jur. 274.

to this pauper before he attained puberty, and in that case he must id to have been pauperised as a pupil, in which circumstances*the h of his mother's settlement was liable.

No. 81.
 Feb. 10, 1877.
 Greig v. Ross.

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the pauper was born on 5th May 1860 in parish of Nigg. He therefore attained puberty on 6th May 1874. In 1874 he was allowed out-door relief in the parish of Rosskeen, where his mother resided. The question is, whether his birth parish, Nigg, or Ferrier, the parish of his mother's derivative settlement, is to be liable in to the parish of Rosskeen for the period of his chargeability.

As illegitimate, as long as he was in pupillarity the parish of the pauper's birth was the parish of settlement of his mother. The mother here was married to another man than the father of the pauper, so she took the settlement of her husband, and although that husband died before this child attained puberty that cannot be of any moment.

An ordinary case, where a legitimate child lives in family with its father and the father dies while it is still a pupil, on attaining the years of majority the child is forisfamiliarised. That is the case of Craig v. Greig and the decision which is of the greater importance because there was a dissenting opinion, which caused the point to be most carefully considered; in questions of this kind it is chiefly important to discover what has been ingeniously argued in this case that as the child was illegitimate the settlement of his mother's husband could have no effect in forisfamiliarising him, and the decision of Greig v. Macdonald did not apply. But the mere fact of there being such thing as patria potestas in the case of an illegitimate child brings the case more clearly under the general rule, that where a child attains the age of majority, and becomes a minor pubes, the parish of his birth becomes his parish, and he loses the derivative settlement which he had during his pupillarity.

In the case of Ferrier, Lord Deas doubted whether, in the case of a father dying and leaving the mother as head of a family of pupil children resident with her, the children would become forisfamiliarised by the mere fact of attaining majority; but in this case there is no necessity for considering that question, as the pauper was not resident with his mother when he became chargeable.

It is said that this pauper, at the age of eleven, received an injury, which has rendered him incapable of maintaining himself, and it was argued with much force that that injury occurring in pupillarity was similar to lunacy or idiocy, and prevented the pauper acquiring a settlement for himself, and that his settlement must continue that of his mother. I do not think that is so.
 The incapacity of a lunatic or imbecile to acquire a settlement is not because he is unable to support himself, but because he has no mind, and can do nothing to acquire a settlement.

On the whole matter, I think we should unsettle the law if we answered these questions otherwise than the first in the affirmative and the second in the nega-

THE LORDS.—It has been authoritatively settled in the case of Craig v.
Macdonald, 18th July 1863 (1 Macph. 1172), that the settlement

No. 81. of a pauper boy seventeen years of age, whose father died when he was in pupillarity, was his own birth parish, and not the birth parish of his father, although the latter had been the pauper's settlement so long as he was in pupillarity.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Greig v. Ross.

The only material difference between that case and the present is that in the former the pauper there was a legitimate child while here he is an illegitimate child. But to see how this difference can be held to affect the question to be disposed of. A legitimate child takes the settlement of his father so long as he is in pupillarity; but in the case referred to, of Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, it was determined that his own birth parish becomes his settlement immediately on attaining the age of puberty, the father having previously died. Now, in the place of the father having died while the pauper was in pupillarity, in the present case the law he had no father, and consequently he had for his settlement from the beginning the birth parish of his mother; but I can see no reason why it should continue to be his settlement after he attained the age of puberty, more than that the birth settlement of the father should not have continued to be the settlement of a legitimate son after he had attained the age of puberty, as was determined in the case of Craig. The patria potestas, or paternal authority, never existed in the present case, and in the case of Craig it had not even existed while the pauper was still in pupillarity. In both cases, however, the pauper's mother survived the date when the pauper attained the age of puberty, and was alive when he became chargeable; and in both, also, the pauper was to have been, for some time before he became chargeable, unable from physical weakness to maintain himself, and was to some extent supported by his mother, but in neither does it appear that the pauper was afflicted with mental incapacity.

In these circumstances, I feel myself bound to hold that the pauper in the present case, on his attaining the age of puberty, lost his mother's settlement, and therefore that the first alternative question submitted to the Court must be answered in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and I rest my opinion exclusively upon the case of Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, which was a judgment of the whole Court, and which I think virtually decides the present case. In the case of Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, a father, who had no residential settlement, but whose birth settlement, died leaving a pupil son. This son survived pupillarity, and at the age of seventeen became chargeable as a pauper, and the majority of the whole Court held that the son was forisfamiliated, had lost his father's settlement through his father, and had acquired, at the date of becoming chargeable, a new settlement in the parish of his own birth. I cannot distinguish that case from the present. Here the father, instead of being dead, is entirely unknown to the law, the pauper is regarded as filius nullius, and he certainly never was under the patria potestas. Now, although an illegitimate child, while in pupillarity follows his mother's settlement, this does not apply when the child has attained the age at which, and is in circumstances in which, he could earn his own maintenance. If after this he becomes a pauper without having acquired a residential settlement, then I think it is the parish of his own birth, and not his mother's birth, which is liable.

There was a question raised as to whether the chargeability of this pauper should not draw back in point of time to the date of the offer to receive the poorhouse. An offer of that sort, however, will not fix chargeability, unless it be accepted. Such an offer is in fact often used as a test as to whether a pauper really requires parochial relief or not, and if the offer is rejected this is taken as proving that no chargeability has arisen.

No. 81.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Greig v. Ross.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find (1st) that the pauper, George Ross or Pirie, is chargeable on the parish of Nigg as the parish of his birth; (2d) that he is not chargeable on the parish of New Deer, the parish of his mother's settlement: Find the party of the second part liable in expenses," &c.

STUART & CHEYNE, W.S.—MACGREGOR & ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS WOODHEAD, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—Moncreiff.
GARTNESS MINERAL COMPANY, Defenders.—Asher—Mackintosh.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

Personal Servant—Reparation—Master's liability for fault of servant.—By a majority of seven Judges, diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk), that the rule which imposes upon a master responsibility for injury caused by the fault of a servant, while employed in his service, applies only in cases where the person injured is a stranger, not connected with the work in which the servant is engaged, and that in other cases the master is only responsible for personal

Contract Servant—Reparation—Common Employment—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 76.—A miner in the employment of a contractor driving a level in a mine belonging to a company, whose manager and assistant manager were in charge of the mine, was killed owing to the negligence of the underground manager, who was admittedly a competent person. The case was conducted under special rules in compliance with the Coal Mines Regulation Act. In an action of damages at the instance of the miner's father against the company, held (by a majority of seven Judges), that the company was liable, as the miner, by becoming a member of the organisation of the company, taken upon himself the risk of injury from the fault of other members of the company for redress except against the person in fault—(diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) who held that the company were responsible for the proper execution of their part of the work, by their servants, to the contractor and his Observation (per Lord President) that in cases of common employment the employer is free from responsibility, not because the injured and injurer are both his own hired and paid servants, but because he is not personally in fault, and that he warranted the injured workman against the perils of the work.

Observations on the rules culpa tenet suos auctores, and qui facit per alium tenetur.

Reparation.—Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that, as it is now the law, however independent a contract may be, if the work is a common one, the contractor cannot be made liable unless his servants be incompetent or his supervision insufficient, an issue should not be allowed unless there are averments in support of either of these points.

THOMAS WOODHEAD, miner, Airdrie, raised an action of damages against the Gartness Mineral Company, concluding for £1000 as damages due to him by them as having caused the death of his son, David Woodhead, a miner, in their pit No. 2 at Airdrie on 19th July 1876.

2D DIVISION,
with four consulted Judges.
1.

The defenders pleaded that the accident was not caused through their negligence.

The case was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on 22d July 1876, on an issue as to whether the death of David Woodhead

No. 82.
 Feb. 10, 1877.
 Woodhead v.
 Gartness
 Mineral Co.

occurred through the fault of the defenders. The facts of the case as appeared from the evidence led were as follows:—In June 1875 Gartness Mineral Company had sunk their pit No. 2 to the depth of working level, east and west. Having to make some alterations at pit-head they discharged their miners, of whom David Woodhead one, but at the same time they entered into a contract with two men Samuel and George Gardner, to drive the east level—the west being already exhausted—at fixed rates per ton for coal and per fathom for cutting roads, &c. This contract was signed on 22d June 1875, the Gardners commenced working under it on 24th June with six miners employed on three shifts of eight hours each. David Woodhead was one of the miners so employed by the Gardners. At the same time the company entered into another contract with a different contractor to continue the sinking of the shaft of the pit, and these two operations were conducted simultaneously. The pit shaft was divided by a vertical partition, the north division being used by the miners employed in the east level, and the south division by the sinkers. At the west level the miners' division of the shaft was boarded over so as to form a cage-seat for the cage to rest upon when it came down. The shaft in which the cage worked nearest to the coal face was distant four feet from that face, the flue of the furnace coming between the cage and the shaft. This open space at the side of the shaft and between the cage and the shaft was partially covered by a plank five feet long, and nine inches broad, which formed a connection along the side of the shaft between the east and west levels. The rest of the space consisted of an opening five inches wide for ventilation, and a ledge a few inches high along which it was just possible to walk. The miners were in the habit of crossing from the east to the west level by the plank above mentioned when they went to breakfast at the furnace at the west level, or to go into the cage from the west side, or to put hutches on to the cage at the west side. As the sinkers were in the pit for sixteen hours out of twenty-four, full hutches were only raised to the pit-head when the sinkers were away, and so full hutches used to accumulate at the pit-head and were transferred from the east level to the west to await the sinkers being raised.

The Gartness Company had an underground manager or agent named Colin Beveridge, who was employed in the various pits of the company looking after the works. On 19th July the contractor for the shaft applied to have the shaft better ventilated, and Beveridge, who

* "Gartness Colliery, 22d June 1875.—I hereby offer to drive the east level (double or treble shifting the same when required) a distance of 10 fathoms, 6 feet wide, and to brush to sandstone rib a height of about 4 feet for the sum of 7s. per fathom, and 2s. per ton for coal (clean) delivered on the cage at the pit-bottom; also to drive your dook a distance of 10 fathoms (double or treble shifting when required) 6 feet wide, and brushing to sandstone rib a height of 4½ feet or thereby, for the sum of 10s. per fathom, and 2s. per ton of clean coal, delivered on the cage at pit-bottom; also to put places off the level at 3s. 6d. per fathom, and 2s. per ton for clean coal delivered on the cage at pit-bottom.

"I likewise agree to put on a bottomer, you allowing me 2s. 6d. per fathom the same; and I further agree to brush and keep the working-places at the level (overhead) of output, the coal from level and dook excepted.

"These rates to be increased or diminished ten per cent for every fall of rise or fall on the wages during the contract.

"Messrs The Gartness Mineral Company (Limited)."

SAMUEL GARDNER

ers of Ormiston, the manager of the pit, proceeded, in order to create No. 82.
 after draught, to take up the plank above mentioned which covered space at the side of the cage between the east and west levels. Feb. 10, 1877.
 rly after this was done the miners on the shift at work in the east Woodhead v.
 came to the pit-bottom to be taken to the surface, and when David Gartness Woodhead was proceeding as usual, in ignorance of the plank being re- Mineral Co.
 moved, to cross to the west level in order to get in at the west side of the he fell into the uncovered hole and down the shaft, a distance of it ten fathoms, and was killed.

was proved that copies of special rules framed in accordance with on 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 76, posted up in the pit, and that David Woodhead had signed a copy the rules. The pay-sheets between the Gardners and the Gartness Company contained certain deductions from the amounts paid for "mid" and "doctor." The Gartness Company adduced evidence to show that it was a common practice for coalmasters to let certain in the mines to contractors, who employed and paid their own men; and that it was also common for individual miners to employ their own drawers—indeed that that was the most common arrangement. School fees and medical attendance were in these cases kept off the contractors or off the miners, and in regard to school fees and every-else the drawers were treated as workmen in the pit exactly the same as the others. The parties admitted that Colin Beveridge was a competent person for his duty, and that the appointments of the colliery were sufficient. At the time when the accident occurred no bottomer was engaged by the Gardners, but the defenders averred that Samuel himself acted as bottomer, and that they had credited them with accordingly. Evidence was led to the effect that if Gardner was as bottomer he knew of the plank being removed, and should have warned Woodhead of the risk he ran.

The defenders produced at the trial special rules framed under the Mines Regulation Act," and founded upon the 52d section of that Act in the terms of many of the special rules, as shewing that all the men in the mine were under the control of the owners, and that they were engaged in a common work.*

The following were the section of the Act and the special rules particularly in 36 Vict. cap. 76, sec. 52—"There shall be established in every mine in which this Act applies such rules (referred to in this Act as special rules) for the conduct and guidance of the persons acting in the management of the mine or employed in or about the same, as, under the particular state and circumstances of such mine may appear best calculated to prevent dangerous accidents and to provide for the safety and proper discipline of the persons acting in or about the mine, and such special rules, when established, shall be observed by the inspector who is inspector of the district at the time when they are established, and shall be observed in and about every such mine in the manner as if they were enacted in this Act.

Every person who is bound to observe the special rules established for any mine in contravention of or fails to comply with any of such special rules shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and also the owner, agent, and manager of such mine, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, having regard to the best of his power enforcing the said rules as regulating the working of the mine so as to prevent such contravention or non-observance, shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Rules.—"In these special rules the word 'agent' means a person having, by the owner, care and direction of any mine, or of any part thereof, and

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

"The Lord Justice-Clerk charged the jury, and gave the following directions:—

"1. That it is not a sufficient ground in law to exclude liability superior to the manager; the word 'manager' means the certificated manager of the Act, and includes the plural as well as singular; the word 'overman' means a person employed and acting under the manager, and includes plural as well as singular; the word 'miners' means every person employed in the mine, in cutting, or excavation, or removal of coal, ironstone, shale, fire-clay, or other minerals, metals, or materials.

"2. Generally the mine (or division of the same, when divided in terms of the statute) to which the manager has been appointed, shall be under the control and daily supervision of the manager, whose duty it shall be to carry out and see carried out the various provisions of the Act, so far as incumbent on him, or on those acting under his control and directions, and to see that sufficient materials and appliances are always provided for the proper carrying out of all necessary operations.

"3. Subject to the control and supervision of the manager the whole of the operative details shall be under the care and charge of the overman. The overman shall see that the workmen of every class, in their several departments, discharge their duties; and shall receive and attend to all reports made to him as to the state of repair of the air-courses, machinery, mid-wall, trap-doors, roads, and working-places. He shall cause remedies to be provided when required, and shall see the general and special rules faithfully and vigorously carried out, and he shall have power to hire and discharge workmen.

"5. He shall attend to the ventilation, in terms of general rule No. 1, and the observance of the other general rules in sec. 51, so far as these, from their nature, can be observed by himself, or fall to be observed by others under his charge.

"9. The pit-headman, during the several shifts, if more than one, shall be subject to the control and supervision of the manager, have charge of the workmen employed about the pit-head, and each workman shall act under his direction. He shall observe that at all times there is sent down the pit a stock of timber for props and other necessary purposes, for the use of the miners and other workmen, and report to the manager if at any time he observes, or is reported to him, that there is a deficiency of such timber or other articles. He shall superintend and direct the safe removal from the cage of all loaded timber arriving at the pit-head, and see to the safe replacing of the return timber in the cage. He shall be in attendance in the morning, or at such other time of the day as the miners' shift commences, and shall see that no person is allowed to go upon the cage until the engineman has ascertained and reported to him of so doing, in terms of special rule 16. He shall regulate the number of men descending at a time, taking care that not more than four to a single cage, or eight to a double cage, shall ride on such cages respectively, and no cage shall be used without a hutch.

"10. The pit-headman (in absence of some other person specially appointed for the purpose, and independently of the manager or overman) shall, at least in every twenty-four hours, carefully inspect the ropes, chains, and pit-head frame, and other apparatus used for the lowering and raising of cages, so far as exposed to his observation; and if he discovers, or becomes aware of, any defect or weakness likely to produce danger, he shall stop the lowering of men or materials until such defect or weakness be remedied. He shall also be careful to prevent the fall of any stone, coal, or other material into the shaft from the surface, and shall communicate to the manager any necessity for a skilled person being employed to rectify any defect in the shaft, ropes, chains, pit-head frame, and other apparatus.

"28. It shall be the special duty of the roadsman, in their different positions, if more than one, to observe that an adequate supply of timber for props and other necessary purposes is always ready at the place where the miners

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

of the defenders for the negligence of their servant, Colin Beveridge, Beveridge was a competent person, and that the colliery was well nited, if the deceased was not a fellow-servant with Beveridge under defenders, but was the servant of an independent contractor.

2. That on the terms of the contract, No. 7 of process, the employers deceased were not servants of the defenders, but were independent actors.

3. That the provisions of the Mines Regulation Act do not create the ion of master and servant between the mineral owner and the ser- of an independent contractor under a contract for part of the work e mine.'

and his Lordship gave these directions 'subject to the opinion of the and with liberty to the defenders to move the Court to enter the in their favour, although returned against them, if the Court shall opinion that these directions are erroneous, and that the defenders vly entitled to a verdict.'

To which directions the defenders excepted, and called upon the Lord ice-Clerk to give the following directions to the jury :—

1. If the jury are of opinion that the defenders exercised due care in the Beveridge, and furnished him with suitable means and re- for the performance of his duties, the defenders are not liable to

for the use of the miners in supporting the roofs and sides of their work- ces, and to report to the manager or overman if they shall observe any f such timber. For the purpose of carrying out this rule roadmen are red to call upon drawers, putters, and drivers, whether employed by the e miner, to convey such necessary timber from the pit-bottom, or other of general delivery, to the working-places in connection with which they oyed.

2. Such miners and other workmen are, and shall be, generally subject control and orders of the agent, where one has been appointed, and of nager and overman ; but they shall also be subject to any directions e roadman, engineman, fireman, or bottomer may give, in their re- e departments, for the purpose of preventing the workmen from infringing ausing them to comply with any of the provisions of the Act, or of the d or special rules.

3. If, while at work, or at other time, any miner or workman shall dis- or be informed of, the existence of any obstruction in the ventilation, or ion, or impurity in the air of the mine, or the existence of any defect in le, roofs, or in any other parts thereof, he shall be bound to give instant ation of the circumstances to the manager, overman, roadman, or fireman, e these defects may be remedied, and danger therefrom averted.

4. As a matter of common safety, miners, drawers, and all other workers all observe, or who shall come to the knowledge of any damage to or de- r in any road, roof, or air-course, or in any roof, permanent or temporary e, or in the shaft, buildings, cube, or other appliance or work, devised for g, maintaining, and promoting the effective ventilation of the mine, shall nd instantly to communicate such damage or deficiency to the manager, m, roadman, fireman, or other person in charge, so that the same may be ith repaired or rectified.

5. In like manner, every miner, drawer, or other workman, who shall ob- r come to know of any defect or flaw in the cage, ropes, or chains, or part of the engine, machinery, and gearing, used in or about the mine, y the sufficiency thereof may be impaired, shall be bound forthwith to nicate the same as above.

6. No miner or other workman shall be permitted to introduce into the ny stranger or person employed by them on any pretence, without the : of the owner, agent, or manager."

No. 82.
Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

the pursuer for the consequences of the accident, although the jury should be of opinion that the accident was caused by the fault of Beveridge.

"2. If the jury are of opinion that the defenders exercised due care in selecting Beveridge as overman or underground foreman, and the Messrs. Gardner as contractors for the work specified in the contract, and furnished the said persons with suitable means and resources for the performance of their work, the defenders are not liable to the pursuer for the consequences of the accident, although the jury should be of opinion that it was caused through the joint fault of Beveridge and both or either of the Gardners."

"But the Lord Justice-Clerk declined to give any of the directions to the jury, to which ruling the defenders excepted."

The jury found unanimously for the pursuer, with £160 of damages.

The Gartness Company presented a bill of exceptions, and asked that the verdict be entered up for them.

The cause was argued before the Second Division in November, 1876, and was on 11th December sent to seven Judges.

Argued for the Gartness Company;—(1) Woodhead having entered the mine, which was under the special rules framed in accordance with the provisions of the "Coal Mines Regulation Act," must be held to have been in the same employment with Beveridge, the underground foreman who represented the owners. As by statute every mine must be managed as one organisation, and it is illegal to treat it otherwise, and an official is set over every one in the mine, such a relation was established between all the workers in the mine as to make them all fellow-workmen. The special rules were the law of the mine, and that being so, none of the persons employed in the mine could be held to be strangers to another. The test was, were they all under the control, not necessarily of the same master, but of the same employer. Here all in the mine—overman and miners alike—were subject to the control of the owner of the mine. All matters, such as when the miners were to go to work, carry it on, or leave off working, were under the control of the owner of the mine. The principle was thus let in that where such control existed it created the relation of common employment, and the employer was not liable for injury to the workmen.¹ This had been so far that where such a right of control existed the owner was held liable for the faults of the servant.² The right of control in contracts such as the one averred here out of the category of independent contract,³ and the employer with the reserved right of exercising control became liable for injuries caused by the contractor or his servants. Woodhead in becoming a worker in the mine undertook all the risk of the incident to such employment, and was therefore not entitled to compensation against the owner of the mine for injury caused by a fellow-workman in the mine.⁴ If the master supplied good materials and an efficient substitute for himself to look after the mine—both of which it was

¹ Wigget v. Fox and Henderson, Feb. 20, 1856, 25 L. J. Exch. 188.

² Sadler v. Henlock, Jan. 22, 1855, 24 L. J., Q. B. 138.

³ Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners, March 3, 1876, ante, p. 535.

⁴ Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, and Bartonshill Coal Co. v. M'Gill, 17, 1858, 20 D. (H. L.) 13, 3 Macq. 266, 30 Scot. Jur. 63; Abraham v. Houlds, Jan. 12, 1860, 5 Hurl. and Nor. 143; Degg v. Midland Railway, Feb. 21, 1857, 1 Hurl. and Nor. 773; Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, 29, 1868, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 84, 40 Scot. Jur. 486.

done here—then the community of interest among the workmen knew the risks they were undertaking would bar any claim against master. Apart from these points there was evidence in the case to show that Gardner, the direct employer and fellow-workman of Woodhead, was to blame for the accident, and that had been held in England sufficient to exclude all right to recover.¹ This question had been considered in a recent Scotch case,² but it had been left an open ques-

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

posed for Woodhead;—To relieve the owner of a pit from such a claim as this it was necessary (1) that the men should have been hired by the same person; and (2) that they should be employed in a common work. Woodhead was certainly not hired by the same master as Beveridge, though to a certain extent it might be said that he was employed in a common work. The Legislature never intended the special rules to have the effect contended for by the defenders. If they had that effect they would completely alter the rights of parties in such matters. These rules are compulsory under the statute, but they were only framed for the purpose of securing the safety of all the persons in the mine. Such control was reserved to the owners and their representative was not confined to the mechanical part of the work, such as excavating the coal. Such a control as that was necessary to constitute such a relation was contended for.³ The carrying out of a contract for the driving of a level and the general supervision of the mine so as to avoid explosions of gas or roofs falling in were very distinct things. The power of dismissal of workmen conferred on the overman was limited to cases of recklessness or disobedience by which the safety of the mine and the miners generally would be endangered. The contract between Gardner and the Gartness Company was of a different description from those in the cases of Sadler v. Henlock, and Wigget v. Fox and Garton, founded on by the defenders. This case was almost exactly the same as many already decided in which the injured person had been held entitled to recover against the owner.⁴

Longgood v. Bryan, June 20, 1849, 18 L. J. C. P. 336; Armstrong v. White and Yorkshire Railway Co., Jan. 23, 1875, L. R. 10 Exch. 47.
Lums v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Dec. 7, 1875, ante, p. 215.

Gray v. Currie, Nov. 16, 1870, L. R. 6 C. P. 24; Reedie v. London and Western Railway Co., July 6, 1849, 4 Welsby, Hurl. and Gor. Exch. 244; Mason v. York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Co., May 22, 1850, 5 Hurl. and Gor. Exch. 343.

Lean v. Russell, Macnee, and Co., March 14, 1849, 11 D. 1035, and 9. 1850, 12 D. 887, 22 Scot. Jur. 394; Rapson v. Cubitt, April 28, 1850, 12 D. 887, 22 Scot. Jur. 394; Meeson and Welsby, 710; Warburton v. Great-Western Railway Co., 7. 1866, L. R. 2 Exch. 30; McCredie v. Denny, Feb. 22, 1865, 3 Macph. 7; Scot. Jur. 277; Gregory v. Hill, Dec. 14, 1869, 8 Macph. 282, 42 Scot. Jur. 220; Calder v. Caledonian Railway Co., June 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 833, 43 Scot. Jur. 220; Wyllie v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 27, 1871, 9 Macph. 3; Scot. Jur. 220; Wright v. Roxburgh and Morris, Feb. 26, 1864, 2 D. 748, 36 Scot. Jur. 371; Quarman v. Burnett, 1840, 6 Meeson and Welsby, 499; Knicht v. Fox, Nov. 5, 1850, 5 Welsby, Hurlst. and Gor. Exch. 721; Shiels v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., July 4, 1856, 18 D. 28 Scot. Jur. 539; Morgan v. Vale of Neath Railway Co., July 4, 1856, 18 D. 28 Scot. Jur. 539; Lovell v. Howell, Feb. 16, 1876, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 556; Kourke v. Whitmoos Colliery Co., May 3, 1876, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 556; Maun v. Dames, Feb. 6, 1867, 36 L. J. C. P. 181.

No. 82. At advising,—

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of reparation, raised by the father of a miner who was killed while working in a coal mine belonging to the defendants. The pursuer claims damages from the defendants on the ground that his son was killed through the negligence of a servant of the defendants.

The pit in which the accident occurred was comparatively a new one, but had been sunk only to the depth of the Virtuewell seam of coal. This seam had been wrought to the west for twenty fathoms, at which distance the coal was found to stop. The shaft was being sunk to a greater depth by a party of sinkers, who at the date of the accident had carried their operations ten feet below the working level. In this condition of the mine two miners of the name of Gardner contracted with the defendants through their manager Ormiston to drive the east level of the Virtuewell seam fifty fathoms, six feet wide, and receiving payment at a certain rate per fathom, and so much per ton for coal delivered at the pit-bottom. The Gardners engaged other miners, among whom was the deceased, Woodhead, to work with or under them in performing the contract work. At the time of the accident there were then two sets of men engaged in the mine, one in sinking, and the other, under the direction of the Gardners, in driving the east level. Neither the Gardners nor the men engaged in sinking had any charge of or right of interference with the ventilation or the general arrangements of the mine. Beveridge, a servant of the defendants, was overman or underground manager, and took charge of the arrangements of the mine underground. It is admitted by the pursuer that Beveridge was a competent person for his duty, and that the appointments of the mine were sufficient.

It is in evidence that contracts of the same kind as that which the pursuer had with the defendants are quite common in practice, and that it is a common practice for individual miners to employ and pay their own men, the owner of the pit and his manager having nothing to do with the matter so far as engagement and payment of wages are concerned.

It is not disputed that this mine falls under the operation of the Coal Regulation Act, 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 76, and that special rules were made and duly published to all concerned under sec. 52 of that statute, "for the conduct and guidance of the persons acting in the management of this mine, and for the employment in or about the same, to prevent dangerous accidents, and to provide for the safety and proper discipline of the persons employed in or about the mine."

The duties of Beveridge, the overman, are by rule 3d defined thus—"The overman shall be subject to the control and supervision of the manager, the whole operative part of the mine shall be under the care and charge of the overman. The overman shall be responsible for the workmen of every class, in their several departments, discharge their duties, and shall receive and attend to all reports made to him as to the state of the air-courses, machinery, mid-wall, trap-doors, roads, cubes, and other places. He shall cause remedies to be provided where needed; and shall enforce the general and special rules faithfully and vigorously; and he shall have power to hire and discharge workmen."

Very special and detailed rules are prescribed for the conduct of "miners and other workmen." Among other things it is provided by rule 52 that "all workmen shall be generally subject to the control and orders of the agent, who

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

been appointed, and of the manager and overman ; but they shall also be set to any directions which the roadsman, engineman, fireman, or bottomer give, in their respective departments, for the purpose of preventing the men from infringing, or of causing them to comply with, any of the provisions of the Act or of the general or special rules."

persons in the position of the deceased, employed by contractors like the miners, or those contractors themselves, were held to be exempt from any of the special rules, the policy of the statute and the object of the special rules in many cases be entirely frustrated. But that such persons are as much within the provisions of the statute and the special rules as miners and work-employees and paid directly by the owner of the mine, is made clear not by the general purview of the rules, but particularly by a provision in rule 1 for the purpose of carrying out a direction as to conveying wood for use to the working-faces all drawers, putters, and drivers, "whether employed by the owner or the miner," are to be subject to the orders of the roadsman.

The death of the miner Woodhead was caused by the negligence of the overman Beveridge, in having incautiously removed a plank while making an alteration in the arrangement for the ventilation of that part of the mine which at the time occupied by the sinkers.

In reference to this state of the facts, as disclosed in the evidence, the Justice-Clark directed the jury—" (1) That it is not a sufficient ground in law to exclude liability on the part of the defenders for the negligence of their servant Colin Beveridge, that Beveridge was a competent person, and that the deceased was well appointed, if the deceased was not a fellow-servant with Beveridge under the defenders, but was the servant of an independent contractor. And on the terms of the contract, No. 7 of process, the employers of the deceased were not servants of the defenders, but were independent contractors. And that the provisions of the Mines Regulation Act do not create the relation of master and servant between the mineral owner and the servants of an independent contractor under a contract for part of the work in the mine."

The defenders excepted to these three directions, and their exception raises a question of the greatest importance in this branch of the law: Whether the owner of a coal mine is responsible for the negligence of the overman of the mine causing injury to a miner employed and paid wages, not directly by the owner but by a contractor for piece-work such as the Gardners? If this liability attaches to the owner of the mine, its effect and extent must, I apprehend, be the same as if the person injured had been a stranger travelling along a highway ground, injured by an explosion or similar disaster caused by the negligence of the mineowner's servants, employed either underground or at the surface.

Now on this subject has undergone a great deal of discussion during the many years, both here and in England, and I agree with the observation of Lord Colonsay in Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham that it has been decided and matured not only by this ample discussion, but also by the constant occurrence of new classes of cases requiring its application. As his Lordship recently remarks,—“The constantly increasing scale in which mining and quarrying establishments are conducted, by reason of new combinations and concentrations of capital and industry, has necessarily called into existence extensive organisations for management, more gradations of servants, more separation of duties, more delegation of authority, and less of personal

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

presence or interference of the master. The principles of the law, however, adds, "have sufficient elasticity to enable them to be applied notwithstanding such progressive changes in the manner of conducting business."

As the result of the whole authorities, it appears to me that one of the conditions, subject to which every man must become a member of one of the great organisations of labour, is that he shall take on himself all the perils incident to the work he undertakes, without looking to any one to guarantee him against, or indemnify him for, injury sustained from the occurrence of such perils. This does not interfere with the principle of personal liability for the consequences of personal wrong or negligence, but it excludes notions of what, for the sake of distinction, I shall call secondary responsibility.

I would not have it supposed that this principle is limited in its application to what I have called great organisations of labour. It is equally applicable to smaller establishments, and to every kind of establishment—equally to a common joiner's shop, or to a domestic establishment, where the members of the family, the guests, and the servants, are daily exposed to risks caused by one another. But the principle is more clearly illustrated when considered in its application to the great organisations of mining or manufacturing industry. If two miners are employed and paid by the same master, and while one is hewing at one working face the other by negligence injures the first, the master is not answerable, because it is said they are engaged in a common employment—that is to say, they are engaged in the same work as servants of the master. But if the legal principle were applicable to this case only it would cease to be a principle, and degenerate into a mere artificial and arbitrary rule. It is not because the wrongdoer is, in a technical sense, the servant of the master that the master is not answerable. It is of no moment to the injured workman whether his injury be caused by a servant of the same master or by one who has undertaken some function in the mine upon what is called an independent contract. The injury in either case is the same. The liability of the wrongdoer is the same. But the mineowner is free from responsibility, not because the injured and the injurer are both his own paid servants, but because he is not personally in fault, and has not exposed the injured workman against the perils of the work. On the other hand, if the injury was personal fault of the mineowner in selecting for the work an incompetent person, from whose incompetency the injured workman suffered, the mineowner would be equally liable whether the incompetent person selected by him was a servant or what is called an independent contractor. In all cases his liability must rest on personal fault, and where there is personal fault it will be his by liability.

This reasoning is, perhaps so far, not directly applicable to the circumstances of the present case. But it is, I think, useful in elucidating the principle which all the decided cases must be referred, if the law as now developed and matured is to be reasonable and consistent.

In the present case the injured miner is said to have entered the mine as the servant of the mineowner, but of the contractors, the Gardners; and it is inferred that if a servant of the mineowner injure him by his negligence the mineowner shall be answerable, on the footing that the injured miner is a stranger to the mineowner. If this be so, then the Gardners must be held liable in like manner for the negligence of the miners employed by them. The complaint of any person employed by the mineowner, or of any person

d by an independent contractor, as, for example, in this mine, by the contractor for the sinking of the shaft, an operation carried on simultaneously with the owner's driving of the east level. The result would be to create each squad of men into a distinct organisation, and these separate organisations must, in my view, be taken to be strangers to each other as much as if they were working separate mines. Nay, each miner who employs and pays his own drawer must make a separate establishment, and each miner would be answerable for the negligence of his own drawer; while the mineowner would be answerable as the servant of his who by negligence inflicted an injury on a drawer, but he would be exempt from liability though his servants by negligence killed any one of his miners.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

These results, which appear to me dangerous if not also absurd, are reached by overlooking the great principle, as I venture to call it, that a workman who enters and undertakes on entering a mine all the risks naturally incident to work—a principle which seems to me necessarily to exclude all secondary liability.

When whole persons engaged in a mine form one organisation of labour for one end (however different their functions may be), and are all subject to the same control, exercised by the mineowner or those to whom his authority is delegated. This community of labour and of subjection to control arises from the very nature of the work and from the necessity of providing against danger arising for that purpose the maintenance of discipline. But it is systematically made even more directly binding on all by the statute and the special rules enacted under its authority. The persons employed in a mine, superior or inferior, contractor and workmen, of whatever class or whatever their duties may be, are by those rules erected, so to speak, into one community, and all their relative duties assigned to them, and who owe each to his fellow-workman many duties which it would be impossible to enumerate. To such a community as this, and to its individual members, the mineowner is under well defined obligations, but to hold that his obligations and liabilities to individual workmen depend on whether they are technically his servants or are employed by a contractor for piece-work in some limited portion of the mine, would be inconsistent with legal principle, would also, I think, introduce confusion where it is desirable that everything should be as clear as possible; and where the statute makes the interdependence of the whole community and their necessary reliance on one another for safety the regulating principle of their association and the basis of all the special rules for their conduct.

It seems to me that the principle which I have been endeavouring to expound has been mainly involved in the consecutive judgments of the House of Lords in Hill Coal Company v. Reid (3 Macq. 266), of the Second Division of this House in Wright v. Roxburgh and Morris (2 Macph. 748), and of the First Division of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham (5 Macph. 807, and 6 Macph., H. L., 84). In the last-named case the present Lord of Session said—"I do not think the liability or non-liability of the master to his workmen can depend upon the question whether the author of the accident is in any technical sense the fellow-workman or collaborateur of the master."

In the majority of cases in which accidents have occurred the negligence has no doubt been the negligence of a fellow-workman. But the case of the contractor-workman appears to me to be an example of the rule and not the rule.

No. 82. itself. The rule, as I think, must stand upon higher and broader ground. After defining the master's duty as consisting in the selection of competent persons to superintend and direct the work, and in furnishing them with adequate materials and resources, his Lordship continues—"When he has done this, he has, in my opinion, done all that he is bound to do. And if persons so selected are guilty of negligence, this is not the negligence of the master; and if an accident occurs to a workman to-day in consequence of the negligence of another workman, skilful and competent, who was formerly in the employment of the master, the master is, in my opinion, not liable, although the two workmen cannot technically be described as fellow-workmen."

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

In the Bartonshill case the injured man was a miner working below ground. The wrongdoer was the engineman at the pit-head charged with working the engine for letting down and bringing up the miners to and from their work. In Wright v. Roxburgh and Morris the injured men were ordinary miners, and the wrongdoer was underground manager charged with the ventilation of the mine, whose fault consisted in an imprudent and reckless act committed in a different and lower level from that in which the injured men were working. In V. v. Merry and Cunningham the wrongdoer was underground manager, and not been in the employment of the mineowner at the same time as the injured miner. In all of these cases it was contended that the injured and the wrongdoer were not fellow-workmen. But this technicality was entirely disregarded, the risk from which the injured parties suffered was nevertheless held to be one of the risks of the mine which all persons employed in and about the mine ran on themselves without any recourse against the mineowner.

It was suggested in the course of the pursuer's argument that since in these cases occurred judgments have been pronounced by both Divisions of the Court inconsistent with the interpretation now put on these prior cases; and it will be proper, therefore, before I conclude, to examine these more recent judgments.

In Wyllie v. Caledonian Railway Company (9 Macph. 463) the pursuer was engaged in delivering cattle to the railway company, to be carried by rail. He was acting on behalf of his master, to whom the cattle belonged, and was assisted by the servants of the railway company in putting or driving the cattle into trucks, when a train coming into the station struck against the trucks in which the cattle were being put and injured the pursuer. The accident occurred due to the fault of the servants of the railway company in charge of the trucks which struck the trucks. The pursuer sued the company for damages. The defence was that the pursuer was a volunteer in the service of the railway company for the time, and so was engaged in a common employment with the persons who caused the injury. The First Division held that the pursuer was in the same position as if the cattle had been his own, that he was giving to the railway company's servants were receiving, delivery of the cattle under a contract of carriage, and therefore repelled the defence. The pursuer, who was as much a stranger to the railway company as if he had been bringing an invalid lady into a first-class passenger carriage and had been injured by the sudden and violent motion of the carriage caused by the fault of the company's servants.

In Calder v. Caledonian Railway Company (9 Macph. 833), the pursuer was a British Railway Company, having running powers over a portion of the

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

can line, duly despatched a train in terms of arrangements between the companies, which was driven by the pursuer, and which came into collision with a Caledonian train on the Caledonian line through the fault of a pointsman in the Caledonian company's service, in consequence of which the pursuer was injured. It was held by the First Division that the North British engine-driver (pursuer) was the servant of that company only, and the pointsman being the servant of the Caledonian company only, the former was a stranger on the Caledonian line such as a person driving a carriage along a turnpike road is a stranger to the trustees and their servants, and that the Caledonian company must be as answerable for injury done to the pursuer by their servants as the trustees of a turnpike road would, in the case supposed, be answerable for the upset of a stage by the fault of their servants.

In the case of Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company (215) was in its circumstances substantially the same as the last-mentioned case, and my brother, the Lord Justice-Clerk, in giving judgment observed—That the fact that the latter company had the right of running over the land of the former, and was subject to the rules of the former in doing so, had no effect in making the deceased the servant of that company than the use of a private wharf or pier, or the use of a private road, would convert the use of it into servants of the proprietor."

It is, therefore, none of these cases in the least degree disturbs or touches the principle on which, I think, the case now before us ought to be decided.

There is a case of Gregory v. Hill (8 Macph. 282) which stands in a quite different position. Whether the facts of that case may be so represented as to justify the decision consistently with the principle established by Stonhill case, by Wright v. Roxburgh, and by Wilson v. Merry and Graham, it is not of much use to inquire; for I am bound to say that the judgment adopted by the Judges then sitting in the Second Division in Gregory v. Hill are not reconcileable with the principle which I have involved in those previous cases. But Gregory v. Hill is a single case: and when a question of importance like the present is referred to a court of seven Judges, no single judgment of either Division can be allowed to have exclusive authority, particularly when the single judgment was produced by the Division making the reference to the Court of seven. I am not only justified, but bound, to say that great as is the deference, I willingly pay to the very able and learned Judges who sat in Gregory including my brother, the Lord Justice-Clerk, I cannot concur in their reasons which I have now explained, at greater length than I should have done, but which I hope may be excused by the importance of the case, and my inability to concur in the law laid down by the presiding Judge. On the whole, I am of opinion that the law applicable to the case is well stated in the heads of the directions which the defenders asked his Lordship to give, and which was refused.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—The propositions which I laid down to the jury are in substance two, although they are somewhat expanded in the directions given. The first was that the defenders were liable if the person injured was not the servant of the Gartness company, but was the servant of an independent contractor. The second was that on the terms of the contract in this case Gardner

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

was an independent contractor, and that the deceased was his servant, and the servant of the defenders; and that the provisions of the Mines Regulation Act, and the rules of the pit under them, did not affect the relations of parties in this respect.

I remain of opinion that these directions were sound. As to the second, I felt at the trial, and still feel, that this is rather a slender example of an independent contract; and if the judgment now proposed had gone no further than to find that Gardner occupied a somewhat hybrid position, half servant, half contractor, and so was a fellow-servant with Beveridge, I should not have done more than indicate my dissent. But the first of the propositions covers much ground, and the views on which it is challenged are so wide in operation, that holding, as I do, that the point is conclusively settled by a series of adjudicated cases, I think it right to state my opinion a little in detail.

The liability of a master for personal injuries caused to another by the negligence of a servant, depends very much on the measure of care and precaution regards others which the master himself is bound to observe, in the use of his property, or the exercise of his rights. The standard by which this is regulated is not absolute or uniform, but will vary according to the relation which the master has to the thing done—the person who is injured in the doing of it, and the consideration in respect of which it is done. In general, if a man uses his property as to injure a stranger—that is, one who has no connection in or connection with the act itself or him who does it, one who is entitled to be, and doing what he is entitled to do—the liability is absolute; nor does it signify to the person injured whether the act was done carefully or negligently, or whether it was done by a servant or not. The liability consists in the doing of the act itself, and is proved to be a wrong by the act.

On the other hand, and at the other end of the scale, are instances where the known risk is voluntarily encountered, not in the discharge of any obligation, but on a footing purely gratuitous. In cases such as these the liability may be reduced to the lowest measure of care or precaution which a prudent man might be expected to take for himself, or which in the circumstances might have been reasonably contemplated; and sometimes it may appear altogether.

The present case relates to a class distinct from either of these; and I discard altogether illustrations drawn from them, as throwing no light on the question before us. We have to deal with a case in which the parties are not strangers to each other, because both were participant in the act. Neither was the risk encountered gratuitously. It was encountered in the execution of an onerous contract for a valuable consideration. When two persons enter into a mutual independent engagement that a certain operation shall be performed, either by both jointly or by one on the premises of the other, that for a valuable consideration, neither can complain against the other of the accidental consequences of the act, for they have both agreed that it shall be done. But each is bound to the other that his part of the contract shall be carefully and skilfully performed, and is of course liable for negligent or defective performance; and this liability is incurred to every one who is engaged in the execution of the contract for the behoof of the other party. The negligence of one of the parties to the contract, in its execution, is an incident of the contract, but a breach of it. The law on this head is well settled, and the master's liability flows directly from the obligation to perform the contract.

contract. Nor can it make any difference, as has been often decided, whether the contract is to be performed by both parties jointly, or by one on the premises or other. In the latter case the party to the contract who comes on the premises of the other undertakes for himself and his servants that they shall carefully; and the other undertakes that, as far as he and his servants are concerned, the premises shall be safe for the contractor and his men. Of all here is no room for doubt.

It is in this class of cases,—namely, cases in which the risk is encountered in the execution of an onerous contract,—that an exception has been admitted in England, and has been extended to Scotland since the Bartonshill case, founded on the peculiarity of the contract of service. It is held that when a master employs several servants to work for his interest he does not come under any obligation for the acts of the fellow-servants towards each other beyond taking reasonable care that the servants are competent for their work, thus removing them out of the class of mutual contract, and reducing it to the category of that in which the risk is voluntarily and gratuitously encountered. This exception has been defended on various grounds; sometimes it has been said that the consideration of the master's liability is the consideration of the wages given, sometimes that the servant knows of his risk, and must be held to undertake the contract. These are not legal principles, but legal inferences. The former is the consideration for the stipulated service, whatever that may be; the fact that a person knows of the risk, and voluntarily encounters it, may not lead to the inference that he undertakes it, according to the nature of the relation to the wrongdoer or his master. These, however, are not representative principles so much as deductions drawn from the peculiarities of the contract of service. But whatever be the foundation of this exception, of which I say a word afterwards, the exception and its limits and definition have long been settled by a uniform course of decision.

I have no intention of going over the well-trodden ground of authority on this subject; but as it seems to be supposed that the observations made in the House of Lords in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham in 1868 have shadowed out some new principle applicable to such cases, I shall select my illustrations from cases for the most part subsequent in date to that judgment. I shall also define the exception from the reported opinions of two high judges in two very recent cases. The case of Howells v. Landore Steel Company (R. 10 Q. B. 62) was decided in 1874, six years after that of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham. It raised precisely the same question as occurred in that case, namely, whether a colliery manager was a fellow-servant with the workmen employed by him. There could have been no dispute that both were occupied in the same undertaking, and belonged to the same community, whatever that may be; and if there is any foundation for the defenders' contention here this would be conclusive of the case, and it was immaterial whether the men were fellow-servants or not. Lord Blackburn, however, did not so treat it. It had not occurred to him that the judgment in Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham went to the law applicable to fellow-servants, and he so applies the precedent. "It is a rule of law," he says, "that a master who employs a servant (not an independent contractor) is responsible for the negligence of that servant in matters in which he is negligent; but then there is this exception, which has been established by a long course of decisions, that with regard to a fellow-servant the master is not held so responsible, because this negligence is taken as one of the ordinary risks which

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

No. 82. the servant contemplates and undertakes when entering into his employment. Applying this clear statement of the law, and the exception, to the case before him, Lord Blackburn proceeds—"It is essential for the plaintiff's case to show that Thomas (the manager) was a servant of the defendants, and I think he was; and I cannot see anything in sec. 26 to make him, although a servant, not a fellow-servant." Of the decision in Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham he says—"The decision of the House of Lords is distinct at least as far as this goes, the fact that the servant held the position of vice-principal does not affect the non-liability of the master for his negligence as regards a fellow-servant."

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

Now, this, although delivered in an English case, is high and conclusive authority to this extent, that it represents the matured opinion of the Common Law Courts in England. If sound, these views seem to establish these three propositions:—First, that the liability of the master is the rule, and exemption the exception. Secondly, that the exemption does not cover the case of two persons working in the same occupation, if they are the servants of different masters; and Thirdly, that the Court of Queen's Bench had not discovered in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham any rule under which common occupation without common service would have liberated the master of the wrongdoer, because otherwise the question decided could not have arisen.

The same lesson may be learned from the still more recent and not less authoritative exposition of the rule in the case of Rourke v. Whitmore & Company, May 3, 1876, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 556. The facts of that case are in some analogy to the present. In that case a mining company, as before, was working their colliery by a contractor, and they put the services of the contractor's engineer, who was their servant, at the disposal of the contractor. The engineer slept at his post, and one of the contractor's men was injured. Now, in the present case we have before us, excepting that the engineer was directly obeying the contractor's orders. Both were engaged in the same occupation at the time of the occurrence, and there could not have been a more favourable opportunity for giving effect to the supposed exception built on Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham. But Lord Coleridge found no novelty in the law applicable to the case. He said—"The case raises a question which it is always difficult to decide, though the principles on which it depends are well established. The difficulty arises from the difficulty of ascertaining whether the facts bring the case within one or other of two well-defined rules." He then states the facts, and concludes—"If, under these circumstances, the plaintiff and Lawrence were both in the employ of Whittle, the plaintiff is, upon the principle laid down in Prior v. Fowler and several subsequent cases, debarred of his remedy. If Lawrence was not in Whittle's employ, then the defendants are liable." This is precisely the law laid down and excepted to in the present case, and certainly what Lord Coleridge found no such doctrine as that contended for in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham. Indeed, the opinion quoted is entirely consistent with the existence of any such rule.

The received canon, therefore, requires service under the same master in any case within it. It is also necessary that the injury should have been received while both were engaged in the work of the common service. It has been often held, the latest example being the case of Lovell v. Howell, 1876, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 161.

But when we turn from the exception to the rule, some broad lines of distinction are sufficiently evident and have always been recognised. With work under the same master they are working in one interest and for the benefit of the same man. They are appointed and paid by the same man; but, it is much more important, they are responsible to the same man, and the same man is responsible for them. I take it that this element in a common contract of service lies at the root of the exception based on it. The same person is responsible for the conduct of the servants towards third parties, and he is responsible to his own servants that each shall be chosen with reasonable care.

In common service each servant represents the same master. But when persons enter into a contract for the execution of work to be done either by servants of both or by the servants of one, there is no such identity of responsibility. Each party to the contract is liable for his own servants, but is not liable for the servants of the other. The servants of each work for the best of their own master, and represent him only. As neither selects the servants of the other, neither can have any responsibility as to their qualifications. First it is fixed, first, that neither is liable for the neglect of the servant of the other party to the contract; and secondly, that each is liable for the neglect of his own servant if the servant of the other is thereby injured.

The first of these points has long been put at rest by separate decisions, applicable to contracts of the nature of that before us—contracts, namely, for work done on the premises of the other party to the contract. The case of Rapson v. Mees and Welsby, 710, may be taken as an example of the rest. The defendant of the premises in that case was held to have no responsibility for the gas-servants any more than he would have had for the servants of anyone else. The second point, which is its necessary counterpart—the liability of the contracting party for the negligence of his own servant, if the servant of the other is injured in the course of executing the contract—has been the subject of a number of decisions relating to contracts of all classes, and in every variety of circumstances in which the question could arise. I shall allude to seven of these in the English Courts and four in our own—which have established principles beyond controversy.

First, the well-known case of Abraham v. Reynolds in 1860, 5 Hurl. and C. related to a contract of hiring. A corn-dealer hired a horse, cart, and driver as a carrier, and in loading the cart at the warehouse the carter was injured by the fault of the servants of the corn-dealer. Both were engaged at the same time in executing the contract; their occupation therefore was the same, but it was held that the carter was not a fellow-servant, and found the corn-dealer liable for his servant's negligence.

The second case I consider of importance as well as of authority in this discussion is that of Indermaur v. Dames in 1868, 36 L. J. C. P. 181, decided in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in England. In that case the doctrine was clearly established by Justice Willes—a very high authority—(1) That one who works for an independent contractor is in a position entirely different from that occupied by a casual visitor; and (2) that where work is contracted to be done by one person on the premises of another the obligation of the latter to take care by him or his servants that the premises are safe is precisely the same as that incumbent on the contractor and his servants to work safely. The case in which the important principles were fixed was a very simple and conclusive example. The plaintiff was a journeyman gasfitter, who was employed by a contractor in the execution of a contract to fit up two patent regulators in the defendant's works. The operation was all but completed, and the plaintiff went

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

No. 82.
 Feb. 10, 1877.
 Woodhead v.
 Gartness
 Mineral Co.

to the premises to see whether the apparatus was working properly, and through an open trap in the building. The main defence was that the contract was completed, but this was not sustained. The obligation on a person who made a contract for work to be done on his premises, to see that these premises are safe for the persons who are to work on them, is laid down in the most reserved terms both by Mr Justice Willes in the Court of Common Pleas, by Chief-Baron Kelly in the Exchequer Chamber.

Before adverting to the cases in our own Courts subsequent to that of Indermaur, all of which affirmed the same principle, I pass over an interval of several years to a case decided in 1875, in which all the authorities were reviewed by the Court of Queen's Bench. The case was one in which, within the limit of compulsory pilotage, a licensed pilot was killed, in the act of going on board a vessel, by the carelessness of the crew in permitting one of the ship's boats to run over him. The Court held the owners liable, on the ground that the pilot was not a fellow-servant with the crew. Lord Blackburn's observations harmonize so completely in all respects with the views I have endeavoured to explain, that I quote the following important passage:—"The law is to a certain extent determined by the case of Indermaur v. Dames. There is an obligation on the part of the occupier of property, whether fixed or moveable, to those who are invited, express or implied, to come on that property, to take, by himself and his servants, reasonable care that the person so coming shall not be exposed to an unusual danger. And that obligation extends to the workmen sent by a master to repair part of the machinery. Mr Justice Willes, in delivering judgment in that case, after referring to the undisputed law that there was such an obligation on the part of a shopkeeper to his customer, and that there was no obligation to a servant, proceeds to give the reason of the judgment in those terms—'The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who are not as mere volunteers or licensees or guests or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargained for, but who are engaged in a business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation, express or implied, to come on the property. In Morgan v. Vale of Neath Railway Co., 33 L. J. Q. B. 260, which was decided in date later than Indermaur v. Dames, the reason why a servant cannot sue his master for negligence of a fellow-servant was put on the ground that it was not a part of the contract between master and servant that the servant should be responsible to the master for such risks. In the more recent case of Merry and Cunningham in the House of Lords, a Scotch case, it was held that the owners of a colliery were not responsible to their servants for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the general superintendent of the mine, to whom the defendants had delegated their whole power and authority. It does not appear from the report that the cases of Morgan v. Vale of Neath Railway Co. and Indermaur v. Dames were brought to their Lordships' notice; but the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) seems to me to have arrived by independent reasoning at the principle that the exemption from liability was from the contract between master and his servant, and to base his judgment upon it. He says: 'The master is not, and cannot be, liable to his servant unless there be negligence on the part of the master in that which he, the master, has contracted the servant to take with his servant to do. The master has not contracted or undertaken to execute in person the work connected with the business.' 'At all events, the servant may choose for himself between serving a master who does and a master who does not attend in person to his business.'" his judgment embraces in a very incisive and succinct manner all the legal positions which we are now considering. The first sentence states a general principle, which, if sound, is all which is necessary for the decision of this particular case; and the remarks made on the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham entirely corroborate the impression I have indicated.

Four cases to which I mean to refer from our own decisions are—(1) Gregory v. Hill (8 Macph. 282), (2) Wyllie v. Caledonian Railway (9 Macph. 833), (3) Calder v. Caledonian Railway (9 Macph. 833), and (4) Adams v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway (ante, vol. iii. 215). But for the reason your Lordship has made I should have thought the first of these the first of the series. It was the case of a contract for the joint work of a servant in the course of construction, and the contractor's servant was injured by the negligence of the servant of the proprietor who was engaged in doing the work of the house. I should have thought that there could be no example of the rules laid down in the case of Indermaur and in the case I have just quoted; nor do I see that any other judgment could have been excepting in direct violation of them. It was a unanimous judgment of the Second Division, and carried the weight due to the names of Lord Cowan, Lord Benholme, and Lord Neaves. It had one distinctive feature. In it was introduced for the first time the notion that Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham altered or enlarged the former law, and this contention was deliberately stated and overruled. I quite agree with your Lordship in thinking the case to be entirely at variance with the view on which it is proposed to decide this case, but it was in conformity with the preceding as well as the subsequent cases. For it is a mistake to suppose it was a solitary judgment. The case was that of Wyllie, in which the servant of a customer was injured by the servant of a carrier, while both were engaged in putting goods into a cart under a contract of carriage. The same contention was again maintained, and again overruled. Lord Ardmillan in deciding the case said—"None of the cases quoted to us support the propositions maintained by the defender's counsel in this case, and the decision in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, however important and authoritative, is not here in point. The case of Adam v. Reynolds (5 Hurl. and Nor. 143) has, I think, far more direct and immediate application to the present case than any of the other cases quoted to us, and the opinions of the Judges in the case of Gregory v. Hill, pronounced in a case favourable to the pursuer, are in accordance with the principles explained by Lord Pollock and the other Judges in Exchequer in the case of Abraham." It is not stop to analyse the cases of Calder and of Adams, the details of which are familiar to your Lordships, and which were decided on precisely the same legal and broad ground. In the case of Calder, the Sheriff, Mr Dickson, delivered his judgment on the cases of Abraham v. Reynolds and Gregory v. Hill, and his judgment was affirmed and his views generally approved of by the other Judges.

And in deciding the case of Adams, the last of the series, my brother Lord Macmillan, who was not one of the Judges who decided the case of Gregory v. Hill, referring to the case of Calder, took occasion to say—"This judgment is given to all the more weight that it followed on the case of Gregory v. Hill, and is not two years before on the same grounds and to the same effect." The case of Gregory v. Hill has been founded on in many other cases, and has never, as I know, been called in question until now.

These opinions are important, not only as confirming the case in question,

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Co.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

which, as I humbly think, it does not require, but as shewing that the series proceeded on one broad ground, and that the distinctions which have been since discovered had no part in the decisions.

This concludes my summary of the authorities, which are all in one direct line. There is neither authority nor dictum the other way. It will not escape observation that in every one of these cases the parties contracted voluntarily as to the full knowledge of the risk. But that element was the very foundation of the claim against the master of the wrongdoer, who knew when he sent his servant to perform his contract that he would be answerable if the servant, through negligence to perform it, and injury resulted from his failure.

I think in this branch of the law, of all others, we ought stare decisis. I think we may be liable to exception on principle, but it is at least intelligible and practical, for it never can be difficult to say whether one man is a servant of another. I cannot say so much for the new rule. What is not a common occupation may give rise to tenfold perplexity, as the phrases which do not express any legal relation always does. I do not know what is meant by being a member of a community. If a firm of ironworkers undertake to construct an iron roof over a railway station I presume their men must work so as not to endanger the servants of the railway company. Are the servants of the railway company and the company itself not bound because the firm has become a member of the same community?

Before concluding my remarks on this head I would point out the truth of the observations of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Wilson v. Mackenzie. They are supposed to create some obligation or invitation to formulate some rule in this case, never judicially announced or applied for the future administration of this branch of the law. The same thing was attempted, as I have said, in the cases of Gregory and of Wyllie, but met with no encouragement from the Court. I think, and always have thought, that the view proceeds on a misapprehension of the true scope of these remarks. If rightly understood, are not only weighty from the quarter from which they came, but in the highest degree just and salutary. They give no sanction ever to what is now proposed. The Lord Chancellor simply said that there were other cases in which a person by voluntarily encountering a known risk might liberate a master from absolute liability for his servant's fault, as that of servants under the same master. I entirely appreciate the import of the remark, as embodying or indicating considerations which have been overlooked.

I have already said that the effect of the rules of law on the relation of fellow-servants to each other and to their master is to eliminate that category of mutual contract, and to reduce it to that of the third category of instances to which I referred in the outset. This third category stands apart both from the case of a stranger who has done nothing to invite the servant and from that of the contractor who undertakes for a valuable consideration to encounter it. But when we come to consider the case of persons who voluntarily expose themselves to hazard, not in pursuance of any duty or obligation, or for any valuable consideration, but on a footing purely gratuitous, a new set of principles comes into play. If, from curiosity, or love of science, or for adventure, a man attends a hazardous experiment, or ascends a dangerous pass, he does so at his own risk, and he has no right to demand at the hands of the conductor of the experiment who permits his presence, or the owner

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

tain pass who from friendliness sends a guide or a ghillie with him, more utmost than reasonable care—such care as he would take for himself. Reason is obvious. The master in such cases is under no obligation to do at all; and a man is not entitled to convert acts of civility or hospitality into an excuse for fastening on his friend or his entertainer a responsibility, which he would otherwise never have incurred. In this way may be solved all illustrations as to guests and visitors which obscure rather than illuminate the question. If a committee of the British Association choose to go down a mine, they must take the safeguards of the mine as they find them. It would be an entirely different thing if the owner had engaged, for ordinary professional assistance, the services of a medical man to visit the pit periodically. The distinction manifestly lies in the element of contract and valuable consideration. It may, and the reverse has been held, that the moral obligation implied by invitation or encouragement may not amount in special cases to legal obligation. But that requires some element equivalent to a direct undertaking. It is apparent that the principle of presumed acceptance of the risk which obtains in the case of fellow-servants has a much wider application. But it has no application in cases of onerous contract. In the present case the contractor, if he undertook, undertook that his men should not endanger or injure the property of the Gartness company, and the Gartness company undertook that it should be safe for the contractor and his men, as far as they or those employed were concerned.

It is, however, before concluding, say a word on the second question—Was the contractor an independent contractor? I think he was, although the contract is a small and homely one.

The contractor undertook to execute a specific and definite operation, namely, to prepare the mine in which he was to drive for the operations of the colliery. This he was not entitled to complete by himself and his own servants. It was not payment for piece-work.

The test of whether one man is a fellow-servant of another is not necessarily the engagement or payment of wages. It is whether the two men are both employed by the same master, and the same master is responsible for them. If a master is allowed to engage a man under him, the master is as much responsible for the sub-servant as he is for the principal servant. But here it seems that Woodhead was responsible only to Gardner, and that Gardner only responsible for him, as was found in the case of Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway, in 1849, 4 Welsby, Hurl. and Gordon, 244.

The Mines Regulation Act and the consequent rules are of no moment except inasmuch as they make the owner's liability to keep the pit safe more clear. The rules are not such that every master may make for the regulation of his own premises, and do so without regard to his liabilities to independent contractors or their servants, and certainly not such as to make the latter servants of the owner in any sense. This was necessarily so in the cases of Adams and of Calder, in which the company running the line of the other was entirely subject to the bye-laws of the latter, and have been directly decided in the case of Reedie, above referred to, and in the recent case of Warburton v. Great-Western Railway Company, L. R. 2

On these grounds I cannot concur in the judgment proposed.

DEAS.—This case belongs to a branch of the law which can hardly be

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

said to stand in a satisfactory position, and I am not surprised that there should be some difference of opinion about it.

If the maxim culpa tenet suos auctores were held to be the general rule in questions of liability for fault or negligence, the law would be consistent and of easy application. But when that maxim is applied exceptionally to relieve the master from liability to his servant for the fault or negligence of a fellow-servant, it does not sufficiently justify this exception simply to say that a servant takes all the risks incident to his contract of service. You must go further, and affirm that one of the risks so undertaken, as incident to the contract of service, is the risk of injury from the fault or negligence of fellow-servants. That is an exceptional application of the maxim culpa tenet, and when you have departed from the rule, it is not easy to justify the somewhat invidious exception. To say that the risk is included in the wages is not to my mind a satisfactory explanation. To be this as it may, a course of decisions not to be gone back upon has established as a principle, in the contract of service, that the servant thereby undertakes to relieve the master from responsibility for the fault or negligence of other servants selected, engaged in the common service, and by that principle we must be guided.

The maxim respondeat superior might be reasonable enough in times when masters had slaves, serfs, and dependants, so completely at their beck and call, anxious to study their masters' humour, that you could not distinguish between them when they were acting according to the pleasure of their masters or upon their own uninfluenced responsibility. But the development of intelligence among the lower orders, the spread of education, and the progress of law and order have so largely changed all this as to render it matter of regret that statutory authority had not introduced a more extensive application of the maxim culpa tenet than that which has been less satisfactorily introduced by judicial decision.

Meantime we must take it, as I have said, as a fixed principle in the contract of master and servant, that the servant undertakes to relieve the master of liability from the fault or negligence of others employed in the common service, and is understood to be reasonably qualified to be so employed.

The only inquiry, therefore, in each case—and consequently the only inquiry in this case—is, what is to be regarded as the common service?

I do not think that inquiry is fully satisfied by ascertaining who is the master who pays the servant. These may often be important elements in the question of liability, but they are not essential or conclusive elements. There may be sub-servants, or assistants hired and paid by servants, and yet both the servant and the hired may be engaged in a common service, the risks of which are held as undertaken by each of them respectively.

We see from the evidence in the present case that it is a common practice for coal-miners to employ and pay their own drawers; and we see that this practice is recognised and regulated by rule 28 of the statutory regulations applicable to mines generally. The authority of the pit-headman to require the timber to support the roofs and sides of the workings to be carried generally by the miners, to the places where it is required to be used is, by that rule, explained to extend to drawers, putters, and drivers, whether employed by the owner of the mine or by the miners themselves. It would be very incongruous if the classes of persons thus employed and paid were to be regarded and dealt with as not entitled to the same rights, and not to be held to the same risks, with the other workmen in the mines.

was disposed to think that they are all on the same footing. At all events, No. 82. of opinion that the service of which the deceased undertook the risks was common service of the mine. He was not only bound by the general and special rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, but he signed the special rules, accepted a copy thereof as rules brought to his personal knowledge, and by him and his fellow-workmen were to be regulated. He saw on the first of these rules who his fellow-workmen were to be—it being there explained the word “miners” means every person “employed in the mine, in the excavation or removal of coal, ironstone, shale, fire-clay or other minerals, or materials,”—and he saw also that the words “manager” and “overman” meant the general manager and overman in authority over himself and the other workmen in the mine. If, then, he undertook the risks of any of these rules, surely he undertook the risks of the general service of the mine. By rule 2 of the special rules the mine is declared to be under the control and supervision of the manager; and, subject to this general supervision, places the whole operative details, and the superintendence of the work of every class, under the overman, who, by rule 5, is specially charged with the execution, in terms of general rule No. 1 of the statute, and bound to observe all other general rules of section 51 of the statute, “so far as these, from the nature of the work, can be observed by himself.”

By rule 9 (of the special rules) the pit-headman, subject to the control and supervision of the manager, has the charge and direction of the workmen employed at the pit-head. He is to “superintend and direct the safe removal from the mine of all loaded hutches arriving at the pit-head, and see to the safe removal of the return hutches on the cage,” and he is in like manner to regulate the work of the men and see to the safety of the men descending in the cages, no matter in what department of the mine the loaded hutches or the men may come.

In the present case, we see from the evidence that at the date of the accident, the sinkers hired by the defenders were employed in one part of the mine, and the miners, including the deceased, hired by the contractors to drive the road, were employed in another part of the mine, coal was habitually taken to the pit-bottom and brought up from both sets of excavations, and the men employed at both were habitually ascending and descending under the control and charge of the same pit-headman, who, by rule 10, is taken to be bound to carefully inspect all the appliances for raising and lowering the coal, and if any defects are discovered, to stop the raising and lowering of the coal and materials till these are remedied.

In the same manner, the engineman, the roadsman, and the fireman are all invested with powers in their respective departments to interfere with, direct, and regulate the miners (which means, as we have just seen, all persons employed in excavating, or removing minerals, metals, or materials in or from the mine in whatever way may appear necessary to secure safety, order, and efficiency in the working of the mine. They may, for these purposes, cause the miners to stop from working, or they may on some occasions even order them to work more than their own. For instance, rule 28, which lays on the roadsman the duty of providing an adequate supply of timber to support the roofs of the workings, bears—“For the purpose of carrying out this rule, the roadsman is empowered to call upon drawers, putters, and drivers, whether employed by the owner or miner, to convey such necessary timber from the pit-

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

No. 82. bottom, or other place of general delivery, to the working places in contact with which they are employed."

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

Then, in rule 52, we have a sort of summing up of the provisions which have been noticing, which is expressed thus—"Such miners and other workmen and shall be generally subject to the control and orders of the agent, who has been appointed, and of the manager and overman; but they shall not be subject to any directions which the roadsman, engineman, fireman, or other men may give in their respective departments for the purpose of preventing them from infringing or ceasing to comply with any of the provisions of the Act, or of the general or special rules."

Under all these circumstances I really cannot doubt that the service of the risks were accepted by the deceased was the general service of the mine, unless it can be shewn that the single fact of his wages being payable to Messrs Gardner, as contractors, places him in a different category from that which he otherwise would have been.

The question upon that point can hardly, however, be said to arise for the 2s. per ton specified in the contract with Gardner to be paid to the defenders for clean coal from his excavations, delivered by him at the bottom of the pit, was to be increased or diminished ten per cent for every day of rise or fall on the wages during the contract; so that the defendants were substantially in the position of contributing to the wages paid to the Gardners to their men.

I consider it, however, unnecessary to rest upon this specialty. I find nothing in the decided cases to lead me to think that the mere payment of wages affords a conclusive test one way or other of the class of persons who in cases of this kind are to be regarded as fellow-workmen or partners. We see from the evidence in the present case that it is a common practice in pits for coalminers to employ and pay their own drawers, and rule 28, which I have already quoted for a different purpose, we have a definition of the practice in a more extensive form, of miners employing (on their own account paying) assistants or men under them, such as drawers, putters, drivers, over whom the roadsman, and by necessary inference also the manager and overman, are to have precisely the same powers when they are employed by the miners as when they are employed by the owner of the mine. It would be very anomalous if incidental arrangements of this kind should be allowed to vary and disturb the general relation to the owner and to each other of the body of workmen in the mine.

Take, for instance, the position of Samuel Gardner himself. The evidence bears—"I likewise agree to put on a bottomer, you allowing me 2s. 6d. per day for same." That was just in substance an undertaking by the defendant to pay the bottomer's wages. Suppose that had been done, I do not see how the position of the bottomer, in questions like the present, as to the liability of the defenders either by him or for him, could consistently have been distinguished from the position of others employed in the mine. As it happened, Samuel Gardner himself acted as bottomer, and his wages of 2s. 6d. per day were credited to him and his brother, so that he was himself in reality the bottomer of the defenders.

It will not be understood that I rest upon the fact that the rules I have referred to were introduced by Act of Parliament. If these rules had been introduced, ex proprio motu, by the owners of the mine, printed and distributed be thoroughly and personally known to the men, and agreed to by them, No. 82. and have attributed to them the same effect, with this difference only, that it then have been open to consider whether they contained anything con- Feb. 10, 1877.

 to the principles of the common law by which the men might have been Woodhead v.
 at a disadvantage, which inquiry the statutory origin of the rules entirely Gartness ideas. Mineral Co.

have not thought it necessary to enter upon a review of the authorities and upon this branch of the law in Scotland and in England. As counsel case of M'Lean v. Russell, Macnee, and Co., March 9, 1850, 12 D. 887, occasion to make myself acquainted with all these authorities and deciprior to that date, and I have since had occasion, on repeated occasions, to reconsider them, along with the subsequent cases, except two or very recent cases, which, in so far as not cited at the bar, have been kindly it under my notice by one or other of your Lordships. They have been read and commented on at the bar and on the bench, and I shall only cite one of them—Gregory v. Hill, Dec. 14, 1869, 8 Macph. 282, because I myself bound to say, with all respect for the Judges by whom that decision was pronounced, that I concur in thinking it cannot be supported.
 In the whole, I am of opinion that the law laid down by the presiding Judge was not correct, and that the law which his Lordship was asked to apply would have been correct.

ORMIDALE.—The argument which we have heard in this case has had to do with the defenders' bill of exceptions alone in the first instance, and it is for the Court now to determine whether, and how far, the bill ought to be allowed or disallowed.

The defenders maintain their exceptions on the grounds (1) that they are not the pursuer for the death of David Woodhead through the fault of their agent and manager, Colin Beveridge, in respect that these persons were at the time of the accident fellow-servants of the defenders, engaged in the same community; and (2) that even supposing Woodhead and Beveridge were not fellows of the defenders when the former was fatally injured, the defenders are liable, in respect that, engaged, as they were at that time, working in the pit for the purpose of putting out the coal, the injury received by the deceased through the fault of the other was an incident of the work, the risk and consequences of which the sufferer must, in a question with the defenders, be made himself undertake.

In the soundness of the first of these grounds of non-liability, where the facts are sufficient fairly to raise it, there can be no doubt, having seen the numerous decided cases on the subject. It is sufficient, however, to refer to the cases of the Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, and of Wilson v.
Cunningham, both of which were ultimately decided in the House of Lords. In these cases the distinction was fully explained between the positions of parties directly answerable for their own wrongful acts, to whom the dupa tenet suos auctores applies, and parties who may be liable, not for their own wrongful acts of themselves directly, but for their servants, on the principle per alium facit per se, or of parties who, though standing in the relations of masters or employers to the wrongdoer, may nevertheless escape liability on the ground maintained for the defenders, that the injured and he who caused the injury were fellow-workmen or colla-

No. 82. borateurs within the meaning of the doctrine which protects the master's responsibility for injuries sustained by one servant or workman through a wrongful act of another.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

The question in the present case, under the first branch of the defense, argument, is whether they are to be held, in respect of the doctrine of colliery, as explained in the cases referred to, free from responsibility for the sequences of the injuries sustained by Woodhead through the negligence of overman, Colin Beveridge. The latter was at the time the servant of the defenders, and it is expressly admitted that he was "a competent person in duty, and that the appointments of the colliery were sufficient." It is an indisputable fact that Woodhead and Beveridge were, when the former was injured, engaged in the same pit of the defenders, and in the prosecution of the same work and object, viz. the operations necessary for turning out the coal. In these circumstances it seems to follow, on the authority of the cases which have been referred to, that the deceased David Woodhead must be held to have undertaken all the risks arising from the fault of Beveridge or others engaged along with him in the same common work and object. But then it was admitted that while Beveridge was the servant, and engaged at the time of the injury in the service of the defenders, Woodhead was the servant, not of the defenders but of the Messrs Gardner, who were engaged in the pit as independent contractors. Whether the circumstance of the Messrs Gardner being independent contractors, supposing it were true, can operate against the defenders, with the effect of making them liable in the present action, is the question which is afterwards considered in dealing with the second branch of their argument. It must be first ascertained how the fact stands.

Now, the question of fact whether the Messrs Gardner were independent contractors, or merely the servants of the defenders, engaged in their pit in the work, depends upon whether they were under the control and subject to the interference of the defenders. It is not enough to make them independent contractors that they had the power of engaging, paying, and dismissing men acting immediately under them, for if that were enough it is obvious that the evidence of some of the witnesses in the present case that even in every coal-pit would stand in the position of an independent contractor. The true test is the right of control and interference which the defenders possessed in reference to the Messrs Gardner and their men. That this is so is, I think, well and clearly illustrated by the recent Scotch case of Stephens v. Commissioners of Police of Thurso, 3d March 1876, and the still more recent English case of Rourke v. The Whitemoss Colliery Company. In both cases the question whether certain individuals were independent contractors or merely the servants of other parties was held to depend upon whether they had reserved and exercised a control over the operations of the former.

Did, then, the defenders in the present case, while they contracted and arranged with the Messrs Gardner to carry on a certain portion of the work in their pit, retain and reserve to themselves such a power of control and interference as to prevent the Messrs Gardner being held as independent contractors? That they were not independent contractors, or anything more than servants engaged by the defenders to do part of the work in their pit, to be paid by the piece, appears to me to be made sufficiently clear by the evidence in the case, including the rules under and by which the whole work was regularly carried on. Thus Samuel Gardner, one of the alleged independent contractors,

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

ness adduced by the pursuer, says—"Up to and at the time of the accident any person who acted for the company and looked after the machinery and operation of the pit was Colin Beveridge, who discharged the duties of underground manager, roadsman, and foreman." The evidence of the same witness and to the engagement by him of a bottomer, the payment of his wages, the control of him in regard to his work and duties, denotes very plainly, I think, that the true relation of the Messrs Gardner to the defenders was merely of parties who had engaged to work in their service by the piece, and not independent contractors. And George Gardner, again, the other alleged independent contractor, who gives similar testimony, states among other things—had no charge in regard to the ventilation and safety of the arrangements of the pit, Ormiston (the defenders' manager) and Beveridge (their overman or ground manager) giving such directions about these matters as they thought any doubt remained on this point, looking merely at the parole evidence, I think, entirely removed by the rules and regulations to which all persons in the pit were subject in carrying out the operations. I refer to the special rules established by the authority of section 52 of the Mines Regulation Act (3 and 36 Vict. cap. 78), and not the general regulations specified in section 3. The latter are set out specifically in the Act itself, and are indispensable in relation to which the Act applies; but the former are left to be prepared by the manager of the mine, subject to the approval of a Secretary of State, in accordance with the particular state and circumstances of such mine." Accordingly, the rules so prepared and approved of in reference to the defenders' mine as they are "for the conduct and guidance of the persons acting in the management of this mine, or employed in or about the same, to prevent dangerous accidents, and to provide for the safety and proper discipline of the persons employed in or about the mine." The regulations so established for the management and guidance of all persons in the defenders' pit were, it is not unnecessary to observe, subscribed by the deceased David Woodhead, as appears from the evidence of the manager Ormiston. As might be expected, therefore, the regulations cannot be examined, in connection with the evidence in this case, without it being seen that they lead unavoidably to the conclusion that the defendants, Gardner, and those who were immediately under them at the time of the accident, including David Woodhead, were subject in all things relating to their conduct in the defenders' pit to the orders and guidance of the defendant manager Ormiston, and their overman or foreman Beveridge; and it would be difficult to conceive a case in which the interference and control of the defenders with the alleged contractors could be greater or more unnecessary. To be satisfied of this, it is only necessary to observe the terms of rule 3 as to the duties incumbent on the manager and overman on the one hand, and the terms of rules 52, 55, 69, 70, and 71, taken as examples on the other, of the duties of the miners or workmen, on the other hand.

It is not, I am able to understand the view which was pressed in argument for the defenders, that these regulations were not intended to serve any other than police objects. These may be, in one sense, the objects of the rules, but that is not all. They were also intended to regulate the whole working of the colliery, and the co-operation of all the persons engaged in carrying on that work for the benefit of the defenders, cannot, I think, be doubted. Thus by rule 3 it is provided that, subject to the control and supervision of the manager, the whole

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

operative details shall be under the care and charge of the overman; by rule 52 it is provided that "the miners and other workmen shall be subject to the control and orders of the manager and overman." According to it was held in Howells and Others v. The Landore Siemens Steel Co. (Limited), 4th Nov. 1874, Law Rep. 10, Q. B. 62, in reference to the fact of a master for a fatal injury caused by a servant to a fellow-servant, the fact of the manager who caused the injury being appointed pursuant to the Mines Regulations Act, 1872, did not put him in a different position from he would have held had he been simply appointed manager, and consequently that the defendants were not liable to the representatives of the deceased his death.

I must own my inability, therefore, to understand how—having regard to rules referred to, enforceable as they are by the defenders, their manager, man, and other head people—the Messrs Gardner can be regarded as independent contractors, or as anything else than persons working under the control and subject to the orders of the defenders. And if this be the true position of Messrs Gardner, and of the workmen immediately under them, it follows in accordance with well established law, that David Woodhead, the workman who was fatally injured, and Colin Beveridge, who by his culpable negligence caused the injury, must be regarded as fellow-workmen, engaged in the same employment, and that consequently the pursuer, whatever may be his claim for reparation against Beveridge, has none against the defenders. The case of Wigget v. Fox and Henderson is a precedent for this—if precedent were necessary—very much in point. In that case there were principal contractors—Fox and Henderson—who had undertaken to execute the whole of certain work in connection with the Crystal Palace, and as to these parties occupying a perfectly independent position no question arose. But under them part of the work was contracted to be done and paid for by the piece by Moss and other sub-contractors, and although the parties thus sub-contracting had their own work to do the piece-work, these men were held to be the fellow-servants of the principal contractors; and one of the former having been killed by the fault of the latter it was decided that the principal contractors were not liable for the compensation in respect that the workman who received the fatal injury was a fellow-servant of the workman who caused the injury. In the course of the discussion remarked by Baron Martin, in regard to the position of Moss,—"The question of master and servant existed between the defendants and him, and in my opinion that an action by a stranger for the negligent act of Wigget would have been properly brought against Fox and Henderson, and not against Moss. The real test is whether the defendants could interfere in the work done by Moss. Now, it is clear from the regulations that they could. I observe that the same test applied by Compton, J., in Sadler v. Henlock (24 L. J., Q. B. 13) says the real test is whether the employer has any control over the person employed, and whether the payment is by the day or piece can make no difference. Accordingly, in delivering the judgment of the Court Baron Alderson said:—"Here both servants were at the time of the injury engaged doing the work of the whole contract, and for the contractors, the defendants, must think that the sub-contractor and all his servants must be considered as fellow-servants for this purpose the servants of the defendants whilst engaged in the work, each directing and limiting his attention to the particular work for the completion of the whole work; and that otherwise we could effect to the principle which governs such cases." So, accordingly, it appears to me that in the present case Woodhead, who received the fatal injury, Beveridge, by whose negligence the injury was caused, must be held to have at the time of the accident fellow-workmen in the employment of the defendants, who are consequently, on the doctrine of collaborateur, not liable for the consequences.

The only difference of any materiality founded on by the pursuer between the case of Wigget v. Fox and Henderson and the present was, that while in the former the sub-contractor's men were paid by the defenders, in the latter the pursuer's men were paid by them, and not by the defenders. But it is shewn that this is of little or no importance in determining whether the pursuer are independent contractors or not—that question being governed by other considerations, and especially by the control or interference exercised on the part of the defenders. Besides, the allusion in the contract in the present case to wages, and in the pay-sheets to deductions for "doctor" and "school," in connection with all the other circumstances as disclosed in the notes of the case shew plainly, I think, that the Messrs Gardner, and those immediately under them, were in reality just ordinary workmen of the defenders; and if so, enough for the determination of the case in favour of the defenders.

It was further maintained by the defenders, under the second branch of their argument, that even supposing the relation of fellow-servants did not exist between Woodhead and Beveridge, or, in other words, assuming that while Woodhead was the servant of the defenders, the former was the servant of the latter, as independent contractors, still the defenders would not be liable as pursuers, in respect that Woodhead, by working in the same pit with Beveridge in operations necessary for putting out coal for the defenders, was technically a servant of theirs or not, must be held in the present case to have undertaken all the risks of the work and workmen in including the risk of negligence on the part of Beveridge. This contention was maintained in argument by the defenders on the same ground substantially that on which the doctrine of collaborateur is rested; and in support of their contention reference was made by them to the opinion of Lord Chancellor in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, to the effect that he said "the liability or non-liability of the master to his workmen can only depend on the question whether the author of the accident is not, or is, in any sense, the fellow-workman or collaborateur of the sufferer. In the cases in which accidents have occurred the negligence has no doubt been the negligence of a fellow-workman, but the case of a fellow-workman must stand upon higher and broader ground." Now, although in the number of the cases of claims of reparation for injuries to workmen which have been decided it was enough for the decision that the parties—he who was injured and he who had caused the injury—were fellow-servants in a strictly technical sense, the principle itself upon which the decision proceeded was such as to apply, I think, to other and different circumstances, where no such technical relation of fellow-servants could be said to exist. It is not because the injured party causes the injury, and the party who suffers by it, were fellow-servants at the time of the accident in the same common work that the employer of both is not responsible for the consequences. That is the statement of circumstances, and of itself announces no principle of

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

liability or non-liability. But the principle of non-liability arising out of circumstances is, that the injured party by engaging with others in the same—or to use a figurative expression which I observe has been used in analogous cases—having embarked in the same boat, must be held to have taken all the risks and dangers incident to the position in which he has voluntarily placed himself.

This is a principle which, on the mere statement of it, suggests many various cases depending on circumstances different from that of the injured party being fellow-servants engaged under the same master in the common work. Thus, for example, take the case of a person going into a pit or other dangerous work with the permission, or even on the invitation of the owner, that, I apprehend, would make no difference—of the owner, for the purpose of prosecuting some scientific inquiry, and while there receiving serious injury caused by the culpable negligence of one of the workmen, who was competent and fit for his duty—it is clear, I think, beyond any serious question, that, for the same reason and on the same principle as that which is applied to the present or any other case where the injured and injuring parties are in the relation of fellow-servants engaged in the same common work, the action would lie at his instance against the owner. Or, suppose the case of a person, the owner of a yacht or carriage voluntarily accompanying him or her on a sail or drive being injured through the negligence of one of the crew or the driver of the carriage, it can scarcely be doubted that an action would lie against the owner would be untenable. In all such cases, and they may be multiplied indefinitely, the same principle or rule, that the injured party must be held to have undertaken, in a question with the owner, all the risks and perils incident to the position in which he had voluntarily placed himself, would apply.

Independently, however, of mere hypothetical examples, the rule or principle in question has been recognised by the Courts in several litigated cases, that of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, in such a manner as to show that it is not confined to that of fellow-servants engaged under the same master in the same common employment. In Southgate v. Stanley (25 L. J., 1874), which was a case, not of master and servant, but of householder and visitor, it was held that an action did not lie at the instance of the latter against the former for negligence which might have been that of one of the servants of the house. The ground upon which the Court proceeded is thus stated by Baron Pollock,—"I think," said his Lordship, "this case rests on the general principle which governed the Court in deciding the circumstances in which a servant cannot maintain an action against his master, and which stands as the law on the subject. Mr Gray truly stated the principle on which such cases rest to be, that persons in one establishment are sailing in the same boat, and that no action will lie by one servant against a master for an injury to his fellow-servant. So, a son cannot bring an action against his father for an injury to a person who volunteers his assistance bring an action on account of a chance happening through a servant or other member of the family, but he is himself for the occasion one of the family." And the same view was expressed by the same learned Judge in the case of Abraham v. Reynolds (26 L. J., 173), and in Potter v. Franklin (31 L. J., Q. B. 30), it was held that a master was not liable for the consequence of injuries caused through the negligence of a servant.

wants to persons voluntarily assisting them, although not strictly their fellow-servants, or servants at all of the master. No. 82.

was disposed to think, therefore, that the defenders cannot be made responsible for the injuries caused to the deceased David Woodhead by Colin Beveridge, as these two persons are to be held to have been fellow-servants engaged at the same time in the same common work under the same master or not, it is sufficient that at the time of the accident they were engaged in the same kind of work, and working for the attainment of the same object, although the one (Beveridge) had the defenders themselves as his immediate master, and the other (Woodhead) had for his immediate masters the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for the pursuer, are authorities to the contrary, for in both these cases, peculiar in their circumstances, it was held that the person injured and the person causing the injury were neither fellow-servants nor engaged in common employment, but stood rather in the relation of strangers to each other. The case, however, of Gregory v. Hill, which was also cited and relied upon by the pursuer, is certainly a more formidable authority to which there it seems to have been held that the immunity of an employer from the consequences of an accident caused by the fault of his workmen can only be maintained if the person injured and the person injuring were at the time of the accident engaged as fellow-servants in the same common work under a contract with the same common master. But it appears to me that this is a view which cannot be sustained consistently with the other cases to which I have referred with the exposition of the true principle given in the House of Lords in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham.

In regard, then, to all the authorities, and considering that, notwithstanding the decision in Gregory v. Hill, and the remark which, it appears, fell from the Lord President in regard to that decision on a former occasion, the present case has been referred for the decision of seven Judges, I assume that I am not precluded from expressing the opinion I have formed.

It is that, in accordance with the views I have now expressed, the first and second exceptions to the directions which were given at the trial, and the third exception to the directions which were refused to be given, will fall to the ground. The remaining two exceptions do not appear to me to require to be

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

THE JUDGE.—As I have come to the same conclusion as the majority of your Lordships, and substantially on the same grounds, I do not think it necessary to state the general import of my opinion. The rule, the application of which is here in question, as I understand it, is this, that where two persons are engaged in one common employment, with a common object, and under the same regulations and control—more especially in a case of the kind now before you, where the employment is known to be attended with considerable risk, arising in many, if not most, instances from the negligence of the workmen—each workman engaged in that employment is held to have assumed the risk in view when he undertook the employment, and is not therefore

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

entitled to demand reparation for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow-workman from the employer of that workman.

The law was so laid down by Lord Cranworth in the case of the Earl of Devon v. The Great Western Railway Co., when his Lordship, in moving the reversal of the decision of the Court of Session, said (3 Macq. 284)—“When the workman contracts to do a particular sort of work, he knows, or ought to know, to what risk he is exposing himself; he knows if such be the nature of the risk that wants to be taken on the part of a fellow-workman may be injurious or fatal to him, and against such want of care his employer cannot by possibility protect him. If such want of care should occur, and evil is the result, he cannot say that he does not know whether the master or the servant was to blame. He cannot say that the blame was wholly that of the servant. He cannot say the master was not engaged in the work at all, for he was party to its being undertaken. The principle, therefore, seems to be opposed to the doctrine that the responsibility of a master for the ill consequences of his servants' carelessness is applied to the demand made by a fellow-workman in respect of evil resulting from the carelessness of a fellow-workman when engaged in a common work. It is, again, when illustrating what constituted a fellow-workman in the same rule, his Lordship said (p. 296)—“The man who lets the miners down a mine in order that they may work the coal, and afterwards brings the coal up together with the coal which they have dug, is certainly engaged in the same work with the miners themselves. They are all contributing directly to the same common object of their common employer in bringing coal to the surface.”

Such is the clear opinion of Lord Cranworth; and the law is laid down in very similar terms by Chief-Justice Shaw in the American case of Putnam v. Boston Railway, mentioned by Lord Cranworth with approbation, as being in the same volume of Macqueen, p. 317-319. This rule has no doubt been so laid down in cases where the labourers were the servants, in the same sense of the word, of the same master. But the rule was said by Lord Cranworth in the Bartonshill case, to be one of universal application; and it has been so dealt with. Because about the date of that decision, viz., in the case of Degg v. The Midland Railway (1 Hurl. and Nor. 773), the rule was held to apply to a party who was a stranger, who voluntarily engaged himself as a servant of a railway company, and who was injured by the railway company's servants. It was there strongly contended that the rule had no application except in the case of hired servants acting under the same employer: but this contention was rejected on the ground that the party injured voluntarily took to assist, when in the knowledge of the risk he might run. It was, I think, a decision to the effect that it is not essential, in order to free a party from liability for a claim of this description, that the party injured should be a servant, in the strict acceptation of the term, directly employed and paid by the same master as the workman who causes the injury. In the subsequent case of Abraham v. Reynolds (5 Hurl. and Nor. 143), Chief-Baron Pollock lays down distinctly that the rule is one which, in his opinion, cannot be limited to the case of a master and his servants. For he says (p. 148)—“The case of a master and servant is only one of a class. The question has hitherto arisen between master and servant; but it appears to me that the learning on the subject has not been exhausted.” And there is, I conceive, authority to the same effect in the opinion of the present Lord Chancellor in the case of Wright v. Carter and Cunningham, which has been read by your Lordship.

not therefore think that the decisions can be held to have restricted the case of parties standing towards each other in the relation of paid s of the same master ; and I am of opinion that the question as to the application of the rule is quite open for decision. That being so, it appears to me that the circumstances of this case are of a description seem not only to admit of, but to call for its application ; and I have o this conclusion for substantially the same reasons as those which have clearly explained by your Lordship in the chair. There can, I think, doubt upon the evidence in the case that the deceased was under an tion of the nature described by your Lordship. He was a party who, at e of his death, had voluntarily undertaken all the ordinary risks of a m in the defenders' colliery ; and had subjected himself to the special nd regulations applicable to that work, which it is proved were duly up for the guidance of the miners who were there employed. It is in e, moreover, that the deceased had been engaged as a miner in the works before the occurrence in question, under the direct employment of the m ; but that, in consequence of some temporary change in the arrange- working the coal in the east level, his services had been transferred to m, who had undertaken to work the coal in that part of the pit, subject isting organisation. Now, had the accident occurred at the time when ned was employed and paid directly by the defenders, it cannot admit, upon the decided cases, that no claim for reparation would have lain e defenders ; and I am unable to find any satisfactory grounds for hat the mere circumstance that the deceased was then working as one ctor's gang, and was not paid directly by the defenders, should make nence in the application of the rule. The deceased was still subject to tations established by the defenders for the conduct of their works, to extent as he was when employed directly by them ; and having thus ly continued under the supervision and direction of the underground ; roadman, and overseers employed by the defenders, and undertaken gent risks, it appears to me that the case comes fairly and directly e operation of the rule.

GIRFORD.—The two leading questions of law in this case (for there is e as to questions of fact) are—First, Was the deceased David Wood- the legal acceptance of the words as applicable to cases like the present, workman or collaborateur with Colin Beveridge, through whose negli- was killed ? and, Second, Assuming that David Woodhead was not, in sense of the words, a fellow-workman or collaborateur with Beveridge, he, David Woodhead, in such a position and in such circumstances as n and his representatives from making the defenders answerable for of Beveridge ? If either of these legal questions is answered in the e then the verdict cannot stand, for in such case the defenders must n point of law not answerable for the negligence of Beveridge. erence to the first of these questions, viz., Whether the late David d and Colin Beveridge were or were not in the eye of law fellow-work- collaborateurs in this pit, No. 2, I have come to be of opinion, though ut some hesitation, that this question must be answered in the affir- I think that David Woodhead and Colin Beveridge were, quoad the uestion, fellow-workmen or collaborateurs. Of course the difficulty is

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

that they had separate and independent masters. The two men were selected and employed and were not paid directly at least by the employers. Beveridge no doubt was the servant of the defenders, but the defenders did not employ David Woodhead. They did not select him; he was selected and employed by the Gardners alone. It was a mere accident that he had formerly been employed in the pit. He might have been at the time of engagement an entire stranger to it—brought by the Gardners from a distance without any previous consultation with or notice to the defenders. The defenders do not even seem to have approved of the employment further by allowing Woodhead to work. They had nothing to do with his wages as to amount or as to conditions of payment, and undoubtedly Woodhead had been dismissed by the Gardners alone without the consent of the defenders against the will of the defenders. Still further, the defenders seem to have had no immediate control over the details of Woodhead's work provided he complied with the general and special rules of the pit. The Gardners have employed Woodhead in any part of their contract work—in driving level through stone or clay, in brushing the roof, in excavating coal—or in any other incident of the work. With all this the defenders had nothing to do; certainly Woodhead was not their proper or immediate servant, and all they could insist in besides obedience to the rules was the execution by him of his special contract. It was said that under special rule 3 Beveridge had dismissed Woodhead, and probably this is true, because the owners have general power to engage or dismiss all workmen; but this is only to the safety of the pit. Such absolute power must be vested somewhere. Beveridge dismissed Woodhead without cause or reason and without any shewing that in his judgment dismissal was necessary for safety. Beveridge the defenders might be liable in damages. It seems to be clear that, under the regulations, the servant of an independent contractor could not be the servant in any proper or even in any legal sense of the defenders.

But it does not follow that because the two men have not the same employers, or are not under the direction of the same person as to the work and are not paid by the same person, they may not yet be in the law "fellow-workmen or collaborateurs." In every extensive mine servants or workmen often require to hire at their own expense assistants, whom they pay, and with whom, except indirectly, the master has no concern. It is in evidence in the present case that it is a common practice in all mines—more common than the reverse—"for individual miners to hire and pay their own drawers," and the coalmasters have nothing to do with the drawers except in exceptional circumstances. So it used to be common in the districts for agricultural labourers to have each their own bondager or ploughman with whom the farmer had nothing to do, but whose work was paid for by the ploughman or principal servant. Such practices will always be common where workmen are paid by piece or by amount of output, as in mines, for the skilled miner to make the most of his acquired dexterity in his labouring work is done by his assistant; and yet I cannot doubt that the assistant and his drawer would be held as fellow-servants in a claim by either of them for damages against the master. In the strictest possible meaning of the word they would be collaborateurs, liable to each other for their individual faults, neither of them having a claim against the master for the fault of the other. The present case is a more difficult case than that of hewer and drawer.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

suffers in degree, because the contract with the Gardners and their contract their assistants were a little more extensive and a little more express. In consequence, the Gardners were just miners and colliers working by the piece. Instead of day-wages for themselves and assistants they were to be paid 7s. per ton and colliers' wages at 2s. per ton for coal put out from the level or in the case of driving it. It was a small contract, 50 fathoms of level and 40 tons of dook, and though so many as fifteen or sixteen men were employed by the two Gardners, that was because the work was urgent, and they were to work in shifts of five or six at a time. I am of opinion that in the circumstances of the present case the sub-workmen hired by the Gardners were simply fellow-workmen or collaborateurs with the Gardners themselves, in consequence, and in so far as the present question is concerned, fellow-workmen with Beveridge, the underground overman. I really cannot regard them as different from what it would have been if the work had been in no way, and the two Gardners who were to work, and did work themselves, had hired his subordinate drawer or assistant. This might have been the case if the work had not been pressed, or if Gardner's contract had been a smaller. It would be very difficult to hold that in a question with a pit-miner's drawer or a piece-worker's assistants are strangers or third parties to whom the mineowner is liable for the culpa of all his servants.

Where there may be special cases figured where the contract is so large, or the position of the contractors so independent, or his right to occupy the mine so diverse of that of the owner, that different rules might come into play. I apply myself to the circumstances of the present case, and I hold, though I do not without difficulty, that in the circumstances here Beveridge and Woodhead were all in the eye of the law fellow-workmen or collaborateurs in pit No. 2, and this notwithstanding the fact that they were all under separate arrangements as to engagement, payment of wages, and details of work. It does not require payment of wages, or even contract of employment to constitute the relationship of fellow-servants or collaborateurs. A person who willingly, or it may be from pure good nature, assists in doing their work, though gratuitously and without any contract, is a fellow-servant to this effect, that he has no claim on the master for the wrong of another servant whom he was not assisting—Degg v. Midland Railway Company, 26 L. J., Exch. 171; Potter v. Falkner, 31 L. J., Q. B. 30. These cases, and there are others, shew that the personal bar excluding the recovery of damages against the master may be reared up even where there is no contract of service with the plaintiff, and no wages of any kind either stipulated or paid.

I am here specially to notice that it by no means follows that because Woodhead and Beveridge are held fellow-servants or collaborateurs in the present claim against the mineowner, that therefore David Woodhead would be held as in other questions or to all effects the servant of the mineowner. It is quite possible that by assuming the place of a fellow-workman or collaborateur David Woodhead might bar himself from making the present claim against the defenders, and yet in a question with a third party he might nevertheless be held a servant of the defenders at all. In short, it is possible that persons may be fellow-servants or collaborateurs in the same work without being servants of the same master, or perhaps without being servants at all in the strict and proper sense of the word; and in determining, as upon the whole

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

I now do, that David Woodhead and his representatives have no claim against the defenders, because in substance David Woodhead and Colin Beveridge were fellow-servants or collaborateurs, I do not in the least fix or determine that the defenders would have been liable to third parties for the fault or negligence of David Woodhead. In short, a party may, by volunteering to act with servants and in various other ways—and agreeing to serve contractors in such a manner as this seems to be one of the ways—bar himself from holding the mineowner liable for the culpa and negligence of his servants, and yet he may not in the legal sense become the servant of the mineowner, so as to make that mineowner liable to third parties for his, the contractor's, servants' faults.

But these considerations naturally lead me to consider the second question raised in this case, which is—That apart from Beveridge and Woodhead being fellow-servants or collaborateurs, and even supposing that they were so in the legal sense of these words, was their relative position such that David Woodhead could not claim against the defenders for reparation for the fault or negligence of Beveridge, but can only claim reparation against Beveridge himself, whom alone can be ascribed personal or individual fault?

This question may be stated more generally thus—In what cases is a master or employer liable in reparation or damages for the fault or culpa of his servant where no fault or culpa of any kind can be imputed to the master himself?

Now, before answering this question, I remark that the general principle is that culpa tenet suos auctores tantum. As a general equitable principle, one ought to be made responsible for the fault or crime of another, with which fault or crime he has nothing to do, and for which he is not in any way to blame. In so far as proper criminality is concerned—that is, where there is no fault or malice in the criminal alone—no one but the criminal himself is punishable therefor; and this is the law of most civilised countries, exceptions or rather exceptions being introduced very sparingly, and to secure some advantage or supposed advantage to the public. But these exceptions are so rare among civilised nations, that they may be left out of view; and it may be taken as an almost absolute rule that the criminal alone is answerable for his crime. No one is to be punished for the offence of another. Accordingly, if a master is answerable for the fault of his servant, the rule is not so absolute as to make the master answerable for his servant's crime or intentional fault. In such cases the general rule applies—culpa tenet suos auctores. Of course, if the crime has been incited or induced or commanded by the master, the master will be responsible for all the consequences, and will himself be punishable criminally, but that will not be because he is answerable for his servant's crime, for in such cases the master himself is criminal, accomplice, or, as we say, art and part in the crime.

But undoubtedly one exception is admitted to this very general rule—That if a culpa or fault holds or makes answerable the person in fault, or the master alone, and that is the case where a servant in the proper exercise of his duty or employment causes by his fault or negligence injury to a stranger or third party, in such a case the master will be answerable to the stranger or third party for the consequences, just as if the master himself had committed the fault or negligence; and the real question in the present case is, How far this exception extends, and, in particular, does it extend to cases where the person in fault stood in a relation to the servant in fault similar to the relation in which late David Woodhead stood to Beveridge, the defenders' overman.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
 Woodhead v.
 Gartness
 Mineral Co.

am quite aware of the difficulty and danger of laying down general rules, and of going beyond the specialties of the particular case with which we are dealing, and yet I feel compelled in the present case, in order to decide authoritatively the precise question before us, to seek for some general principle which may be applicable to all similar questions. I do not think it would be wise to proceed upon specialties, for I am of opinion that a very general principle is fairly raised here, and one calling for the announcement and application of a general principle. I am disposed to state the general principle—That a master is only responsible for injuries or damages occasioned by the fault of his servant (the master himself being blameless) when the injury is done to third parties or strangers. I think such claim is only competent against members of the public with whom the master has no contract, and who are not placed in any special relation to the master in reference to the employment of the servant in fault. It is not in every case that a master is liable for his servant's fault or negligence. This rule is subject admittedly to very many exceptions. For example, as already noticed, the fault must be committed by the servant while he is in the course of his ordinary employment. The rule does not extend to faults committed while the servant is not acting as such—when he is absent from his service on leave—when he is not in any sense on duty, or when he is acting on his own account and not on that of his master. Again, the master is not responsible when the fault of the servant amounts to proper self-defence when it is intentional and malicious—although I am aware there are cases in which the master's responsibility has been extended to acts done recklessly or in a fit of temporary anger.

And, in like manner, the master is not liable to every person who may be injured by the fault or negligence of his servants, even when acting in the course of his employment. It is now quite fixed that the master is not responsible when the person injured is the fellow-servant and acting in the same employment with the servant who is in fault. But there is the highest authority for saying that this is not the only case in which a master is not responsible for his servant's fault. It is not the rule or principle, but only an exception or example thereof, and in seeking for the rule I do not think we can do better than say that of this, that a master is liable for his servant's fault only when third parties or strangers are injured thereby. Of course this still leaves the question whether a person who is to be considered a third party or a stranger in such circumstances? I think the only answer that can be given to this is, that where a person voluntarily places himself in such a relation to the master or to the establishment or organisation carried on by the master, that he must have known he was exposed to the risk of the negligence of servants, then he can no longer hold a stranger or a third party, and action against the master will be in such instances occur of such relationships. Thus, although a master will not be responsible if his coachman negligently runs down or injures a pedestrian in the street, he will incur no liability to a friend whom he has invited to ride in his carriage, and who is injured by the carelessness of his generally trusted coachman. The foot-passenger on the public road is a stranger, but a friend or acquaintance who has accepted a drive in the carriage will not be considered such. In like manner, a guest who accepts of my hospitality cannot bring any action against me although he has been injured by the fault or negligence of my butler or footman or cook, for he is not a stranger but a guest,

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

and he must have had in view the risks of the carelessness of my servant. He takes this risk himself, provided only that the servants were competently selected with reasonable care. The illustration often given that the master, whom the cook has through carelessness scalded will have no action against the master, will equally apply though the cook's carelessness has accidentally scalded or injured not her fellow-servant but her mistress' daughters or child. No action will lie at their instance any more than at that of the kitchen against the master of the house. It would be quite otherwise if the cook or butler's carelessness have injured a passer-by on the public street.

I take, then, the case of a master being liable for the fault or negligence of a servant to be a very limited exception to the far more general and almost universal, rule that in cases of crime or delict or quasi delict or culpa is the person to blame who must alone bear the consequences. The master is not responsible, except in the solitary case where an entire stranger who has entered into no relation with the master is injured by the servant's fault occurring in the ordinary course of the servant's duties.

Now, applying this to the case of a coal-pit or mine like the present, it very seldom happens that any one voluntarily entering such a mine occupies the position of a stranger. There should be no strangers in a coal-pit. Even the Government inspector who goes there in discharge of his public duty is not to be held a stranger or entitled to a stranger's privilege; and possibly even a miner may be figured, for example, the public officers of justice executing a warrant in search of a criminal; but leaving such special cases out of view, I am of opinion that all the miners, in the statutory sense of that word, and that the contractors and sub-contractors and their servants, who become parties to the general rules and parts of the general organisation of such a mine, must be held to take their risk of the accidental negligence or mistakes of all the other persons, all of whom they have the means of knowing, and regarding whom they may make any inquiries they please, and that the owners of the pit or the persons engaged in working it are not liable for such accidental fault or carelessness unless it can be shewn that they are personally to blame for having employed improper or incompetent persons. Every one who enters a pit, whether as a permitted visitor actuated only by curiosity or by love of science, or as a man who accepts employment there and makes himself acquainted with the organisation, must take the risk of the carelessness of all the employees, and can only claim damages from the persons who are actually in fault.

It is on this view that the general and special rules under which the question was worked become of importance. All these rules have the sanction of the statute, and were specially assented to and subscribed by the deceased Woodhead. They shew that the pit No. 2 was worked as one undertaking, an establishment, organised on one system governing all persons employed in any way in or about the workings, so that all who accepted employment there were members of one federation or organised body, and as such all were held to be responsible, although it might be in separate departments, in carrying out one common purpose. In such a case I think every one who enters the pit as a member of the organisation must be held to accept the risk of the accidental carelessness or negligence of other members, and that his only remedy lies against the individual wrongdoer.

On these grounds I think the verdict must be entered up for the defendant.

and SHAND.—The jury by their verdict in this case have found in substance the death of the pursuer's son was caused by the fault of Beveridge, the defenders' underground manager; and, giving effect to the directions of the learned Judge who presided, this necessarily led to a verdict against the defenders on the issue. The defenders did not by their directors, or otherwise by servants, interfere in the arrangements or management of the pit in which the accident took place, and it is not suggested that they were themselves guilty of any fault or negligence. It is not alleged that there was want of care in the selection of servants, or in placing at the disposal of these servants all that was required for the safe conduct of the operations. Indeed, it was expressly admitted at the trial that Beveridge was a competent person for his duty, and also, that the appointments of the colliery were sufficient. The ground of defence is thus simply fault on the part of the defenders' servant without any fault on the part of the company; and in these circumstances I am of opinion that the defenders are not liable in damages, that the first and second exceptions are well founded, and that the first direction asked by the defenders should have been given.

The directions given made the verdict turn entirely on the question whether Beveridge, the underground manager, was a fellow-servant of the deceased.

The directions were substantially (1) that if Beveridge was not a fellow-servant with the deceased the defenders were responsible for his fault; (2) that attention on the defenders' part that Beveridge was a fellow-servant was required by the terms of the contract with the Gardners, by whom the deceased was directly employed; and (3) that the Mines Regulation Act, including, I think, the special rules framed in compliance with the Act, did not affect the question. The directions in effect stated that inasmuch as Beveridge was not a fellow-servant of the deceased the defenders were responsible for his fault. With deference to the learned Judge, this direction seems to me prima facie to be subject to the objection that it is at variance with the latest authoritative statement of the law in the leading case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham (6 Macph. 84), in which the Lord Chancellor said—"I do not think the liability of the employer to his workmen can depend upon the question whether the author of the fault is or is not in any technical sense the fellow-workman or collaborateur of the worker. . . . The case of the fellow-workman appears to me to be an example of a rule and not the rule itself. The rule, as I think, must stand upon higher and broader grounds." A similar view had been previously expressed by Chief-Justice Pollock in the case of Abraham v. Reynolds in the Court of Exchequer in 1860 (5 Hurl. and Nor. 143), when he stated that the case of master and servant was only one of a class, and that the learning on the subject was by this time exhausted. Unfortunately, though the cases which have occurred for many years have been very numerous, no general rule or principle by which future cases may be tested and decided has yet been laid down. The difficulty in the way of doing so is now increased by the circumstance that it is far from easy to reconcile a number of the decisions with one another, or to extract from them and formulate any rule of clear, general, and certain application.

The ground of action in this class of cases is fault, and the broad principle applicable to that ground of liability is expressed by the rule culpa tenet suos &c.

It cannot, I think, be doubted that this rule is founded on reason. It gives sanction to a sound legal principle, and is in accordance with good sense. It

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

appears to me to be most difficult to find a good reason for holding anyone who is himself free from fault liable for the consequences of the fault of another, in the absence of any contract or obligation, either express or to be inferred by direct and necessary implication, to undertake such liability. The rule has, however, been made the subject of a large class of exceptions, or perhaps it should rather be said, the rule has been virtually set aside in a large class of cases in which the law has professed to give effect to another general principle, viz. qui facit per alium facit per se, or, as otherwise expressed, respondet superior. The cases to which I refer are those in which an injury has been sustained through the fault of a servant by a stranger to the master. If the question is still open, and the principle to be applied to these cases had now to be fixed for the first time, it appears to me that the rule culpa tenet suos auctores is a sound one, and that liability on the ground of fault, apart from contract, should not to be imposed on any one who has not been personally guilty of fault. The other principle of respondet superior is, in my opinion, carried beyond its reasonable scope and extent, and is indeed misapplied when it is used to create or infer liability for any acts of an agent or servant except such as are truly authorised either expressly or as the legitimate result of the agency or employment. The Lord-Justice Bramwell in giving the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Degg v. The Midland Railway Company in 1857 (1 Hurl. and C. 100) indicates the view now stated in these words:—"The law, for reasons of convenience, more than on principle, makes a master liable in certain cases for the acts of his servants, not only in cases in the nature of contract, which depend on different considerations, but in cases independently of contract, such as negligence in driving in the public streets when damage is thereby done." In the case of Bartonshill Coal Company the reason for imposing liability and applying the maxim respondet superior is thus stated by Lord Cranworth—"The master is considered as bound to guarantee third parties against all hurt arising from the carelessness of himself or of those acting under his orders in the course of his business. Third persons cannot, or at all events may not, know whether the particular injury complained of was the act of the master or the act of the servant. The person sustaining injury in any of the modes I have suggested has the right to say—I was no party to your carriage being driven along the road, or your shooting near the public road, or to your being engaged in business at home; if you choose to do or cause to be done any of these acts it is to your servants I must look for redress if mischief happens to me and its consequences. A large portion of the ordinary acts of life are attended with some risk to third persons, and no one has a right to involve others in such risk without their consent. These considerations are sufficient to justify the wisdom of the rule which makes the person by whom or by whose orders these risks are increased responsible to third persons for any ill consequences resulting from want of due skill or caution." The reasons thus given for imposing liability on the master humbly appear to me rather to explain the grounds upon which an exception to the general rule has been introduced than to afford good reasons for its introduction or adoption. The suggestion that third persons may not know whether the particular injury complained of was the act of the master or of the servant obviously places the rule on no higher grounds than those of expediency. It affords no good reason for the injustice of holding one person who is free from fault responsible for the fault of another.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

fact that a large portion of the ordinary acts of life, such as using the public with a cart or carriage, shooting game upon enclosed land, building a house round adjoining the highway, and the like, are attended with some risks to persons, and so require the exercise of care, does not appear to me to afford reason for imposing liability on those who are in the performance of ordinary and legitimate acts only—who are themselves exercising an ordinary common law right with due care on their part, and who are thus guilty of fault. If I direct my coachman to drive along a public road in a manner a pace dangerous to others, liability for injury caused will justly follow on the ground of personal fault, of culpa, and on the principle qui facit per se facit per se,—that is, on the ground of authority given to do the act which is dangerous to others, which is the proper case for the application of the rule. But if I have chosen an experienced and careful man, and directed him to drive carefully, and so as to avoid danger to third parties, or have employed skilful and careful men as gamekeepers, or as workmen in the erection of my house, it seems to me that my use of the highway in the one case, or of my own property in the other case supposed, being one of the “ordinary acts of life,” not only attended with danger to others, and only dangerous when individual fault is committed, ought not to infer liability on my part should injury result from the fault of my skilled coachman, or gamekeeper, or the builder engaged in my service. I see no good reason in principle for distinguishing the liability on the part of the master to fine or punishment for the consequences of reckless driving, or reckless firing, or careless building, in the cases I mention, and liability for the civil consequences arising from the same fault. A reckless or careless act of the coachman or gamekeeper or builder, being authorised, ought not in principle to infer liability in one respect more than the other.

There is as much—or I should rather say as little—principle for holding a master liable for criminal as for civil consequences in the case supposed. In the exception to the rule culpa tenet suos auctores in the case of strangers, based on the principle qui facit per alium is, in my opinion, a misapplication of the latter principle, for I think that principle ought to receive effect only with respect to acts authorised expressly, or which are the proper result of implied authority given.

Regarding it, however, as settled by the law as now administered that on grounds of supposed convenience,” or of more than doubtful principle, liability exists to a stranger or third party on the part of a master (who is guilty of no fault) for injuries caused by the fault of a servant acting in his service, there is neither reason nor expediency in making a farther or wider class of exceptions to the rule which renders a person responsible for his own fault only. If the injured be a stranger, it is said he must have a remedy because he has no ready means of knowing whether the injury occurred through the fault of the master or the servant, and because he has been subjected to risks without fault. These observations, however, do not apply in the case of persons who are not strangers, but who are placed or voluntarily place themselves in certain positions and relations which necessarily subject them to certain known risks to persons who enter a common employment, permanently or for a time, or for a short, —who are to become members for the time of the circle of service, family, or organisation, or establishment,—and by so doing undergo risks which are not naturally incident to their position, in consequence of which they are injured. There is no good reason for extending the exception to the ordi-

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

nary rule to such cases, to the case of proper fellow-servants or persons volunteering to take part in the servants' duties—to friends who may visit them—the members of a family, or their guests or visitors,—or to any of the many permanent or temporary, of any organisation or establishment in which, however variously occupied, are working towards one common end or purpose—should any of these persons receive injury by the fault of one, it may be a large circle, with whom he is naturally brought into contact.

The question in each case appears to me to resolve into this :—Is the person who complains of the injury a stranger or third party as regards the person who is sought to be made liable for the fault of his servant or agent? Is he one to whom it can be said that no relation subsisted between him and the person whom he seeks to hold responsible for the fault of another, which made the risk he underwent and the consequent injury a natural incident of his position? Unless it can be shewn that he is in this position,—that he was, in the language of the Lord Chancellor in the Bartonshill case, in a position “external to the master and his servants,”—the ordinary and reasonable rule of culpa tenet auctores, and not the exception of that rule, applies.

As regards the question, who is to be considered a stranger and so entitled to hold the master responsible for the consequences of the fault of his servant, I am humbly of opinion that the decisions have gone as far as they should allow—some of them indeed too far; and when the cases are considered I think it is not difficult to perceive the reason of this. There appears to be that the cases in which strangers claimed and obtained damages against the master of a servant in fault were so common that they came to be regarded as examples of a broad and general rule, imposing liability for the fault of others, rather than examples of an exceptional and limited class of circumstances in which an exception to the general rule of culpa tenet auctores was admitted. It is remarkable that in the case of Priestley v. Fowler (3 Ex. and Wel. 1), which occurred in the Court of Exchequer so recently as 1837, which is now generally referred to as the earliest authority in the law as to claims of damages for injuries caused by fellow-servants or collaborators. Abinger, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said :—“It is admitted that there is no precedent for the present action by a servant against a master. We are therefore to decide the question upon general principles, and in doing so we have liberty to look at the consequences of a decision the one way or the other. In that case, on general principles, it was held the servant could not sue. But in most of the cases in this country and in England, indeed in almost all of them which have occurred since that time, it has been assumed in the courts that the ordinary rule or principle was in favour of liability against a master not in fault for the consequences of fault on the part of his servant. This question has been discussed from this as the starting point, and has been put, Is there a good reason why the master should not be responsible in such a case? If it be said this is merely a form of stating the question which was affected the result, I do not agree in the observation. On the contrary, the form of the question having assumed a general rule or principle against the master and imposing liability on him, and so having laid the onus on the master to exempt him, has, I think, materially affected the result to the prejudice of the law. The true position of the parties where fault is the ground of action is stated by Lord Cranworth in the Bartonshill case :—“Where an injury

d to any one by the negligence of another, if the person injured seeks to e with its consequences any person other than him who actually caused the ge, it lies on the person injured to shew that the circumstances were such make some other person responsible"—and if the question had been always sented, and it had been fully recognised that the person injured must s shew that he was in the position of a stranger to the master sought to be responsible, I greatly doubt if the liability of the master would have been d so far as the cases have gone.

the present case I think it has not been shewn that there are grounds for g the defenders to be responsible to the deceased workman Woodhead, or representatives, for the consequences of the fault of Beveridge; for I think it t be said with truth or propriety that Woodhead, in the work in which he engaged, was in the position of a stranger or third party in a question with defenders. His relation towards the defenders and Beveridge was such that ring the tests stated by Lord Cranworth in the Bartonshill case and already
d) (1) he or his representatives could have no difficulty in distinguishing er an injury sustained was the result of fault on the part of the defenders the part of their servant; and (2) the ordinary risks or perils necessarily st to the work in which he engaged were obvious, and such as often lead as injury or even to loss of life, either from unavoidable accident or from ls of others engaged in the pursuit of the same common object. The d and Beveridge were admittedly engaged in a common employment, in se of common work, although it is said they had not the same master.
ere working in the same pit, and with one common purpose in view, viz., ing of minerals to the surface. As appears from the rules by which all in the pit were regulated, and which have been referred to in detail by your Lordships, they had in many respects important duties to each other, lge having not only the care of the ventilation and roads, but the duty of ing the working place at which Woodhead was engaged, as well as the tome by him, and Woodhead being subject to directions and even liable nised by Beveridge. In such circumstances, and where the parties were y working towards one common object, but were each members of the mmunity or establishment, standing in a relation which implied important o each other and to the defenders, the deceased cannot, I think, be regarded ght of a stranger, to whom the defenders would be responsible for the fault servant. The words of Chief-Baron Pollock in the case of Abraham v.
ls (5 Hurl. and Nor. 143) appear to me to apply forcibly to the present case; rule applies to every establishment. No member of an establishment tain an action against the master for an injury done to him by another of that establishment, in respect of which if he had been a stranger he ave had a right of action. A friend of the servant—a son or a relation the same house, not in the character of a servant, but as a member of e family—is probably in the same position, and such persons cannot a actions any more than a servant could. But that is where they form ily or one establishment for one common purpose." If it be supposed ther miner directly employed by the defenders had fallen to the bottom it from the same cause, and at the same time as Woodhead, I think it ossible to find a satisfactory principle which will distinguish the two as to make the defenders responsible for the death of Woodhead, though uld certainly not have been responsible for the death of the other work-

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

No. 82.

Feb. 10, 1877.
Woodhead v.
Gartness
Mineral Co.

man. Both were engaged in the same pit, as members of the same establishment, working for a common object, and neither therefore was a stranger to the defenders, by whom the pit was being worked. The single circumstance in question is that the direct employers of the deceased were the Gartners and not the defenders, but that cannot, I think, overcome the effect of the other circumstances already referred to, which place the deceased in a common relation with all the other persons working in the pit.

The case of Gregory v. Hill (8 Macph. 282), decided in 1869, was relied on by the pursuer; but I think the grounds of decision in that case are not satisfactory. It seems to me to conflict with the principle of the cases of the Bartonhill Company v. Wright v. Morris, and Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham, and to be directly opposed to the case of Wigget v. Fox (25 L. J. Exch. 188), in the Court of Exchequer in England in 1856, which has been often referred to in subsequent cases, and is recognised as authoritative. It appears to me that where a number of persons are engaged together in different capacities and departments, in the common work of building a house, or a ship, or in any similar undertaking where, from the very nature of the work, they have duties to each other, and although the employment is derived indirectly from the same source—the particular classes of workmen having no direct and immediate employment from their own master—there is yet a bond of union amongst all of them as makes them one family or establishment, and precludes one of them if injured from imposing responsibility on the master of another workman, as a stranger if injured might do. The cases of Macpherson v. Reynolds and Wyllie v. The Caledonian Railway Company are distinguished from the cases of Gregory v. Hill and Wigget v. Fox, in this respect, that the persons injured were not members of the same establishment or permanently engaged in an undertaking having, strictly speaking, one common object in view. In the former the person injured was taking delivery of bales from a warehouse, and was injured through the fault of the warehouseman's servant. In the latter a servant delivering cattle at a railway station, and who assisted in putting the cattle into trucks, was injured by the fault of a servant of the company while taking delivery. In these cases the injured persons were regarded as strangers, and not as engaged in an employment having a common object, because they were severally acting independently and for separate interests from the persons with whom they were temporarily brought into contact—in the one case in receiving delivery from others, and in the other in giving delivery to others. In the former separate duty it was to take delivery. It may be questioned, I think, whether in these cases have not extended the class of strangers too far, and whether, where persons are engaged in such an act as taking and giving delivery of goods, as in mooring a vessel at a pier, all who are engaged in such work with duties to each other, and having, in a reasonable sense, a common object in view, should not be regarded as members of one body, none of whom can hold the master of the other responsible except for personal fault; but these cases have, I think, fixed the law which must be applied in similar circumstances, so long as their authority is not questioned in the Court of last resort. The cases of Calder v. Caledonian Company in 1871, and Adams v. The Glasgow and Western Railway Company in 1875, relied on by the pursuers, do not conflict with the decision to be now given in this case, for in both the persons injured were using railways as public highways, and were thus, in the view of the law, strangers in a question with the companies who were employers of the persons who caused the injuries.

have only to add, that with reference to the argument that the deceased in this No. 82.
 ought to be regarded as a stranger to the defenders in the present question as he was a workman for whose fault the defenders would not be respon- Feb. 10, 1877.
 to third parties, I agree in the opinion with Lord Gifford that this does Woodhead v.
 follow. The immediate employers of Woodhead, the Gardners, would have Gartness responsible for injuries caused by him to third parties—strangers—in the Mineral Co.
 of his work, if such a case occurred; and it may be the defenders would have been responsible. But I think the question of the defenders' responsibility for injuries sustained by Woodhead through their servant's fault depends on general considerations entirely different from those which would have determined the defenders' liability to strangers for the fault of Woodhead. This question must be solved by the consideration whether Woodhead was provided for by the defenders,—whether he was in their service, and acting in performing the act complained of,—while it is a sufficient answer to him by him or his representatives, based on the fault of a servant of the defenders in the mine, that he was not a stranger—that though his relation to the defenders was not that of a servant hired and paid by them, he was yet one of the general community or organisation, none of whom were strangers to the others or to each other.

When the case was called in the Second Division the defenders moved for expenses. The pursuer submitted that, as there was no notice on record of defence which had been sustained, and which, if it had been dismissed, at the adjustment of issues, might have prevented any trial taking place at all, expenses should be greatly modified.

Court agreed to modify the expenses after the defenders' account was read.

THE JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is now conclusively settled that, however independent a contract may be, if the work is a common one, such as the working of a coal mine, the building of a house, the master or owner cannot be made liable for injuries unless his subordinates be proved to have been incompetent, or the materials supplied by him insufficient, and therefore, in future, an issue should be made unless there are averments on one or other of these points.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Second Division having, along with the four Judges of the First Division, heard counsel on the motion to apply the verdict for the defenders, and on the bill of exceptions, in conformity with the opinion of a majority of the seven Judges, enter up a verdict for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the summons: Find the defenders entitled to expenses (including the expenses of the trial) subject to modification, and before answer as to the amount of modification, appoint the defenders to lodge in process their account of expenses, and remit the same," &c.

WRIGHT & JOHNSTON, Solicitors—RUSSELL & NICOLSON, C.S.—Agents.

JAMES BRAIK MASON, Pursuer.—M'Laren.

ROBERT STEWART, Defender.—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 83.

Feb. 21, 1877.

—Reclaiming Note—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 1, sub-sec. 5, and Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.—An interlocutor, approving of the trial of the cause, but neither appointing the cause to be tried nor fixing a day for the trial, held to be an interlocutor importing an

No 83. appointment of proof, which might be reclaimed against within six days with leave of the Lord Ordinary.

Feb. 21, 1877.

Mason v.
Stewart.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

IN this case the Lord Ordinary, by an interlocutor, dated 24th January 1877, appointed the pursuer to lodge "such issues as he proposes should be the issues in the trial of the cause in the event of the cause being sent to trial by a jury," and by an interlocutor of 7th February following replying to a plea against the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, and approving the issues lodged "as amended by the Lord Ordinary for the trial of the cause."

Against this latter interlocutor the defender reclaimed.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, on the ground that the interlocutor reclaimed against was one which required the leave of the Lord Ordinary; that it was not an interlocutor appointing a proof, and so falling under A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 1, section 5, and sec. 2, and Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28, but merely an interlocutor approving issues and leaving the proof still to be appointed. Even after the interlocutor was pronounced there was nothing to prevent the Lord Ordinary trying the case on the issues thereby adjusted with a jury under 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, sec. 46.

Replied by the defender;—This was nothing short of an interlocutor appointing the case to be tried by jury, and adjusting the issue, merely the day of trial to be afterwards fixed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question is not attended with much difficulty, for the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary are certainly not in the usual form. On 24th January 1877 he "appoints the pursuer to give in such issues as he proposes should be the issues in the trial of the cause in the event of the cause being sent to trial by jury; and appoints the debate on the record and said proof issues to be resumed on this day week." Now, by that interlocutor the Lord Ordinary plainly intended to keep open the question whether the case should be tried before himself or before a jury. But at the same time he had evidently in view that it was expedient that the question to be tried should be put in the form of an issue.

Then, when he hears the resumed debate on the closed record and the issues proposed by the pursuer, after repelling certain pleas for the defence on 7th February, "approves of the said issues as amended by the Lord Ordinary for the trial of the cause."

Now, that proceeding was taken under the 5th sub-section of the 1st section of A. S., March 10, 1870—"In every case in which proof is to be taken by a jury issues shall be adjusted, either at the time of proof being appointed, or on a day to be fixed not later than eight days thereafter; and the parties shall lodge the issues respectively proposed by them two days before the day so fixed." And the question comes to be whether the interlocutor approving issues can be brought under review without the leave of the Lord Ordinary. But that is settled by the 2d section of the same A. S., which provides that "the provisions of the 28th section of the said statute" (Court of Session Act, 1868) "shall apply to all the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary hereinbefore referred to, so far as these import an appointment of proof, or a refusal to appoint, or a postponement of the same." Now, the 28th section of the Act of 1868 requires the interlocutors to which it applies final, unless reclaimed against within six days.

¹ Stewart v. Clark, March 4, 1871, 9 Macph. 616, 43 Scot. Jur. 41.

subject to be reclaimed against within that time without leave of the Lord No. 83.
 ary. Is, then, this an interlocutor which, in terms of the 2d section of Feb. 21, 1877.
 1870, imports an appointment of proof? I think it clearly does import Mason v.
 appointment of proof. To settle issues for the trial of a case is surely to Stewart.
 nt that proof shall be led. I cannot conceive a clearer implication. That ocutor being pronounced, it is quite competent to give notice for trial at tings under the standing rules regulating jury trial, independent altogether e Act of 1868 and the A. S. 1870, or to apply to the Lord Ordinary
 : a day for trial before him. The case was made ready for trial by the eutor sought to be brought under review. Therefore that interlocutor is lity and substance an interlocutor importing an appointment of proof.

ND DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT sustained the competency of the reclaiming note.

MACARA & CLARK, W.S.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN MORRIS, Pursuer.—M'Kechnie.

No. 84.

CHARLES THOMAS BRISBANE, Defender.—Asher—Jameson.

Feb. 21, 1877.

*Superior and Vassal—Redemption of Casualties—37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, No. 84.
 —An original feu-disposition granted in 1833 contained a clause exclud- Feb. 21, 1877.
 subinfeudation, fenced by an irritancy. The vassal was duly infeft. After Morris v. conveyances of the feu-right to disponees who did not enter with the Brisbane.
 r, a disponee, infeft on a disposition which did not express the manner of g, raised an action against the superior concluding for declarator that the not in non-entry, the original vassal being still alive, and that the pur-is entitled to redeem the casualties on payment of a year's rent of the s and 50 per cent additional, under section 15 of the "Conveyancing 1874." The feu-disposition did not stipulate for payment of any casualty le or transfer of the property.*

efence the superior maintained, 1, That the pursuer had no title to sue, in
 (1) that he was not entered, his infeftment not being confirmed, and (2) infeftment was null as proceeding on an a me warrant and unconfirmed;
 t the irritancy clause excluding subinfeudation enabled the superior to l a casualty on each sale of the feu, and, therefore, that the redemption as twice-and-a-half times the amount of the casualty.

(1) that the pursuer had a title to sue, the Act of 1874 expressly ag as a confirmation of his infeftment, and giving an implied entry; and t as the superior could not compel an entry except on the death of a the pursuer was entitled to redeem at the price stated by him.

N MORRIS, accountant in Glasgow, raised this action against Charles 2D DIVISION. s Brisbane, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Brisbane, to R. t declared,—(1) That Morris was, in virtue of a disposition in his dated 3d and recorded 12th May 1876, duly vested and seised in minium utile of certain subjects in Largs, of which Mr Brisbane e superior; (2) that, in virtue of a feu-disposition, dated 29th iber 1833, and instrument of sasine following thereon, and recorded une 1834, a certain John Paterson was duly infeft in the fee of subjects under an express prohibition against subinfeudation; (3) e casualties for the subjects were exigible only on the death of the ered vassal, and John Paterson being still alive the subjects were non-entry, and no casualties were at present due and payable by to Brisbane as superior; and (4) that, in order to redeem the casualties incident to the subjects, Morris was bound only to pay thest casualty estimated at the date of raising the action, with an

No. 84.

Feb. 21, 1877.
 Morris v.
 Brisbane.

addition of 50 per cent. There was also a conclusion to the effect that, upon Morris paying the amount calculated on the basis of the fourth conclusion, he was entitled to a discharge of the casualties.

The original feu-disposition of November 1833 contained the following clause prohibiting subinfeudation:—"That it shall not be lawful for the said John Paterson or his foresaids to sub-feu the said piece of ground or any part thereof, or to dispoise the same, to be holden of themselves but allenarly of and under the dispoonees, as their immediate lawful superiors thereof; and that on contravention in this point, not only such subaltern feu-rights, but also these presents, and all following hereon, shall be null and void."

John Paterson, after being infeft in the subjects, dispoined them to a purchaser, who in turn dispoined them to another purchaser. The subjects, after passing through various hands, in all cases on disposition containing a double manner of holding, eventually came into the possession of John Aitchison and his wife, who were the immediate authors of Morris, the pursuer.

The disposition by the Aitchisons to Morris contained no express manner of holding. None of the intermediate possessors of the subjects were entered with the superior, and John Paterson, the original proprietor, was alive at the date of the action.

Morris, in his condescendence, narrated the provisions of the 15th section of the "Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874."*

It was contended by Morris that, under the provisions of the 15th section of the Act of 1874 above quoted, he was, in the circumstances of the feu, only liable in the highest casualty, with the addition of 50 per cent.

It was agreed on by the parties that the full free rental of the subjects was £70, and that on the basis contended for by Morris £105 would be the amount payable by him.

The superior, however, maintained that the clause in the original disposition prohibiting subinfeudation was inserted in order to insure that the superior should get a casualty, not merely on the death of a vassal, but at each transmission of the feu, and he therefore contended he was entitled to the full casualty and two-and-a-half times its amount.

It was pleaded for the defender;—(1) That, in a question with the pursuer had no title to sue; (2) that the pursuer was not entitled to redeem; and (3) that the redemption-money offered was too small.

On 6th November 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is entitled to redeem the casualty incident to the feu libelled by payment of the highest casualty estimated as at the date of redemption, with an addition of 50 per cent: Finds that the parties have agreed that the casualty is to be estimated at £70: Finds

* 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, sec. 15.—"The casualties incident to any feu created prior to the commencement of this Act shall be redeemable on such terms as may be agreed on between the superior and the proprietor of the feu in respect of which they are payable; and failing agreement, all such casualties except those which consist of a fixed amount stipulated and agreed to be payable in money or in fungibles at fixed periods or intervals, may be redeemed by the proprietor of the feu, in respect of which the same are payable, on the following terms, viz, in cases where casualties are exigible only on the death of the proprietor such casualties may be redeemed on payment to the superior of the amount of the highest casualty, estimated as at the date of the redemption, with an addition of 50 per cent; and in cases where casualties are exigible on occasion of each sale or transfer of the property, as well as on the death of the proprietor such casualties may be redeemed on payment of two-and-a-half times the amount of the casualty, estimated as aforesaid, payable on such occasions."

efore, that the pursuer is entitled to redeem the said casualties by No. 84.
 ing to the defender the sum of £105: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses hitherto incurred; allows an account thereof to be lodged, Feb. 21, 1877.
 remits, &c., . . . : Further, appoints the case to be put to the roll Morris v.
 further procedure." * Brisbane.

he defender reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer was not entered his superior, and therefore was not entitled to sue for redemption of casualties. The clause of prohibition of subinfeudation being fenced an irritancy took this case into a different class from Colquhoun v.
 ker.¹ Even if the application were competent the pursuer could only em upon payment as provided for in the second part of section 15 of Act of 1874, the clause prohibiting subinfeudation having been ind in order to preserve the superior's right to a casualty upon each mission of the feu.²

ie pursuer was not called upon.

NOTE.—The purpose of this action is to have it declared that the pursuer, proprietor of a feu created prior to the Act of 1874, is entitled to redeem casualties incident to the feu on payment of the highest casualty, with an ion of 50 per cent. It is founded on the 15th section of the Act.

The feu was created by a feu-disposition granted in November 1833 by the rs of the defender to John Paterson, who is still alive. Paterson was duly , and under the former law the fee would be full by the infeftment in his
 a. Since the feu-disposition was granted no other person has entered with periors except by the implied entry introduced by the Act of 1874.

The feu-disposition contains an express prohibition against subinfeudation, a declaration that on contravention 'not only all such subaltern rights, but these presents, and all following hereon, shall be null and void.'

ince its creation the feu has been transmitted to several persons by con-ces containing a double manner of holding. The last transmission is in r of the pursuer. It is dated 3d and recorded in the Register of Sasines May 1876. The disposition does not express any manner of holding, and title contains a prohibition against subinfeudation it must be read as a tion of lands to be held a me only.—See 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101, sec.
 one prior dispositions may be in the same position, but it does not seem ial to inquire into them.

he defender pleaded that the pursuer had no title to sue, in respect that a ty had become due, and must be paid before the pursuer could take the of the 15th section. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this plea is not ounded. The only casualty alleged to be due is the casualty of non-entry.
 nder the old law, none could be due so long as the fee remained full in rson of Paterson, and it is declared by the Act of 1874 (sub-section 3 of 14) that an implied entry shall not entitle the superior to demand any ty sooner than he could demand it under the former law.

ut the defender further contended that the pursuer is bound to pay a com-n before he can take benefit by his implied entry. The Lord Ordinary that he is not. The right to redeem the casualties is introduced by the nd it is given to the proprietor of the feu, subject only to the condition efore exercising it, he shall pay any casualty which has become due. The r is the proprietor of the feu, and he is entitled to enforce his statutory under the statutory conditions. These conditions, it is thought, do not him to pay any casualty which has not become due under the old law.

is true that the defender urged a plea of a broader kind. He maintained ie pursuer had no implied entry, because the precept on which he is infeft ained in a disposition having an a me holding only, and could not be a it for an infeftment. He contended, therefore, that the pursuer could not

¹ May 17, 1867, 5 Macph. 773, 39 Scot. Jur. 392.

² Bell's Princ. sec. 866.

No. 84.

Feb. 21, 1877.
 Morris v.
 Brisbane.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question depends upon the construction to be put on the 15th section of the statute 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94. That section commences—"The casualties incident to any feu created prior to the commencement of this Act shall be redeemable on such terms as may be agreed upon between the superior and the proprietor of the feu in respect of which they are payable; and failing agreement, all such casualties . . . may be redeemed by the proprietor of the feu in respect of which the same are payable on the following terms," The feu in the present case was created prior to the commencement of the Act, the pursuer being in right of the feu, is desirous of redeeming the casualty payable in respect of it under this provision of the statute. The first question of course is, whether the pursuer is the proprietor of the feu in the sense of the Act. I cannot doubt that he is. It is said that he is not to be so regarded because he holds under an original right in which subinfeudation is prohibited and the prohibition fenced with an irritancy; that therefore, although he holds in a double manner of holding in his own feu-right, the bare infeftment is null, and the a me holding is of no effect until confirmed. But this difficulty is to be entirely removed when we turn back to the 2d sub-section of section 15 of the Act. We find that it provides that "every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior . . . to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice." Now, this pursuer being duly infeft in a double manner of holding, must be held to be infeft to the same effect as if his right had been confirmed. At all events this clause makes it clear that the word "proprietor" does include one holding under an a me infeftment confirmed. If, then, the pursuer be a proprietor in the sense of this clause, there seem no grounds on which he can be excluded from the benefit of it when he enters with the superior as a singular successor. The superior has no claim or demand against him. The fee is full, and the pursuer cannot be required to take an entry while the former vassal is alive. It may be true, and is, in fact, not true, that the object of prohibiting subinfeudation was to secure that the disponee should enter with the superior. But this will not neutralise the have the benefit of the statutory entry, inasmuch as he is not 'duly infeft in the lands.' But the statute, it will be observed, declares that proprietors duly infefted shall be held to be duly entered to the same effect as if the superior had granted a charter of confirmation. It seems to follow, therefore, that the infeftment which the statute refers includes an infeftment capable of confirmation. It is all the more clear, seeing that the statute not only declares that it shall be necessary for the vassal to obtain any charter or writ of confirmation, but that it shall not be competent to the superior to grant any such deed.

"The next question is, whether the pursuer is entitled to redeem on payment of one casualty and a half, or of two casualties and a half. The Lord Ordinary is in favour of the former alternative. The disposition contains no declaration that any casualty is exigible on occasion of each sale or transfer of the property. It is true that the prohibition against subinfeudation might have the effect of inducing purchasers to enter in order to the security of their title, but the entry is voluntary on their part. The superior could not compel it, nor act any casualty if they declined to enter. The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that this is not a case where casualties are 'exigible on occasion of sale or transfer of the property.'"

ilege conferred by this statute, or give the superior a right to exact a No. 84.
alty which is not due.

Feb. 21, 1877.

Morris v.

Brisbane.

ORD ORMDALE.—I can see no room for doubting that the Lord Ordinary decided rightly.

seemed to be all but conceded by the reclaimer in the course of the discussion, having regard to the interpretation clause in regard to the meaning of "infestment," the pursuer here must be held to be the proprietor of the feu in the sense of the Act, and entitled therefore to have the benefit of the statute. It was said he had no right to take benefit from the statute until he paid a casualty which was already become due. I am unable, however, to find that is a casualty due. The pursuer did not himself ask to enter with the superior—he was content to know that the fee was full, the original vassal being alive. True, it seems that under the terms of the feu-right there might have been room for a declarator of irritancy of the feu, but no such action has been brought. It was impossible, therefore, to say that any casualty was due when the pursuer applied to have the benefit of the statute.

ORD GIFFORD.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The case is an important one affecting or fixing the working of the new statute, in so far as it relates to redemption of uncertain casualties of superiority. The first point raised is as to this pursuer's title to demand redemption of his casualties of relief composition for an entry, and to require the superior to receive the redemption money and to discharge these casualties. It is said by the superior that no person except a fully entered vassal can demand redemption of these casualties. I do not think so; an unentered proprietor can make such a demand as well as an entered one. Every proprietor infeft, or with a recorded conveyance, which is sufficient to constitute an infeftment, is entitled to redeem the casualties now in question. As enacted by the very words of the statute. It will not do for the superior to say,—You are the proprietor infeft, I admit, but you are not entered with me, and will not recognise your right to come to me and get your casualties redeemed. I think that this contention is negatived by the express provision of the statute, which gives the right to every proprietor infeft, and it cannot be said that the pursuer is in this position.

The second question is, does the mere fact of this proprietor, who, in the language of the statute, is a proprietor infeft, coming to the superior under this provision of the statute to demand redemption of his casualties—does the mere fact of application for redemption make a casualty due to the superior which was not due before, and so does it become necessary that the pursuer, as a condition precedent to his being allowed to redeem, shall pay one casualty, that is, one year's rent?

I have no difficulty in answering this question in the negative. No casualty was due or exigible before the date of this summons, and none is now payable. It cannot be said that an action could have lain at the superior's instance for the casualty now claimed. No action of declarator of non-entry could have been competent to the superior under the old law, and in no shape could the superior have enforced payment of any casualty when the claim was made.

There was an entered vassal, and there is still an entered vassal who is bound to pay the casualties, and no casualty could become due to the superior until the death of the last vassal, an event which has not yet happened.

The only remaining question, being the third, in controversy between the

No. 84. parties is, at what rate is the redemption to be made? What is the amount of redemption-money which the pursuer is bound to tender, and what the defender is bound to accept? There are two classes of casualties referred in the section of the statute, and each class is made redeemable at a different rate.

Feb. 21, 1877.
Morris v.
Brisbane.

The first of these is where the casualties are exigible "only on the death of the vassal." Now, I think this is the part of the clause which applies to the casualties sought to be redeemed in the present case. I can see nothing in the feu-right giving the superior more than what becomes due on the death of the vassal.

I think this pursuer has a good title to come to the superior and demand these casualties shall be redeemed, and that the pursuer is entitled to receive them accordingly at the rate which he has offered to pay.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I wish to guard my opinion in regard to the effect of the irritancy in the original feu-right, because it declares "that on contravention of this point not only all such subaltern feu-rights but also these presently all following hereon, shall be null and void." What the effect of that declaration is, or how far the superior could enforce it, is another matter, as it strikes at the whole right.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—JOHN CARMENT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 85. A. B. MACKINTOSH AND ANOTHER (D. McCallum's Trustees), Pursuer vs.
PETER McNAB AND HIS MARRIAGE-CONTRACT TRUSTEES, Defendants.
McLaren—Balfour—Taylor Innes.
Hall—Geo. Watson.

Feb. 21, 1877.
McCallum's
Trustees v.
McNab, &c.

Personal or Transmissible—Obligation to Reconvey—Assignment.—In the course of a series of transactions in connection with a feu for building purposes, conveyed to C, who was his cautioner in the feu-contract, and had advanced to him funds with which to carry on his building, the whole subjects were built upon or unbuilt upon. C a few days afterwards granted N a letter in which he undertook to reconvey to N upon demand and repayment of past feu any of the lots which remained unbuilt upon. N assigned his interest in the letter to the trustees under his antenuptial marriage-contract. Held that the letter did not constitute a right of reversion but a distinct personal obligation upon C to reconvey any of the unbuilt upon lots whenever called upon that the right to demand a reconveyance was validly assigned to N's marriage-contract trustees.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.
R.

THE testamentary trustees of the late Donald McCallum of Perth brought this action against Peter McNab, formerly builder in Oban, and his marriage-contract trustees, in which they concluded for declarator (1) that the right competent to Peter McNab under a letter dated 14th April 1871 granted to him by Donald McCallum, was satisfied and discharged, and otherwise extinguished, and that neither Peter McNab nor his marriage-contract trustees had any claim against them in virtue of that letter (alternatively) that, under the said letter, McNab or his trustees were entitled to a conveyance of the subjects therein referred to upon payment of a proportionate part of all charges incurred in respect of these subjects by Donald McCallum.

The action arose out of the following transactions, and writings which No. 85.
passed between the parties.

By feu-contract, dated 28th November 1859, Peter M'Nab had feued ^{Feb. 21, 1877.}
Admiral M'Dougall of Dunolly about 5 acres of the lands of Corran, ^{M'Callum's} Oban, for building purposes. In that feu-contract M'Nab was taken ^{Trustees v.}
and, among other obligations, to expend £5000 within three years in ^{M'Nab, &c.}
erection of buildings, &c., and to that effect, inter alia, he got Donald Callum to become a party to the feu-contract as cautioner for him. Of date with this feu-contract M'Nab and M'Callum entered into a note of agreement, by which it was provided that M'Callum should advance the £5000 to M'Nab to be expended in building as thereby agreed. It was therein agreed that M'Callum was to have it in his power to purchase all or any of the buildings at cost price or by valuation; in the event of the purchase being made at cost price, a reasonable sum was to be added for M'Nab's erecting the buildings.

M'Nab entered into possession of the ground. M'Callum advanced the necessary funds, and a certain number of buildings were erected.

On 22d January 1862 M'Nab conveyed to M'Callum, heritably but separately, eight dwelling-houses which he had erected on four of the lots disposed to him in the feu-contract. The disposition conveying these houses bore that they had been erected for M'Callum, and that M'Nab had no interest in them.

By disposition, dated 9th April 1862, M'Nab conveyed to M'Callum the whole subjects contained in the feu-contract between him and Admiral M'Dougall, upon the narrative that M'Callum had undertaken to release him of the whole feu-duty and obligations contained in the feucontract. Thereafter, on 14th April 1862, M'Callum granted to M'Nab a letter by which, on the narrative of M'Nab's disposition of 9th April, M'Nab was "desirous of having it in his power to obtain . . .
possession of any of the lots or building stances which may remain unoccupied at the time of his electing to build on such lot or lots," and as he was willing to grant him such lot or lots on his paying the past and becoming liable for the future feu-duty therefor, M'Callum agreed and bound himself, and his heirs, &c., to grant to M'Nab, at any time that he might demand it, a disposition to any one or more of these lots, subject to the conditions in the feu-contract. This letter, as well as the previous dispositions and feu-contract, was duly recorded.

On 2d May 1862 Admiral M'Dougall, with consent of M'Nab, entered into a feu-contract of the feus on the lands of Corran, formerly granted to him, with M'Callum, in similar terms to M'Nab's feu-contract. M'Callum proceeded to erect buildings and make roads, &c., on the ground so conveyed.

On 27th March 1865 M'Nab entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage, by which, inter alia, he undertook to execute in favour of his marriage-contract trustees an assignation to the letter by M'Callum to him of 14th April 1862; and on 21st October he executed an assignation in terms of that obligation.

On 1864 M'Nab had asked M'Callum to convey to him, in terms of the letter of 14th April 1862, lot No. 1, of said feus, and M'Callum conveyed him accordingly by disposition, dated 7th October 1864. This conveyance M'Callum's trustees maintained exhausted the obligation in the letter of 14th April.

In 1867 cross actions of count and reckoning were raised between M'Callum's trustees and M'Nab with regard to the intrusions of both parties with the Corran feus, and funds expended in building thereon, and the actions were still in dependence at the date of this action.

No. 85.

Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

M'Callum's trustees pleaded, inter alia;—1. The pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, in respect—
The claim competent to the defender Peter M'Nab, under the letter of 14th April 1862, was personal to him, and not transferable; (2) A claim competent to the defenders under the said letter has been satisfied and extinguished by the conveyance granted to the said Peter M'Nab on 7th October 1864; and (3) No valid claim to a further conveyance of building ground has been made by the defenders in terms of said letter, and any claim which they might have been entitled to make has been lost by mora.

In the course of a proof that was led M'Nab deponed that the various conveyances had been made principally to avoid the diligence of his creditors, he having got mixed up with a man Henderson in building speculations in Glasgow. The creditors had now been settled with.

On 27th October 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor—“Assoilzie the defenders from the first conclusion of the summons, and quoad ultra dismisses the action, but without prejudice to the claims of the pursuers to withhold implement of the obligation incumbent on them under the back-letter of 14th April 1862, referred to on record, any debt due to them by the defender Peter M'Nab, including past duties, and also any proper expenditure by them, or their deceased constituent, the late Donald M'Callum, on or for the benefit of the ground therein referred to, has been paid, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses,” &c.*

* “NOTE.— . . . The questions for decision here are—1st, Whether the back-letter was assignable, and was validly assigned to the trustees; and if it shall be held to have been validly assigned, then, 2d, what terms the assignees may demand implement from the pursuers, so that this can be determined under the conclusions of the summons.

“I. On the first question two points are made by the pursuers, viz. That the obligation in the back-letter was exhausted by the disposition in 1864; and 2d, That the obligation was personal to M'Nab, and intransmissible. On both points my opinion is against the pursuers. 1st, I think the only limit to the obligation to convey is that the ground of which a reconveyance might be demanded should be unbuilt on when the demand was made. The exhaustion of it by conveyance with one demand, applicable to a small portion of the ground, is so unlikely to have been contemplated, that I cannot impute that intention to the pursuers. The absence of any expression which clearly indicates it. I think parties would have expressed an intention so unlikely to suggest itself to others would have expressed in the correspondence such a view is not hinted at. 2d, The right under the back-letter was, or might be, and in the result (as I assume from the facts about it) proved to be valuable. It was a right to obtain from the pursuers building ground without price, other than the feu-duty on it, so long as it remained vacant. There is nothing that I can see in the nature of the right except it from the ordinary rule of alienability, nor do I think that the circumstances which here attended its creation are such as to warrant its being specially regarded in this respect.

“II. As to the conditions on which the marriage trustees may demand implement, I should think it clear on general principles that the pursuers are bound to convey under the back-letter, except on payment of M'Nab's debts as far as may be ascertained in the proper process; and, second, of any past or otherwise proper expenditure on the ground subsequent to the disposition of 14th April 1862, and a proportional part of any expenditure on adjacent ground which it benefits, and for which, on the customary division and allocation, such expenditure for building purposes, the ground demanded is liable.”

he pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The letter founded on by the No. 85.
nders contained merely a personal favour to M'Nab, which he could assign. There was no mention of heirs or assignees of M'Nab in the Feb. 21, 1877.
r; so it was not transmissible. (2) If, instead of being called a gra- M'Callum's ous personal privilege to M'Nab, it was called a right of reversion, Trustees v.
e was authority to the effect that reversions were not transmissible M'Nab, &c.
as heirs or assignees were expressly mentioned.¹
rgued for the defenders;—The pursuers' authorities as to the nonnmissibility of reversions referred to cases of proper wadset. But, t from that, Erskine² repudiated the doctrine laid down by the earlier ers, and his authority had been followed since.³

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My Lords, this case is one of novelty; but I agree the Lord Ordinary. There are three questions here:—First, Whether the ation to reconvey, contained in this so-called back-letter, was assignable;
d, Whether, if it was so, it was exhausted by the reconveyance of one lot e creditor in it; and third, Whether the creditor in the obligation is ento demand as many lots as he pleases? These three questions depend enon the construction to be put on the documents now before us. The whole is transaction began by a memorandum of agreement between M'Callum M'Nab as far back as 28th November 1859. The position which M'Nab ied at this time was that of a feuar of a certain portion of building ground Admiral M'Dougall, and he undertook to erect buildings thereon to the of £5000, M'Callum becoming his cautioner to that extent, and agreeing ranchise the £5000 to enable M'Nab to fulfil his contract. Up to that point s express my opinion, I do not at present see how I can pronounce any tent on this head under the conclusions of the summons.

o far as I can see, the attempted compromise of the actions of count and ning has failed for want of the consent of the marriage trustees—assuming union, which favours their right. If, therefore, these cases shall not be wise arranged, they must proceed to judgment at last, and it is time, for they been in Court for nearly ten years. When this end has been reached, the of the marriage trustees under this judgment will not be hard to explicate ljust. They will have the full benefit of any rise in the value of the d, and nothing more, while M'Callum's trustees will have such indemnity property can afford for the debt due to them, and the obligations prestable ir favour.

he opinion which I have expressed leads to the absolvitor of the defenders he primary conclusion of the summons. With respect to the alternative sion, I think I must dismiss the action, for that conclusion is based on osition that the Court may, in its discretion, limit the extent of ground reconveyed on demand within the limit specified in the back-letter (viz., as unbuilt on), which I am unable to sustain. But it will be understood what I have said that I should not order a reconveyance except on the which I have specified, and that the judgment which I now pronounce ot import a right on the part of the defenders to a reconveyance without ing M'Nab's debt to the pursuers, as that may be established in the count ckoning, and also of any proper expenditure on or for the benefit of the ty by them or their deceased constituent which may not be included in ebt."

air, ii. 10, 7, and iii. 1, 16; Neill v. Andrews, June 28, 1748, M. 10,406;
ane v. Gourlay, July 20, 1611, M. 10,365; Murray v. Grant, Jan. 9, 1662,
,322; Ersk. Pr., Guthrie's ed., p. 205.

Ersk. ii. 8, 5, 8; Bell's Com. i. (5th ed.) 757.

as v. M'Finlay, May 23, 1807, Hume, 832; Elgin's Trustees v. Wall, 14, 1833, 11 S. 584, 5 Scot. Jur. 372.

No. 85.
Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

M'Nab was in the position of proprietor of the stances, and M'Callum was his cautioner and creditor for any money which he might advance. There is this provision—"The said Donald M'Callum shall have it in his power to purchase any or all of the dwelling-houses so to be erected, either at cost price or, in the option of the said Donald M'Callum, by valuation of six persons mutually chosen; and, in the event of the said Donald M'Callum purchasing at cost price, there shall be included a reasonable charge for Mr M'Nab erecting the building." Now, that provision really comes to this, that if M'Callum wished to take over the houses, then M'Nab was simply to be manager, to be paid by M'Callum for his trouble.

The feu-contract which was then entered into between Admiral M'Dougal and Mr M'Nab is of no consequence except in so far as it vests the feudal right in the whole subject in M'Nab. There are many provisions in it, but of these I need not speak. Then we have the two dispositions by M'Nab to M'Callum, dated 1st January 1862, and 9th April of the same year respectively, and the deed marked on the back "Back-letter," which is in question in this case. It is not possible to say that these are lucid examples of conveyancing—indeed, they are full of blunders, and ambiguous as well. But I think the key to the matter is that at this time M'Nab had got into difficulties in connection with a man named Henderson, a builder in Glasgow; that the real truth is that the deeds were drawn out in this singular manner for the express purpose of saving, on the one hand, the creditors of M'Nab, and, on the other, of saving as far as might be, some interest in this speculation to him. Now, this position illustrates very strongly what I have said. It is a disposition by M'Nab to M'Callum of the houses that had already been built in terms of the agreement. It proceeds on the narrative that "I, Peter M'Nab, builder, residing in Glasgow, and now in Oban, heritable proprietor of the stances and pieces of ground and others hereinafter disposed, considering that I have erected eight dwelling-houses on lots Nos. 2, 3, 6, and 7 of the piece of ground after disposed, and that Donald M'Callum, Esq., residing in George Street, Perth, has supplied me with the whole funds necessary for that purpose, and which dwelling-houses and others were erected for him and on his account, and that I have really no interest therein." And then he goes on to say, from himself, his heirs and successors, "to and in favour of the said Donald M'Callum, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably but redeemably." Now, it is very manifest that there is a clear contradiction between these statements, because if the narrative were true, he was bound to grant the houses irredeemably. The object plainly was to protect this conveyance against the possible bankruptcy of Mr M'Nab. If it had been made in the shape of a security, it would have been struck at as being a security for prior debt; and I have the least doubt that the narrative was intended to shew that it was only a fulfilment of a prior obligation arising from the fact that he was only M'Callum's agent. What effect the word "redeemably" might have had, if the question had been raised I will not say; but it would have been very strange for M'Nab to have said that that was a security when it begins with a narrative which excludes that idea.

The second disposition speaks for itself, for it is a disposition of the stances and pieces of ground, and while it narrates the former disposition of the eight houses there is no reference at all to the idea that that deed gave a redeemable right. By the two deeds M'Callum acquired right, first, to the eight houses, and, secondly, unbuilt on lots ; and then he grants this back-letter, dated 14th April 1862, No. 85. h relates solely and entirely to the unbuilt on lots. Now, I do not say what ion might or might not have been raised if the matter had remained there. M'Callum's impression is that the narrative of that first deed of January 1862 excludes Trustees v. M'Nab, &c. as that the houses were only given over to M'Callum as security. I think it means that they were to belong to him as they were. But, independently at, if it were true that he advanced the money to erect these houses, then ving taken over the houses, the effect necessarily was that he was pro- or of the houses already.

respect to the back-letter relative to the unbuilt on stances, my impression it it was a consideration in respect of which the disposition was granted ese unbuilt on stances. The substance of the arrangement was that llum said,—“I will take over these stances. They will be forfeited if I do I will pay the feu-duty.” And that is the consideration for which the dis- n is granted. But he says,—“I do not want to make money out of this pro-

If you choose to pay up the feu-duty and take it back, you are perfectly ne, as long as I am free.” But that was followed by another proceeding n M'Callum and M'Nab and the superior. Manifestly the state of matters M'Nab granted the last deed was not altogether satisfactory. They were raid of the creditors attaching these lots, and accordingly they resorted to urse of taking a direct conveyance or feu-contract from the superior in of M'Callum, with the consent of Peter M'Nab, the effect of which was ity to extinguish or sopite any right which M'Nab had, and left M'Cal- solute proprietor. The only doubt that I have had in the case is whether, his feu-contract was entered into with the superior, any right remained in nder the previous document of 14th April 1862 ; but it is needless to nder that, for the parties have argued the question as if the back-letter were isting. That being the real state of matters, the result is that I do not this back-letter renders the absolute title a security in any sense at all. : it is a personal obligation, and a personal obligation of a very simple tion. It is a right to re-purchase certain lands on certain conditions. It ntarily granted by an absolute proprietor, and I am of opinion that this as assignable as any other personal right.

n the question of reversion, according to the dicta of Stair, and Erskine Principles, that rights of reversions are not assignable, I take it that that refers to ordinary rights of reversion under proper wadsets. Where a tion of lands which had been wadset to creditors is in question, wadset operly a sale under reversion. But this is not of that nature. I think t a limitation upon a right in security, but a distinct personal obligation. comes to that—an obligation of trust under certain qualifications—that holder chooses to build or sell, he shall be entitled to build or sell ; but eithier builds nor sells, when the demand is made he shall be bound to ck the lots as they are required, on payment of the feu-duty. If that be nder not see the necessity of holding that the right is not assignable. It is al right in regard to certain lots. It is said that he has already made ice ; but if I am at all right in the real conception of this obligation, it that it was not intended that M'Nab should once for all make his choice he wanted. This was rather a burden undertaken by M'Callum, and he ling to be relieved of that burden at any time.

Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

No. 85.

Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

The third question is, whether there is any limitation in the number of lots and it appears to me that there is not.

The only matter in which I differ from the Lord Ordinary is, that I think this is not exactly in the position of a right in security. I think the conclusions of the summons are not well founded in regard to this matter, and ought not to be given effect to.

There are other important questions, but the Lord Ordinary has reserved full effect of these.

LORD ORMDALE.—I have come to be of the same opinion, although perhaps may entertain a greater difficulty than is felt by your Lordship upon one of the points. The nature of this action must be kept in view. It is an instance of M'Callum's trustees, and the summons contains two conclusions, more properly one conclusion with an alternative. The Lord Ordinary assailed the defenders from the first conclusion entirely, and he has dismissed the action under the second or alternative conclusion. Now, keeping in view the judgment that has been pronounced, and that the action is at the instance of M'Callum's trustees, I inquire, in the first place, what is the nature of the first conclusion. It is—"That the right or claim originally competent to the defender, Peter M'Nab, under a letter or agreement granted by the said deceased Donald M'Callum to the said defender, of date 14th April 1862, set forth in the condescendence annexed hereto, is satisfied and discharged, or otherwise extinguished, and that neither of the defenders has any right or title or claim against the pursuers under the obligation therein contained." The first branch of that conclusion "that neither of the defenders has any right or title or claim against the pursuers under the obligation therein contained" seems to be assumed to mean that M'Nab's marriage-contract trustees had no right, but the obligation, whatever it was, was not assignable, and the whole argument was addressed to that. Supposing that the pursuers were successful in their claim, how would it benefit them? Supposing that this obligation was not assignable, and therefore that M'Nab's marriage-contract trustees have no good title in virtue of the assignation of this obligation, M'Nab himself had a good title to it. I am not dealing with the difficulties that may arise which were suggested as to whether this obligation is exhausted by one lot having been already sold to M'Nab; but supposing that the marriage-contract trustees, in respect of this obligation not being assignable, have no good title under it, M'Nab himself has a perfectly good title, and therefore what would be the result? M'Nab could demand one or more lots. I shall come to that presently; but even if that he is entitled to take over the remaining lots of feuing ground upon which he would just get these from M'Callum's trustees, and in that way he would just accomplish all that his marriage-contract trustees wanted to accomplish. Therefore I do not see what interest or what object can be served by the pursuers in maintaining that this right, in existing circumstances, at least, is not assignable.

I am rather disposed to concur with your Lordship in thinking that it is not properly a reversionary right at all. It is an independent right, which M'Callum himself gave before his death when he obtained the disposition which it refers, in express terms. But whether he was bound to give it, or whether the obligation is another matter. I do not think he was; I do not see the necessity of that. He might or might not be liable to account to M'Nab.

missions with the property, but it is very difficult to see how he was to grant such an obligation, especially when we keep in view this disposition to the unbuilt on lots, which is absolute. I am not going to give positive opinion one way or another upon the question of whether M'Callum's trustees are not liable to account to M'Nab or his representative whoever they may be, for M'Callum's intromissions with this feuing d. At the beginning it rather appeared to me, looking at the agreement that M'Callum was to interpose and to make advances, and he did make advances; but in reality M'Nab was to be the feuar, he was the builder, it was a speculation of his. But then some peculiar proceedings took subsequently between the parties. The first disposition bore the inehensible expression "redeemably," while on the face of it M'Nab says he has no interest in the subjects. But we have the second disposition, is referred to in the back-letter, which gives absolute and irredeemable. Then that is followed by what appears prima facie almost to close the point the idea of there being a right to redeem left in M'Nab—viz. the feu-contract, which was entered into between the superior and M'Callum, at the consent of M'Nab. Now, it may be impossible for M'Nab, or any party naming him, to call M'Callum's trustees to account. That may be so, but we have documents that we have not before us in this process. I think, however, that must be found, not in this process, but in a count and reckoning. I do not want to prejudice that case. The parties, after seven years' delay in the Court, seem ultimately to have come to a compromise; but ultimately there was one condition of that compromise which it appears could not be carried out, and probably there is an end to that compromise; but the fact still exists of a judicial termination; and therefore as long as that is pending I would rather refrain from giving any opinion on it. But on this back-letter to be an independent right altogether, and not a proper primary right, we get rid in a great measure of the weight of the authorities which have been referred to, and which go this length, that proper reversionary interests where there is a wadset or security, are not assignable, unless made express, and that would in one way prevent M'Nab's marriage-contract trustees from having a title to the ground; but, as I have already said, I cannot see how it can avail M'Callum's trustees. M'Nab had right to the ground, and having that he could make it over to the marriage-contract trustees or to any party named. But, independently of that altogether, I am disposed to concur with our Lordship in holding that there is no legal principle or law sufficient to lead us in this case to hold that this is not an assignable right. On the other hand, I am disposed to think that it is assignable, and that therefore this conclusion of the summons cannot be maintained.

When there is this other point in the case—though the first question is the matter before us—secondly, that whether this back-letter is assignable or now extinguished and exhausted, because, in 1864, M'Nab did make a disposition of one of those lots under this back-letter to be given over to him, and it was given over to him. Now, in the first place, looking at the terms of the disposition, I do not think that that is a fair and reasonable construction of the document. I find words in that document which lead me, without much difficulty, to hold that M'Nab was entitled to have the whole of those unbuilt on lots given back to him, and there was no great hardship in that to M'Callum, supposing that that was really the meaning of the parties. These two people seem

No. 85.

Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

No. 85.

Feb. 21, 1877.
M'Callum's
Trustees v.
M'Nab, &c.

to have been upon very intimate terms, M'Callum assisting M'Nab with money. M'Nab was a builder, and this was a speculation of his from the beginning. M'Callum was not a builder. It was not unreasonable to suppose that M'Callum when he got the absolute disposition which is referred to in this back-bill might say—Well, what is really useful and valuable to me are the built on lots. The unbuilt on lots are of little or no value to me. I require to pay the feu duties. I am not a builder, and I cannot very well myself make these unbuilt on lots valuable. I do not want to go into a building speculation at all. I am a resident at Perth; this building speculation is at Oban, and I do not wish to engage in it at all. I shall be glad to give you back these unbuilt on lots. I will possibly get them built on, and they may become valuable property, and in that case I am not going to give them over; but so long as they are unbuilt on you must have them. Probably they are not worth more than the feu-duty, if so I will relieve me of the feu-duty, past and future, and all the other obligations I am under to the superior in respect of them, and I shall give them back to you whenever you want them. Now, it appears to me that that is the fair interpretation of the obligation, and that it was not exhausted by that one call in 1864. I have no doubt that the obligation still subsists, and will subsist as long as there are unbuilt on stances, and there is no great hardship, I think, upon M'Callum's trustees in coming to that conclusion; for, according to the terms of the back-bill, all the past feu-duty must be extinguished, and they must be relieved of every obligation in regard to the future, and of every obligation to the superior. On all the points that are raised under the first conclusion I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary has decided rightly.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 86.

COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE FOR KINNING PARK, Petitioners.—Balfour Brand.

Feb. 22, 1877.
Kinning Park
Police Commissioners v.
Thomson & Co.

WILLIAM THOMSON AND COMPANY AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Asher—Moncreiff.

Road—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 101—Private Street.—A street constructed and maintained by feuars on either side, to whom the solum belonged, and which was from 1870 to 1875 open to public traffic, but had not been sufficiently pavestoned, was, in 1875, after the district in which it was situated had been taken into a burgh under the Police Act, 1862, ordered by the commissioners of the burgh to be properly levelled and causewayed at the expense of the feuars. Held that after this was done the street still remained a private street within the sense of the "General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," and that the feuars were entitled to exclude general public traffic by means of pole chains.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
I.

IN 1866 Messrs A. and W. Smith feued a piece of ground lying between Paisley Road, the highroad from Glasgow to Paisley, on the north, and a street called Park Street on the south. Sites for buildings were feued off on this piece of ground by Messrs Smith, and in 1870 a new causewayed road or track passing through the centre of the ground was formed and called Smith Street. This road was used for building purposes by the feuars on either side of Smith Street, and also for carer traffic between Park Street and Paisley Road. There was a footh made of ashes with a kerbstone along the side of the causeway.

n 1871 the district in which Smith Street was situated was erected er the "General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,"¹ a burgh, and named Kinning Park, and commissioners were duly ointed in terms of the statute.

No. 86.
—
Feb. 22, 1877.
Kinning Park
Police Commissioners v.
Thomson & Co.

Smith Street continued to be used by the public for general traffic 1875. The street was cleaned and lighted at the expense of the missioners, but any repairs and watching were paid for by the feuars.
y in 1875 the roadway fell into a bad state of repair, and on 15th ember the commissioners and sanitary authorities of Kinning Park statutory notice to the feuars in the street to cause the street to be d from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, causewayed, ed, and channelled." This was accordingly done at the expense of euars, and to the satisfaction of the commissioners, and in October the street was again open for free traffic to the public. A short after the repairs on the street had been completed, a barricade, cong of posts and chains, was put up at the cost of the feuars across Park Street end of the street so as to stop the cart traffic. After re-ing for about four months this barricade was removed by the orders commissioners. On 23d March 1876 a fresh barricade of stronger ials was again erected by the feuars, but on 25th March this barri-also was removed by the commissioners, and of the same date a on was presented in the Sheriff Court at Paisley at the instance of ommissioners for interdict against the feuars again obstructing the

the body of the petition the commissioners set forth the various as of the General Police Act of 1862 conferring on them jurisdic-over streets and roads in burgh. The respondents maintained Smith Street was a private street formed for the convenience of the in the street.

2d August 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) granted interdict as ! The respondents appealed to the Sheriff (Fraser), who, on 11th er 1876, recalled the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and found that Street was a private street in the sense of the Police Act of 1862.

7th September the feuars had applied to the commissioners to have Street declared to be a "street" in the sense of the Police Act of and as such for ever afterwards to be repaired, with the exception footway, by the commissioners. The commissioners on 15th Sep-refused to comply with this request. It appeared that none of reets in the burgh of Kinning Park had been declared to be ts" as defined by the Act, and accordingly none were maintained commissioners.

commissioners appealed from the Sheriff's judgment to the Court ion.²

JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here is certainly one of very general and 26 Vict. cap. 101.

authorities cited at the debate.—"General Police and Improvement (Scot-ct, 1862," 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101, secs. 64, 163, 182, 234-5, 248, 408 ;
v. Portobello Town Council, Dec. 11, 1863, 2 Macph. 244, 36 Scot.
6 ; Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners, June 21, 1866, 4 Macph.
Scot. Jur. 445 ; Millar's Trustees v. Leith Police Commissioners, July 3, 11 Macph. 932, 45 Scot. Jur. 578 ; Wallace v. Dundee Police Comers, March 9, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 565.

No. 86.

Feb. 22, 1877.
Kinning Park
Police Commissioners v.
Thomson & Co.

importance, namely, whether a street which was private property and was not sufficiently paved and flagged by the owners before the adoption of the General Police Act, 1862, in the district, becomes a public street in the sense of the Act by the mere adoption of the Act. The appellants have put their case as high as this, that public traffic cannot be excluded from a private street in a burgh in which the Act has been adopted. The Act refers to two classes of streets, public and private, and I am of opinion that under the Act there is no such thing as a public street which is not also a public thoroughfare, and, on the other hand, that no private street is a public thoroughfare. By the interpretation clause it is declared "the word 'street' shall mean a public street, and shall extend to and include any road, bridge, quay, lane, square, court, alley, close, wynd, vennel, thoroughfare, and public passage or other place within the burgh used either by carts or passengers, not being a private street, and not being or forming part of a harbour, railway, or canal station, depot, wharf, towing-path, or bank."

The clause then further declares that "the expression 'private street' shall mean any road, street, or place within the burgh (not being or forming part of any harbour, railway, or canal station, depot, wharf, towing-path, or bank) which is used by carts, and either accessible to the public from a public street, or forming a common access to lands and premises separately occupied, and which has not been, before the adoption of the Act, well and sufficiently paved and flagged, and the owners of premises fronting or abutting on said street, and which has not been maintained as a public street." The result of that is that a "private street" is simply a public thoroughfare, while in the case of private streets, as above, there are two conditions necessary,—(1) that they have not been well and sufficiently paved and flagged" by the owners prior to the adoption of the Act; and (2) that they have not been maintained as public streets.

Sections 146, 147, 148, and 149 of the Act relate to the improvement of streets, to the placing of fences and posts on the side of footways, to the restoration of pavement, flags, or materials displaced or altered by persons, and to the construction and paving of footways. All these sections, I think, plainly refer to the case of public streets. They stand in contrast with the 150th section, which deals with private streets, and which ought to have been founded on in this application. That section has a separate preamble: "Whereas it would conduce to the convenience of the inhabitants and to the public advantage if provision were made for the levelling, paving, causewaying and flagging of streets which have been laid out and formed by persons who have neglected to have the same properly levelled, paved, causewayed and flagged, and for preventing such inconveniences in future." It then proceeds to empower the commissioners to cause such streets to be free from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, &c., and provided with kerbs, gutters, to the satisfaction of the commissioners. Now, in this limited exercise of the power of the commissioners there is nothing whatever to destroy the right of a proprietor to exclude the public from his property over which he has pretended that they have acquired any right of way. The interference with private property is limited to cases involving the safety of the public which cannot be tolerated by the proprietor in a use of the ground, or who may require to use it in respect of some duty or business in the neighbourhood. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the Sheriff's view of this matter is right.

Another question remains behind, whether, when the street is properly paved and the fees apply to the commissioners to declare what was formerly vate street, to be a "street" within the meaning of the general Act, the No. 86.

 ommissioners are or are not bound to do so. I observe that on the suggestion Feb. 22, 1877.
 the learned Sheriff the feuars did make such an application on 7th September Kinning Park
 '66, and that it was refused by the commissioners without stating any reason Police Com-misioners v.
 Thomson & Co.
 refused.

LORD ORMDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely concur in the judgment of the Sheriff-principal, and do not think it necessary to go into the details contained in his note.

The question raised by the appellant is a very general and a very important one. It is this, whether police commissioners in burghs where the general Police Act of 1862 has been adopted have a right to compel the proprietors, who are the absolute owners of "private streets" in the burgh, to open and maintain these "private streets" at their own expense, as public cart and stage thoroughfares. The proposition must go that length. If it be answered in the affirmative, then an end is put to all private squares and streets, such as are accustomed to see in Edinburgh and in most burghs in Scotland where the feuing is going on. In such "private streets" horses are not allowed to be exercised, and carts and carriages are prevented from using the street as a public thoroughfare, or from traversing it, excepting to the residences of the inhabitants. I am, however, very clearly of opinion that the police commissioners under this statute are not entitled to do this. They cannot compel the proprietors of a private street to convert it into a public one. The only way in which a private street can be made a public thoroughfare is by the commissioners giving it over as a "public street" under the statute, and thereafter maintaining it at the public expense as a public street. A public street belongs to and is to be kept up by the public, and a private street belongs to and has to be kept up by the private owners. No doubt the police commissioners have under the Act very full powers in connection with even private streets, but among these powers there certainly is not any power or right to make a private street a public one, while it is still kept up by the private owners. Certain provisions in the Act were founded upon in support of the appellants' contention, and I am of opinion that these clauses apply to public streets only.

I think it is quite clear that this is a private street in the sense of the statute meaning nothing more, and the result is it must be dealt with as such, so that except as far as the statute gives the commissioners right to interfere with private streets it is private property. I give my full assent to the respondents' proposition that the feuars on either side of such a street, being also proprietors of the houses of the street, agree to shut up both ends of it, they may do so, and do so if they please with the solum of the street so retained for themselves. I suppose if they have made it a street to which the public has obtained right of access by dedication or by grant or by prescription as an access or otherwise this would be a different case, but there is really no ground here for maintaining the plea of this kind.

In the whole matter, as, in order to give effect to the appellants' contention, it would be necessary to affirm the proposition that the police commissioners of a burgh which has adopted this Act are entitled to make any private street

No. 86: a public street, and still compel the proprietors to keep it up, I am for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against.

Feb. 22, 1877.
Kinning Park
Police Commissioners v.
Thomson & Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the street in question was laid out in 1870, and was occupied for some time by temporary erections, but was not built upon until 1874: Find that in 1875 the petitioners, in terms of the police statute founded on, required the respondents to put the roadway of the said street in proper repair as required by the 150th section of the statute, which has been done: Find that the said street is a private street in terms of the statute, and is not a public thoroughfare or passage: Find that the public have no right of passage along the same, excepting at the will of the proprietors thereof: Therefore dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff complained of: Find the appellants liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—ROBERT A. BROWN, I.A.—Agents.

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

MRS ELLEN SIMPSON OR FERGUSON, Pursuer.—Asher—Pearson.
JAMES HUNTER AND OTHERS (Ferguson's Trustees), Defenders.—
Lord-Adv. Watson—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

Trust—Liferent—Residue—Capital and Income—Mineral Lease.—A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the free annual income of the residue of his estate, and after her death to invest the residue in the purchase of land in Scotland, to be entailed on a series of heirs. At his death the testator's property worth about £220,000. He also held two mineral leases which then five years to run. The trustees carried on the mines, and in three years realised £30,000 of profit. The widow having claimed this sum, held that it was not free annual income, but part of the residue.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

JAMES FERGUSON of Wiston, in the county of Lanark, coalmaster, in 1872, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he made a general conveyance of all his property, heritable and moveable, to trustees. After other provisions, the deed directed the trustees "to pay the balance of the free annual income of the free residue of my estate to my said wife, in case she shall survive me, half-yearly, during all the years and days of her life." *

Failing his wife, a sister of the truster was to have the liferent of the residue, and upon her death the trustees were directed to invest it in the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed on a niece and a series of heirs.

The trust-deed contained an express power of sale.

At the time of his death the truster held two mineral leases of Auchinheath and Blackwood collieries, in Lanarkshire, by the terms of which assignees and sub-tenants were excluded, unless by consent of the landlord. These had then five years to run, and the trustees carried them on till their expiry in 1877.

The truster also left heritable and moveable property worth about £220,000, chiefly realised from the profits of the same leases, which had held since 1855.

The widow received from this source an income of about £5000.

* If the balance of income falling to the widow should in any year be less than £2750, she was taken bound to pay it in certain proportions to the two sisters and brother, but only to the extent of £100, £150, and £200 respectively.

he profits realised by the trustees from the mineral leases for the 20 years following the truster's death amounted to about £30,000, and the widow brought this action of count and reckoning against them, claiming these profits as part of the free annual income of the residue of the trust-estate. No. 87.
Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

The defenders maintained that the sum in question must be treated as capital.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on a strict construction of the trust-deed libelled, the pursuer is entitled to the profits derived from the leases mentioned in the record since the death of the truster, . . . and . . . appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure." *

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question was one of intention.

The pursuer had been receiving a much larger income than the £2750, which her husband contemplated as the maximum. Then naturally the trustees could have sold the leases with the consent of the truster, and the proceeds would have been capital. The truster could not have contemplated that it was to depend on the decision of the trustees in a matter of prudent administration, whether this large sum was to be treated as capital or income. The pursuer had greatly benefited by the

NOTE.—The first question in this case is, whether the pursuer is entitled to the profits which, since the death of the truster, have been made from certain of the leases. The defenders plead that she has right to no more than the interest on the profits, as these were from time to time realised. But in the course of the discussion they appeared to surrender that position, and to contend that the leases should be valued as at the truster's death, and interest allowed on the value of the valuation. They say that this is the rule which obtains in England in a right of liferent and of fee is given in a terminable estate, and when no contrary intention appears, it should not appear by clear indications that the truster intended that the life-renter should enjoy the estate in specie.

The Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that the widow is entitled to the profits of the leases. The trustees are directed to pay the annual income of the residue of the estate to the pursuer, and although there is a general power to sell, there is no direction to do so. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the leases form part of the residue, and that so long as they are retained, the income thence arising forms part of the income of the estate.

It was maintained by the defenders that the profits could not be considered as part of the residue of the estate, because they would necessarily cease at the expiration of the leases, and because the pursuer, by receiving the profits, if she lived long enough, absorb a portion of the estate itself. But the leases are not less parts of the estate because they are terminable, and they do not less yield income though they do not yield it in perpetuity. When leases are let, liferenters have been found entitled to the rents due from the leases, which necessarily pro tanto exhaust the subject, and might altogether so.

The question must be determined by reference to the will of the truster, and the Lord Ordinary thinks that it is the soundest interpretation of the trust-deed to hold that he intended that the pursuer should receive the income arising from the estate, whatever the condition of the estate might be which produced the income. The leases, so long as they are retained, are parts of the estate which produce the income.

The Lord Ordinary has not thought himself justified in applying the doctrine of the English law which were brought under his notice—1st, because the leases are to be confined entirely to personal estate; and 2d, because they have not been recognised in Scotland.

The authorities cited in the course of the discussion were—Wardlaw, 2 Macq. 368; 1 Jarman, 577-78; Lewin on Trusts, 263-67; Howe, 7 Vesey, 137; 19 L. R. Equity, 395; Brown, L. R. 2 Chancery App. 751." . . .

No. 86: a public street, and still compel the proprietors to keep it up, I am for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against.

Feb. 22, 1877.
Kinning Park
Police Commissioners v.
Thomson & Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the street in question was laid out in 1870, and was occupied for some time by temporary erections, but was not built upon until 1874: Find that in 1875 the petitioners, in terms of the police statute founded a street, required the respondents to put the roadway of the said street in proper repair as required by the 150th section of the statute, which has been done: Find that the said street is a private street in terms of the statute, and is not a public thoroughfare or passage: Find that the public have no right of passage along the same, excepting at the will of the proprietors thereof: Therefore dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff complained of: Find the appellants liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

ADAM SHIELL, S.S.C.—ROBERT A. BROWN, J.A.—Agents.

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

MRS ELLEN SIMPSON OR FERGUSON, Pursuer.—Asher—Pearson.
JAMES HUNTER AND OTHERS (Ferguson's Trustees), Defenders.—
Lord-Adv. Watson—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

Trust—Liferent—Residue—Capital and Income—Mineral Lease.—A testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow the free annual income of the residue of his estate, and after her death to invest the residue in the purchase of land in Scotland, to be entailed on a series of heirs. At his death the testator's property worth about £220,000. He also held two mineral leases which then five years to run. The trustees carried on the mines, and in three years realised £30,000 of profit. The widow having claimed this sum, held that it was not free annual income, but part of the residue.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

JAMES FERGUSON of Wiston, in the county of Lanark, coalmaster, died in 1872, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he made general conveyance of all his property, heritable and moveable, to trustees. After other provisions, the deed directed the trustees "to pay the balance of the free annual income of the free residue of my estate to my said wife in case she shall survive me, half-yearly, during all the years and days of her life." *

Failing his wife, a sister of the truster was to have the liferent of the residue, and upon her death the trustees were directed to invest it in the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed on a niece and a series of heirs.

The trust-deed contained an express power of sale.

At the time of his death the truster held two mineral leases of Auchinheath and Blackwood collieries, in Lanarkshire, by the terms of which assignees and sub-tenants were excluded, unless by consent of the landlord. These had then five years to run, and the trustees carried them on till their expiry in 1877.

The truster also left heritable and moveable property worth about £220,000, chiefly realised from the profits of the same leases, which he had held since 1855.

The widow received from this source an income of about £5000.

* If the balance of income falling to the widow should in any year exceed £2750, she was taken bound to pay it in certain proportions to the two sisters and brother, but only to the extent of £100, £150, and £200 respectively.

The profits realised by the trustees from the mineral leases for the 20 years following the truster's death amounted to about £30,000, and the widow brought this action of count and reckoning against them, claiming these profits as part of the free annual income of the residue of the trust-estate.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

The defenders maintained that the sum in question must be treated as capital.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on a liberal construction of the trust-deed libelled, the pursuer is entitled to the profits derived from the leases mentioned in the record since the death of the truster, and appoints the cause to be enrolled for her procedure."*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question was one of intention.

The pursuer had been receiving a much larger income than the £2750, which her husband contemplated as the maximum. Then it might be said that the trustees could have sold the leases with the consent of the lord, and the proceeds would have been capital. The truster could have contemplated that it was to depend on the decision of the trustees in a matter of prudent administration, whether this large sum was to be treated as capital or income. The pursuer had greatly benefited by the

"NOTE.—The first question in this case is, whether the pursuer is entitled to the profits which, since the death of the truster, have been made from certain mineral leases. The defenders plead that she has right to no more than the income of the profits, as these were from time to time realised. But in the course of the discussion they appeared to surrender that position, and to contend that the leases should be valued as at the truster's death, and interest allowed on the amount of the valuation. They say that this is the rule which obtains in England when a right of life-rent and of fee is given in a terminable estate, and when it is not apparent by clear indications that the truster intended that the life-renter should enjoy the estate in specie.

The Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that the widow is entitled to the profits of the leases. The trustees are directed to pay the annual income of the residue of the estate to the pursuer, and although there is a general power of disposition there is no direction to do so. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the leases form part of the residue, and that so long as they are retained, the income thence arising forms part of the income of the estate.

It was maintained by the defenders that the profits could not be considered as part of the residue of the estate, because they would necessarily cease at the expiration of the leases, and because the pursuer, by receiving the profits, if she lived long enough, would absorb a portion of the estate itself. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the leases are not less parts of the estate because they are terminable, and they do not less yield income though they do not yield it in perpetuity. When leases are let, life-renters have been found entitled to the rents due from the leases, which necessarily pro tanto exhaust the subject, and might altogether do so.

The question must be determined by reference to the will of the truster, and the Lord Ordinary thinks that it is the soundest interpretation of the trust-deed to hold that he intended that the pursuer should receive the income arising from his estate, whatever the condition of the estate might be which produced the income. The leases, so long as they are retained, are parts of the estate which produce income.

The Lord Ordinary has not thought himself justified in applying the doctrine of the English law which were brought under his notice—1st, because they seem to be confined entirely to personal estate; and 2d, because they have not been recognised in Scotland.

The authorities cited in the course of the discussion were—Wardlaw, 2 Macq. 368; 1 Jarman, 577-78; Lewin on Trusts, 263-67; Howe, 7 Vesey, 137; and 19 L. R. Equity, 395; Brown, L. R. 2 Chancery App. 751."

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

a testator directs that his widow shall receive the free balance of the income of his estate, or, as it is expressed here, the balance of the free income of the net due of his estate, the idea which is in the mind of the testator is that the net produce of the capital of his estate shall be paid over to the widow. In short it comes just to the same thing as if the estate had consisted of a sum of money and that the widow was to receive the interest, at a fair rate, accruing upon that capital sum. In a case of this kind, where the universitas of the estate is conveyed to trustees for the purpose of ultimate realisation and conversion, and where the income is given to the widow, that is, I think, the natural, and appears to me also to be the fixed, principle of construction. It is the principle which is at the foundation of a very recent case with which your Lordships are familiar, namely, the case of Wood v. Menzies, May 26, 1871, 9 Macph. 1. In that case the testator directed his trustees to convert his whole estate, heritable and moveable, into money, and after paying debts, &c., to invest the residue in parliamentary stock, public funds, or heritable securities, and to pay over to his wife the free annual proceeds "of my said whole means and estate during all the days and years of her life." That is just such a settlement as we have to deal with here. At the testator's death, on 3d January 1861, part of his estate consisted of consols, the dividend on which became payable on 5th January. The widow survived for some years, and died on 19th April 1867. It was held, on a sound construction of the terms of the deed, that it was the testator's intention that his widow's annuity should be computed on the footing of its being a liferent of a sum of money of which the interest accrued to her die in diem, and therefore (1) that she was only entitled to the proportion of dividends effecting to the period of time between 3d and 5th January 1861; (2) that she was entitled to the proportion of dividends due after the half-year current at her husband's death corresponding to the period from 5th January to the date of her death; and it was observed that the question being one of construction, as gathered from the trust-deed, the rule applicable to the ordinary case of settlement of consolidated annuities in liferent and fee did not apply. In this case I observe that Lord Deas in giving judgment said—"It is a mistake to suppose that this question depends on anything else than the will of the testator, although there may be certain presumptions which aid us in construing that will. This is not a case of heir and executor falling within the rules of testate succession. Neither is it like a case of liferent which existed independently of the will of the testator, or the case of one heir of entail succeeding to another under a deed by a third party. The deceased was the unqualified owner of the whole means and estate dealt with by his deed. He voluntarily bequeathed the liferent of the whole to his widow, and the question simply is, What was his intention in doing so? If, indeed, the deceased had given to his widow the liferent of these consols alone, the fair inference might have been that the provision was given with all the incidents usually attached to the subjects of that particular kind. But that was not what he did. He gave to his widow a universal liferent of his estate, which consisted of heritable and moveable subjects of different kinds, the incidents of which were also different. The question is, When did he intend that liferent to commence? So far as I know, the practice is to hold that such a provision vests de die in diem, unless some reason appears for thinking that a different period of vesting was meant. Nothing anything special in the deed goes the other way." And I may also observe that in my own observations in that case there occurs a passage which sides for the payment of debts and legacies, and also for certain annuities des that which the widow was to enjoy from the income of the residue, then, after all those provisions are satisfied, he disposes of the residue by sting that it shall be invested in land and that land settled in strict entail a certain series of heirs who are named in the settlement. The provision avour of the widow is expressed in the following terms:—"To pay the nee of the free annual income of the free residue of my estate to my wife, in case she shall survive me, half-yearly during all the days and of her life." The trustees entered into possession of this estate immely upon the trustor's death, and one of the first matters that necessarily ied their attention was that very important part of the estate which con-l of going collieries. The leases excluded assignees and sub-tenants without andlord's consent, and therefore the trustees were in this position that, s they could make some arrangement with the landlord it would have been ter of some considerable difficulty for them to do anything else than to into possession of the collieries and carry on the business to the terminaof the leases. They had a power of sale given them by the deed, and they have made an arrangement for selling those leases and realising the value m; but it was also quite within their option, I apprehend, from the very of the estate which had been committed to their charge, that this portion estate should be realised in a somewhat different way—that is to say, that should carry on the leases to their termination and make the most that be made of them during that period—working out as much as could be ht out availably and profitably of the mineral during the remaining years leases. Now, this latter was the course which they elected to take, and ntly they seem to have been very well justified in taking that course. It uggested in the course of the argument that it was doubtful whether they entitled under this settlement to carry on those leases to their termination. ot say that I see any room for doubting that. They were entrusted with alisation of the testator's estate. They were to realise the estate in such a ultimately to convert it into money, and with that money to buy land ttle that land in strict entail, and of course the testator's object was that idue so to be invested should be as large as possible. The trustees, thereight naturally be expected by the testator, and it was at all events their clear to make the most of the leases as part of the estate. Without the landlord's t they could not sell the leases, and therefore if he had refused his consent ad no alternative but to carry them on to their termination, which of itself, k, is quite sufficient to shew that in following that course they were not by eans exceeding their powers. Now, it appears that very large profits were equence made by the trustees from the collieries under lease, and the 's income under the provision in her favour in the trust-deed will certainly t to a very large sum indeed if those profits are to be dealt with as part annual income of the estate. I am of opinion that those profits cannot be with as annual income. I think they are part of the capital of the estate, r this reason—Those leases were terminable rights, and their duration after ath of the testator was very short. But during that short period a large t was expected to be realised, and was in effect realised, in the shape of of the collieries. But to say that that is part of the annual income estate is, I think, altogether to misapprehend the nature and effect of such ision as was made for the widow in this settlement. I think that when

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

enjoy a particular subject in specie. In both of these cases the conclusion will be the very reverse of what I am disposed to arrive at here. For example, the case of a proprietor of land, who gives to his widow a liferent of his land estate, or of a portion, it may very well be that the widow would be entitled to the rents or lordships accruing under leases of minerals, because that depends upon a different consideration altogether from what must regulate our judgment here. It depends upon what are the legal rights of the liferenter and fiar inter se in a subject of that kind. If a proper right of liferent and fee be created by the testator, the intention of the testator cannot regulate beyond this, that it is his intention to create a proper right of liferent and fee. The law will determine what are the rights of the liferenter and fiar inter se. Again, it is possible to conceive a case where in the settlement of a lessee, like Mr Ferguson here, under mineral leases, the intention of the testator may be fairly decided that his widow, or the liferenter who is to benefit by his settlement, should enjoy those leases in specie, even though they may be part of the trust settlement. The direction to the trustees may be so clear and distinct to put the widow or liferenter in possession of the leases so as to enable him or her to carry them on, as to leave no doubt whatever of his intention that the profits accruing from those leases were to belong to the liferenter. But in the absence of specialties of that kind, and where you have to deal with a trust settlement conveying and settling the universitas of a mixed estate, I apprehend the rule which I have already suggested is the only safe one for our guidance, and in applying that rule here I confess it does not leave me in any doubt at all that the conclusion is that the profits arising from those leases as they come to be received form part of the capital of the testator's estate, and that the widow is only entitled to interest upon those profits.

The Lord Ordinary has not followed out his view of the case to any practical conclusion in figures, and we are not yet in a position, from the argument that has been addressed to us, to say what precisely the effect of this judgment will be; but upon that we shall be glad to have the assistance of parties in a further determination of the case.

LORD DEAS.—The late Mr James Ferguson, as your Lordship has said, was an extensive and successful coalmaster. He held leases of minerals, under which he made very large profits. At the time of his death he held the lease or leases which have given rise to this action, and that lease or those leases had still many years to run. His settlement was made very recently before his death, and was made under circumstances very much the same as those that existed at the time of his death. The profit which he had been making under those leases had reached the amount of some £20,000 a-year. At the date of his settlement, at his death that profit was not nearly so large. It generally happens with coal leases that the lessee takes a lease for a period in the course of which he expects to work out the coal, or to work out the best and most profitable portions of it; and it is quite intelligible, therefore, how it might happen that during the last five years of the leases the profit was much less than it had been during the earlier stages of the leases. Accordingly it appears that for the last five years which have elapsed since the death of the testator the average amount of profit has been only about £8000 or £9000 a-year in place of the much larger sum which had been formerly realised. Well, he leaves the whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and after providing for a variety of legacies, annuities ne to have a very direct bearing upon the present question—"If certain consolidated annuities are settled on one person in liferent and on another in fee, is, if after the lapse of the liferent the consolidated annuities are to belong absolutely to the fiar, I think the rule of law is, that the annuities which become payable during the continuance of the liferent will belong to the liferenter, and only those which fall due after the death of the liferenter will belong to his successor who takes the fee. But that rule applies to cases where there is a proper settlement in liferent and fee, and it arises from the nature of subjects so settled. In the case of consols there is really no capital sum; the whole estate is annuity, and the annuity belongs to him who is in right in the annuity becomes payable. The rule, therefore, which fixes that rest on money vests de die in diem has no application. Here we have to do not with a single settlement of consolidated annuities, but the settlement of the liferencies of his whole estate, only a small part of which was in the shape of consolidated annuities; and in dealing with the destination of his estate we regulate our judgment by his intention. Now, when we find that he has made a conversion of his entire estate into money and then provides that that money which is to be so converted is to be liferented as a universitas by his wife, I cannot avoid the conclusion that his intention was that she was to have the proceeds of that estate as one consisting of money bearing interest; that being so, the mere accident that part of it was in the form of consolidated annuities cannot affect the ultimate question." Now, I apprehend the rule there adopted, and which is by no means adopted there for the first time, but which is perfectly well known in our practice, is this, that where a widow or other person is entitled to a liferent of the universitas of a fee estate left in trust the right of the liferenter is to be considered as being in the same position as if she was entitled to the interest accruing upon a capital sum.

Now, applying that case here, I think there is nothing in the deed in the least degree adverse to the application of such a principle. On the contrary, it appears to me to be quite consonant with the whole frame and scheme of the settlement, and with the view that was obviously in the mind of the testator, especially in framing the clause applicable to his widow's provision, that she should have the free balance of the income, in the proper and reasonable sense of the term, of his entire estate.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it is not very safe in a case of this kind to resort to the rules of equity established in the Court of Chancery in England, because we are very well aware that in cases of this kind the Courts of Equity in England have adopted many artificial rules, which are somewhat remote from the principles upon which we administer our equitable jurisdiction. In a case of this kind, for example, I do not think we have any settled principle to which to ascribe our judgments, except the intention of the testator. The result of the thing depends upon that; and the case of Wood v. Menzies, while it establishes a principle that is applicable to cases of this kind generally, is yet based entirely upon what is supposed to be the intention of the testator in making his trust-settlement. Now, it must be observed that this class of cases is quite different and very easily distinguishable from another class in which there is either a settlement in liferent and fee of a particular subject, or where, instead of this, there are various subjects conveyed, there is an intention, expressed or implied, upon the part of the maker of the settlement that the liferenter shall

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

desired to do so. But I am very clearly of opinion that, under the circumstances, they were not only entitled to carry on those leases in the way they did, but that it was their duty to the trust and to the beneficiaries to do so, by which I do not mean that they would have incurred any legal liability if they had not done it, but that there are duties which trustees owe to the trust and beneficiaries beyond their mere legal duties. There are duties somewhat akin to those which a parent owes to his children and a child owes to his parent which the trust naturally expects that his trustees shall perform even though they incur no legal liability by leaving them unperformed. That the trust expected they would carry on the leases to a termination I have no doubt whatever. There is no indication of that we have in the appointment of a gentleman whom we know to be one of the best men who could have been selected for the purpose (Mr Hunter), as one of those trustees. The anticipated profit might be more, but there was no probability of loss, during the short period the trust had to run. If there had been so, Mr Hunter was thoroughly well qualified to have told them so, and that might have made all the difference. But, as it was, I cannot doubt that if they had thrown up those leases they would have been doing that which the trust never expected them to do, and which they were fairly entitled to expect them not to do. In carrying them to a conclusion I think they only did that which the trust intended them to do, and which they were legally entitled and morally bound to do.

That being so, it follows that when the trustees have drawn all those portions of the estate they have simply realised that portion of the estate. It is the duty of executors and trustees generally to realise the estate, but the time taken to realise it and the mode in which it is to be realised depend entirely upon the nature of the estate and upon circumstances. And when parties are appointed, not only executors, but likewise trustees, to hold the whole heritable and personal estate of a deceased person, I know no law and no reason whatever why they should be bound to realise forthwith in the same way as they would sell some valuable article or perishable subjects. They may take the time that is necessary, whatever that may be, in order to realise without a sacrifice. I think the proper and legal way of realising this portion of this estate was to carry on the leases to their termination, and that being done, I think the trustees made the most fair and liberal proposal when they stated that they were quite ready to account to this lady for the whole proceeds which they had actually received, on the footing of these being capital, and allow her the annual interest on those proceeds. I think that is the most favourable mode of dealing with the estate which she could well expect, and when that is understood and fixed, the only thing that remains to be arranged will be how the accounting is to be done, in respect of what we may call back-hand money which has been got in for a time, by the trustees before being paid over to her. If she had had a regular income, and had been in want of the money from time to time for her expenses, a different kind of arrangement might have been required. That was not the least necessary here. She did not contend for that; but, of course, in the circumstances that it was the half-yearly income intended for her is to be taken into account when you come to the question of accounting as to the amount of money that shall be paid to her. I agree with your Lordships that this is a matter in which the Court are fairly entitled to expect the views of the parties, and I have no doubt, from the liberal spirit which has already shewn by the trustees, that it will be readily arranged.

ings and expenses of the trust, he provides that his widow, so long as she not enter into a second marriage, shall have the liferent of the whole of his estate—that is to say, the whole residue of his estate, heritable and movable, including of course those leases which formed an heritable subject. I agree with your Lordship, and also with the Lord Ordinary, that the question is, What was the intention of this testator? Did he intend the trustee to get the whole income that was to be derived from those leases so long as they lasted, or did he look upon the profits of the leases as a part and portion of the residue of his estate which was only to be liferented? The Lord Ordinary says the question must be determined by reference to the will of the trustor. I think that is quite sound. The Lord Ordinary goes upon a right principle; when he says he does not think himself justified in applying some doctrines of English law which have been quoted to him, I think he is right there also, for this is a question as to the construction of a Scotch deed, prepared by a conveyancer, and it is the deed of a domiciled Scotchman, and deals with heritable property—for the leases are all heritable—and therefore there is certainly, to say the least of it, no occasion for resorting to any foreign law for lightening this particular deed. The simple question is, What, on the face of the deed, and taking the terms of it along with the surrounding circumstances, is to be held as the will of the trustor?

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

Now, the main surrounding circumstances were what the trustor himself had been doing in the course of his life. What he had been doing was to carry on those leases, and from the large income he derived from them to accumulate capital. He would not have been a man of common sense if he had been spending the whole of that temporary income and realising no capital. But he was accumulating capital to a large amount, and his intention plainly was (as we see from the deed) that when all his other purposes were satisfied with reference to that, it should be invested by his trustees in the purchase of an estate, to be held upon a certain series of heirs. He left a widow but no family, and his object was to provide for her and then to perpetuate his own memory by a great estate being purchased and handed down to a long series of heirs of entail. Now, while the principle upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeded was perfectly right, I think he has come to a wrong conclusion. Construing the deed according to the intention of the testator, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, I think the true conclusion is that he looked upon the value of those leases as a part and portion of the capital of his estate which he meant to be liferented. As suggested in argument for the trustees that in carrying on those leases they were acting altogether without authority and contrary to their duty, so that the trustor cannot claim the profit which they have thus earned for the estate, the risk of personal liability to themselves had there been a loss. I think it is a very odd argument to put into the mouths of the trustees. My opinion, therefore, is in their favour in its result, proceeds upon the very opposite view. I think they were perfectly entitled to carry on those leases. It may be that they could not have incurred any legal liability if they had not done it—that is to say, if they had made some arrangement and got the leases disposed of in some way; but as your Lordship has pointed out, they could not have done so without the consent of the landlord, because assignees and sub-tenants were expressly excluded. In any event, they, as the representatives of the trustor, were bound for the rents and lordships to the landlord, and they had no means of getting quit of their obligations under the leases if they had

No. 87. the person who gave the power of converting the leases into money that thing to be converted should be used up or absorbed by his widow, in the event of the trustees not being able to arrange with the landlord for the disposal of the leases, and being obliged to work the collieries, as they in point of fact have done.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

On these grounds I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived.

LORD SHAND.—The cases which have hitherto occurred on which questions have been raised in regard to the returns from mineral fields have, I think, been of one class—I mean where the testator has been the owner of lands, and the minerals leased, and the question has arisen, who was the party entitled to the rents of those minerals? The three leading cases which were referred to in the discussion were those of Waddell, Guild's Trustees, and Wardlaw¹—all of which are cases of the same kind. In those cases, just as here, I think the principle which the decision turned upon was, what was the intention of the testator? Then, in ascertaining that, the Court, with reference to mineral rents, have arrived at the general conclusion that if minerals have been let by the owner of lands, at least, if they have been let for a considerable period of time—the lands are brought into the category (as Lord Neaves puts it in the case of Wardlaw) of subjects bearing fruits; so that those cases really settle nothing more than that mineral rents in that position are to be regarded as fruits of the lands. If a life tenant has a life interest of the lands, she shall receive those mineral rents which are part of the fruits. This case appears to me to raise an entirely different question. The trustor was not the owner of minerals under lease; he was a tenant under leases. He was not drawing a rent or return from the lands; he was drawing profits from a going colliery business. In the case of the lands, you have a direct return from the lands, and nothing else, and the lands themselves form part of the residue. Those returns are part of the proper income of that residue. In the other case, while you have no doubt a lease of minerals is an important element, yet, truly, what is income is not the mere fruit of the lease but the result of trading. You have a business carried on involving the business of raising coals, with all the outlays connected with it, and trading in those coals, after they are raised, depending upon market prices and profits earned. The case of a coal mine is not different from that of a tenant under an agricultural lease, or that of a partner in a manufacturing or mercantile business who is bound by his contract to remain in that business as a partner for a certain number of years to come. In that class of cases it appears to me, concurring with the statement of principle by your Lordship in the chair, that where the testator leaves an estate, heritable and moveable, is given to trustees, so that the general rule shall be held by them for one person in life interest and another in fee, the rule must be that the profits of such a business as I have referred to shall go into the residue—shall form part of the capital of that estate—unless a contrary intention can be inferred from the terms of the deed; and I think it must be so, because I regard the profits which are to be received from the business as a colliery business or an agricultural lease, or a mercantile business, as not proper interest on residue, but as part of the residue itself,—part of the capital of the trust itself which has been left by the trustor to his trustees, and, indeed, in many cases of estates which one has seen in practice, such profits really and practically form the whole of the estate that a person leaves. And

¹ Supra cit. p. 534.

MR MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I agree with your ship that the question must be disposed of according to what appears to be the intention of the truster as disclosed in his trust-deed. The words with which we have more particularly to deal are those under the fourth head, where the testator provides that his widow is to get “the free annual income of the residue of my estate;” and the question is, what does that provision mean? It gives to the widow the whole profits arising from these valuable leases, she only to be entitled to get the interest upon those profits capitalised as they accrue! The question is no doubt one of difficulty; but, taking the words themselves, I am disposed to think that, in a trust-deed of this description, where there are no provisions to the contrary in the other parts of the deed, the word “income” lead necessarily to the opposite conclusion, the expression “income of the residue” is generally understood to mean the income of a realised capital.

No. 87.
—
Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

The residue of a trust-estate is what is realised after the ordinary expenses of the trust have been complied with. Taking the words of the deed by themselves, therefore, I do not think that they must necessarily be held to import that this testator intended them to carry to his widow the profits of a lease which was held by him in lease only, and was to go on for about five years from the time of his death; and upon that ground alone I should be disposed to hold that the widow was only entitled to the interest accruing upon profits realised.

There are other clauses in the deed which tend to confirm that view; but the main object of the deed was to realise the estate in order to create an annuity estate, and there are anxious provisions made in the deed for the investment of the money and the management of the estate by the trustees in order to effect that object. What the truster directs to be entailed is the residue, the income of which is to go to his widow; and he also directs that on her death some of that same residue shall be paid to his sister during her lifetime, but upon the death of his sister it is to be applied, so far as it does not consist of land, in the purchase of lands in Scotland, to be entailed upon a series of heirs. Now, I do not think it is natural to suppose that in such circumstances the testator intended that either his widow or his sister should get the whole of the very large income derived from these collieries, and that they were to be so absorbed, instead of being realised, in order that the principal interest might go, first to his widow and then to his sister, and then be entailed. I do not think there is anything to shew that that was the intention of the gentleman who made this trust-deed; and when the clause is read in connection with the provision he makes for the event of his income exceeding £2750 per annum, it seems to me to point pretty distinctly to the same conclusion. The clause makes provision as to what is to be done with a portion of the excess beyond that sum. Why that sum was fixed does not appear, and the clause is peculiar, because even at that time the realised estate was calculated to yield a larger income than £2750. But the provision appears to me, notwithstanding, to indicate very clearly that it never was in the mind of this testator that the income of his widow was to be increased to the extent of £10,000 per annum a-year by the profits of these collieries. That appears to me to be out of the question altogether. But further, and supposing that the trustees had made an arrangement with the landlord and had sold the leases, it is certain that the widow would only have got the interest upon the sum realised by the sale, and that would go far to strengthen the view that it was not the intention of

No. 87.
Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v.
Ferguson's
Trustees.

benefit of the profits of that sale as being truly hers in the character of a life-rentrix, but realised in a different way. I think that goes a long way to shew that those profits were not of the nature of proper income or interest of residue at all, but were part of the residue itself. I think it very difficult to maintain that in the one case she was to be entitled to get the whole profits to herself, and in the other case that others were to get those profits, and that she was merely to obtain the interest upon them.

So much for the general provisions of the deed ; but I concur with the observation of Lord Mure that there are other clauses which strengthen the view I entertain even upon the general provisions. One of these is the clause which seems to refer to this lady's income being possibly about £2750. It was said that in any view that sum would be considerably exceeded. Well, take it that it might be exceeded by £1000 or £2000—but it is a very different thing to say that the testator in putting such a sum in his deed could by possibility have contemplated that the large amount of £20,000 a-year—or £8000 a-year, as it was reduced—should go to his widow from this one subject alone, when he contemplates so shortly before his death that her income might be only about £2750. Again, I think that if there had been an intention to give the profits, we should have had a different expression from what we have in the residue clause. It is the “income of the residue,” which is a very suitable expression for the interest on the capital of the estate. Again, you have the fact that if this lady died his sister was to become the life-rentrix. Is it to be supposed that upon the accident of one or other of those ladies being in life at a particular time she was to get the benefit of this large estate, amounting to £20,000 or £8000 a-year? These are all considerations upon the special facts of the deed which go to support the view I entertain from the general provisions of the deed, that it was not intended to give this lady the profits of the leases.

The Lord Ordinary has observed, and indeed his judgment seems to be based upon this view, that it appears to him that the leases form part of the residue, and so long as they were retained the profits thence arising formed part of the income of the estate. I think, with deference to his Lordship, that this view is somewhat misleading and fallacious. It proceeds upon the view that the leases, as documents giving an heritable right, are part of the residue. Not so; the leases are part of the residue ; but it is the leases as giving right to the profits that are part of the residue, and the profits themselves being the result of those leases seem to me to become necessarily part of that residue. If you take the case of a truster dying after conveying to his trustees his share in a going mercantile business of which he must remain a partner by the deed for four or five years, the share of that business is no doubt conveyed, and you may fairly say the contract of copartnery is conveyed, as part of the residue of the estate in the same way as a lease is ; but I think it would be extraordinary to say that because the contract of copartnery is conveyed it thereby follows that the whole income of the estate is given, that the life-renter is to get the whole profits to come in from the business.

Upon these general views I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that this lady should be found entitled, not to the profits of the minerals, but to the interest on the residue, including in that residue the profits which have been realised from those leases since her husband's death.

say that I concur with your Lordships that that is the principle upon which *Mc v. Menzies*¹ was decided. It is of course an entirely different case if you not, as here, the universitas of the estate given to a body of trustees, but different given directly of specific subjects, such as a conveyance of those themselves to a beneficiary. In that case you have a distinct indication intention that the beneficiary shall have the whole benefit of that specific so conveyed; and I think the contrary intention may be more readily used in favour of the liferenter if the right of producing the profits is not, re, a terminable right ending after a short period, but is to be one of long ion.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Ferguson v. Ferguson's Trustees.

with that as the general principle, the next question is, applying that, what result with reference to the provisions of this deed? We have here those conveyed as part of the universitas of the estate to trustees. We have it they have been producing very large sums,—from £18,000 to £20,000;—immediately before the truster died, and that after his death, and after trustees have renounced one of the leases, the profits have still amounted to £8000 a-year. The liferent or income of the residue of this estate is given, first place, to his widow, and upon her death, subject to certain legacies, liferent of that same estate is given to the truster's sister. There is a power and conversion of the property; and, taking those different provisions together, I see nothing to lead to the inference that there was any intention to give to his lady the large profits which were to be realised in carrying on this business. It was suggested in the argument that the trustees might have been violating their duty in carrying on this business as they did. If the deed expressly or by inference provided that they must wind up this business at once, and if in violation of that the trustees had carried on the business, I should think the claim of this widow would obviously have been one that could not be sustained; but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that that is not the true position of the case,—that in the circumstances in which the trustees were placed, and looking to the very special destination in those leases, the trustees were fairly entitled to carry them on to their close. But, then, in doing so, it appears to me, upon the grounds I have stated, that they were really realising the capital of the estate by the realisation of those profits, and that the profits realised were part of the residue that was to be liferented. It was said that the profits that were realised from the business were income to Mr Ferguson during his life, and no doubt that is perfectly true; but I think it becomes a different question whether you can represent the profits that are being realised after his death as income at all in the same sense. You then have a state, and I do not think that the profits which are being ingathered as part of the trust-estate are income at all in the same sense; and I do not know how we can have a better illustration of that than the consideration what would have occurred if the trustees, under that power of sale which they had, had it fit to dispose of those leases, making arrangements with the landlord with a suitable tenant, and had received a large sum for the leases themselves, and a large sum for the goodwill of this going business. It is conceded that part of this lady that in that case what she would have received, and alone she would have received, would have been the interest upon the profits that was received—that she would not have been entitled to take the

¹ May 26, 1871, 9 Macph. 775.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

O, 2 S O₂) in water, of about the specific gravity of 1070. While a solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime is still warm and liquid we coat the substance to be preserved with it, either by dipping the substance into it or by brushing it over with two or three coats of the solution. the substance has to be transported any distance in wooden vessels the vessels should be saturated with some of the before-mentioned solution of bisulphite of lime in water, and when dry brushed over with the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime. When the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime has firmly solidified on the surface of the animal substance, the latter may be packed, the vessel being closed as air-tight as possible. For the preservation of hides the interior surface only requires to be coated with the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime. The coating on the hides and the hides must be dried before they are packed. Before treating the animal substance other than hides as above the viscera must be removed and the inside washed free from blood; it then to be coated internally and externally as above described, and when it is cooked the coating of gelatine and bisulphite of lime must be removed by soaking it for a sufficient time in water."

In their final specification, which was lodged in the Great Seal Patent Office, as required by the letters-patent, granted in the form of the schedule annexed to the "Patent-Law Amendment Act, 1852," the patentees declared the nature of their said invention, and in what manner the same was to be performed, to be particularly described and ascertained in and to the following statement thereof, that is to say:—

"The nature of our said invention is to preserve animal substances such as meat, poultry, game, fish, and other animal substances for a long time, and so that the same substances when so preserved, and although the animals from which the same are derived have been killed for a considerable time, cannot be distinguished when cooked from the like substances derived from similar animals which have been recently killed, also for the preservation of hides.

"The manner in which our said invention is performed is as follows:—We employ a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 1, being a solution of bisulphite of lime (usually expressed by the formula CaSO_3) in water of about the specific gravity of 1050, which specific gravity we find preferable to that of 1070. We sometimes form a second solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 2, by dissolving the ordinary commercial gelatine in boiling water, using from one part to two parts of gelatine in ten parts of water, and adding ten parts of solution No. 1. In determining the proportion of gelatine to be used we increase such proportion in inverse ratio to the decrease of the temperature of the place in which the solution is to be applied, using a larger proportion of gelatine when the temperature is low, and a smaller proportion of gelatine when the temperature is high. Solution No. 2 is adapted for coating animal substances intended to be preserved, such as joints of meat, animals which have been skinned, poultry and birds which have been plucked, fish, also the internal surfaces of hides. For this purpose the viscera of animals, birds, and fish, and also the gills of fish, should be removed, and the inside washed so as to be thoroughly cleansed from blood and other matter. We then apply solution No. 2 while still warm and liquid, and coat such animal substances either by dipping such substances into the solution, or by brushing such substances over with two or three coats of such solution. Such solution is then allowed to dry and solidify, and, if required, we pack such animal substances in casks or other suitable vessels rendered as air-tight as may be. As to hides, we first cleanse the same by washing the inside thereof; we then apply solution No. 2 while

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

and liquid to coat the interior surface of such hides, but such in-coating, and also the hides themselves, must be rendered dry before hides can be packed; the hides can then be packed in casks or other vessels, but if the hides are to be used within a short period, say months after the application of this solution, we do not find such necessary.

For the preservation of animals without removing the skin or external thereof, and without removing hoofs or horns, we find it advanto employ a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 3, by mixing one part of salt with ten parts of solution No. 1, and say to ten parts of water. We vary the proportion of water accord-the temperature of the place at which the solution No. 3 is to be using a larger proportion of water where such temperature is low, smaller proportion of water where such temperature is high. For pose, at the slaughtering of the animal, as soon as the bleeding and while the animal is still warm, we (by any ordinary process of force solution No. 3, heated to a temperature of from 100° to ahrenheit, into the arteries and veins from and to the heart of the animal. We then remove the viscera of the animal and wash the inside animal, so as thoroughly to cleanse the same from blood and matter, and the inside of the animal may be washed with solu-No. 3. The animal can then be packed in a canvas wrapper or in other suitable packing.

For the preservation of fish we find it advantageous to employ a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 4, formed by ten parts of cold water, one part of salt, and one part of solution

For this purpose we first deprive the fish of the viscera and gills, wash the inside of the fish so as to cleanse the same from offensive matter; we then pack the fish in casks or other suitable vessels, fill up casks or vessels with solution No. 4, and then close such casks or vessels so as to render the same as air-tight as may be. Poultry and game are similarly treated with solution No. 4, having been first plucked or skinned and the viscera removed.

And that solution No. 4 is also useful for preventing and arresting decay in fresh butchers' meat, game, poultry, and fish. For this purpose the animal substance to be treated may be dipped into the solution or wrapped in a cloth saturated with such solution.

The proportions of the substances employed to form solution No. 2 and solution No. 3, and solution No. 4, are respectively reckoned by weight, or by volume.

When animal substances are to be transported dry in wooden casks or wooden vessels, the interior of such casks or vessels should before being used be saturated with solution No. 1 and then allowed to dry, but for this we make no claim.

When any animal substance which has been coated or treated with solution No. 3 or solution No. 4 is cooked the effect of the coating or treatment should be removed by soaking the substance for a sufficient time in water.

And we consider to be novel and improvements, and therefore we claim the invention secured to us by the said in part recited letters-patent:—

First, The use of solution No. 1 for preserving animal substances.
Secondly, The preservation of joints of meat, animals from which the leathers have been removed, fish, and hides by means of solution in the manner hereinbefore described.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.
Robertson.

"Thirdly, The preservation of animals without removing the skin by means of solution No. 3 in manner hereinbefore described.

"Fourthly, The preservation of fish, game, and poultry by means of solution No. 4 in manner hereinbefore described.

"Fifthly, The preventing and arresting decomposition in animal substances by means of solution No. 4 in manner hereinbefore described.

"But we do not claim the employment of gelatine or salt, nor of the processes of cleansing or injection, nor of air-tight vessels, except in connection with and in aid of solution No. 1, and for the purpose of preserving animal substances, nor do we claim the use of solution No. 1 except for the purpose of preserving animal substances."

William Bailey, who in 1870 had purchased from Henry Medlock a share of the patent, presented in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire a petition for interdict against J. and D. Robertson, butchers, Glasgow. The petitioner stated that the respondents had been in the constant habit of using the invention without the consent of the patentees.

The prayer of the petition was against infringing their letters-patent, "and particularly to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents aforesaid, by themselves or others, during said period, and without consent, license, or agreement, as aforesaid, of the petitioner, or his assigns, from using or applying the said material known as bisulphite of lime in solution, for preserving animal substances, or preventing or arresting decomposition in animal substances, and from using or applying the bisulphite of lime along or in connection with gelatine or salt for preservation of joints of meat, or of the bodies of animals, whether skin or feathers have been removed therefrom or not, or of fish, or poultry, or other animal substances, or for the purpose of preventing or arresting decomposition in animal substances in any manner described in said specification, and from using and applying the bisulphite of lime either alone or along or in connection with any other substance or substances for all or any of the purposes aforesaid, in such way or manner as shall in any wise counterfeit, imitate, or resemble the said invention."

The respondents stated that they had been in the habit of using bisulphite of lime for preserving meat for three or four years; that they obtained it both from Messrs M'Tear, who were the petitioner's agent, and from other chemists; that they used bisulphite in its pure and original condition, and never mixed it with any materials such as gelatine or salt, but applied it to meat without any admixture. They maintained that the final specification did not claim the use of No. 1 solution alone; that the final specification was materially different from the provisional specification, in so far as it could be held to claim No. 1 solution alone.

* The Patent-Law Amendment Act, 1852, contains the following clause:—
 "6. Every petition for the grant of letters-patent for an invention, and the declaration required to accompany such petition, shall be left at the office of the commissioners, and there shall be left therewith a statement in writing, after called the provisional specification, signed by or on behalf of the applicant for letters-patent, describing the nature of the said invention. . . .
 7. Every application for letters-patent made under this Act shall be referred by the commissioners, according to such regulations as they may think fit to make, to the law officers. 8. The provisional specification shall be referred to the law officer, who shall be at liberty to call to his aid such scientific or other persons as he may think fit, and to cause to be paid to such person by the applicant the remuneration as the law-officer shall appoint; and if such law-officer be of opinion that the provisional specification describes the nature of the invention, he t the final specification was defective in not describing the manner of No. 88.

 ng No. 1 solution alone; (4) that the use of bisulphite of lime for pre-ring animal substances was not a new discovery. On this last objec- Feb. 23, 1877.
 t to the validity of the patent the respondents relied on several prior Bailey v. ents. The only one of these which was ultimately found to be an Roberton.
 icipation was a patent obtained by William Rattray of Aberdeen in
 1. The nature of that invention was for "improvements in preserving anic substances."* The petitioners lodged a minute, admitting "that w the same, and give a certificate of his allowance, and such certificate shall led in the office of the commissioners, and thereupon the invention therein red to may, during the term of six months from the date of the application etters-patent for the said invention, be used and published without prejudice ay letters-patent to be granted for the same, and such protection from the equences of use and publication is hereinafter referred to as provisional pro-on: Provided always, that in case the title of the invention or the provial specification be too large or insufficient, it shall be lawful for the law-er to whom the same is referred to allow or require the same to be amended."

 he schedule annexed to the Act the form of letters-patent makes it a condiof granting the patent that if the patentee "shall not particularly describe ascertain the nature of his invention and the manner in which the same is performed by an instrument in writing under his hand and seal, and cause same to be filed in . . . within . . . months," the letters-patent be void. By secs. 28 and 29, every specification filed in pursuance of the itions of any letters-patent are directed to be filed in the office of the Court ancery, and copies are to be kept for public inspection at offices in Edinburgh Dublin.

The provisional specification stated—"My said invention consists, first, of de of preserving animal and vegetable matters by impregnating them with ueous solution of sulphurous acid. For this purpose I plunge the material preserved in a quantity of the solution, or otherwise bring the solution contact with the surface of the material for such a length of time as may requisite to produce the necessary impregnation. When fresh animal and able matters have been impregnated with a solution of sulphurous acid in manner the effect is to preserve them from decay for a considerable d.

My said invention consists, secondly, of the use of the alkaline and earthy ites in packing preserved animal and vegetable matters in cases, and I ince these sulphites, either dry or in solution, into a case with the preserved ers, for the purpose of assisting more effectually to prevent them from under-decay or injurious change."

e complete specification declared—"The nature of my said invention, and at manner the same is to be performed, to be particularly described and tained in and by the following statement, that is to say:—

My invention consists, first, of a mode of preserving animal and vegetable ers by impregnating them with an aqueous solution of sulphurous acid.
 his purpose I plunge the material to be preserved in a quantity of the soluor otherwise bring the solution into contact with the surface of the mate-or such a length of time as may be requisite to produce the necessary im-nation. When fresh animal and vegetable matters have been impregnated a solution of sulphurous acid in this manner the effect is to preserve them decay for a considerable period.

My said invention consists, secondly, of the use of the alkaline and earthy ites in packing preserved animal and vegetable matters in vessels or cases, introduce these sulphites, either dry or in solution, into a case with the pred matters, for the purpose of assisting more effectually and to prevent them undergoing decay or injurious change.

The aqueous solution of sulphurous acid which I employ in carrying out my tion may be prepared by any of the methods known to chemists. This

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.
Robertson.

between the 21st day of June 1861 and the date of pursuers' specification, 27th June 1866, solutions of bisulphite of lime were publicly used solution may be produced of various strengths, but I prefer to make it of the strength indicated by six degrees on Twaddell's hydrometer, because I believe that a solution of that strength keeps better without alteration than a stronger solution. A solution of greater or less strength, may, however be used, but the purpose of mixing it with water and preventing mistakes in the strength of the diluted solutions employed in performing my invention, I find it convenient to keep and use a concentrated solution of one uniform strength. I dilute a standard solution which I employ with water so as to make it of the strength most proper or convenient for operating upon any particular material to be preserved.

"I find in practice that it is convenient to employ diluted solutions of four following strengths, videlicet, a diluted solution of a strength equal to that produced by a mixture of one part of concentrated sulphurous acid of a strength of six degrees of Twaddell with fifty parts of water, which may be called solution No. 1; one other diluted solution of a strength equal to that produced by a mixture of one part of such concentrated acid with forty parts of water which may be called solution No. 2; one other diluted solution of a strength equal to that produced by a mixture of one part of such concentrated acid with thirty parts of water, which may be called solution No. 3; and one other diluted solution of a strength equal to that produced by a mixture of one part of such concentrated acid with twenty parts of water, which may be called solution No. 4. By means of these four diluted solutions the operations hereinafter described may be performed.

"I suspend the material to be preserved or operated upon in any suitable water-tight vessel constructed of wood or other suitable material, which I use as curing vessels, observing always that the different pieces of material do not touch each other or rest on the bottom of the vessel while under treatment. I have found that a useful plan for securing these conditions is to suspend each piece in a net. This mode of suspension I have found most useful in the treatment of animal matters, such as meat, fowls, fish, &c. In the case of vegetable matters, potatoes for instance, I have found that there is less need of this precaution being observed, as, from their more firm consistency, they may be placed in the curing vessel at random.

"The material to be preserved having been introduced into the vessel, a quantity of the solution No. 1 is to be run into it until the materials are covered with the liquid. The curing vessel is then to be covered and kept undisturbed from three to five hours, more or less, according to size or sizes of the pieces of material to be operated upon. The liquid is then to be run off, and the materials in the vessel are to be kept undisturbed, and allowed to drain from three to four hours. A second solution (No. 2) is then to be run into the vessel in the same way as before, and left to act upon the material for a period as the first solution, after which the solution is to be run off, and the material allowed to drain as before. A third solution (No. 3) is then to be run into and kept in the preserving vessel in the same way as the previous solution, and it is to be afterwards run off, and the preserved substances drained as before.

"In most instances I have found that the agency of three solutions of the acid are sufficient to secure the preservation of most organic substances, and the general indications of a sufficiency of treatment having been employed, I have observed that after the substances have been submitted to and left to drain from the acid they are found to retain a somewhat pungent smell of the acid, and to be in appearance somewhat plump and swelled. If these characteristics are found not to be sufficiently developed, then a fourth solution (No. 4) of the acid must be applied in the same manner as the preceding ones, but for a shorter period. Instead of the solution No. 4, one of the other diluted solutions may be employed if it shall be deemed sufficient to produce the desired effect upon the materials to be preserved. At the end of the process, in every case, the preserved materials are to be well drained.

the preservation of animal substances by William Rattray, chemist, No. 88. Erdeen, but that only in the manner described in the specification."

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.
Robertson.

'Sulphurous acid, whether of greater or less strength than the solutions I have named may be employed for preserving organic substances, but I have found in many cases that stronger acid acts injuriously upon the substances so preserved, while the use of weaker solutions of acid than those which I have mentioned above prolongs the period of treatment, and is productive of results otherwise unsatisfactory.

The above concludes the description of the mode of carrying out the first part of my invention, and the preserved substances are now ready to be submitted to treatment by the second part of my invention, which I shall now proceed to describe.

The second part of my invention, which relates to the preservation of animal and vegetable matters in vessels or cases is more particularly applicable to the preservation of materials operated upon according to the first part of my invention.

There are two modes in which I carry out this second part of my invention, which I shall respectively call the dry and the liquid modes.

First, the dry mode.—The substances having been submitted to the treatment described in the first part of my invention, I dip them into a solution of either of the alkaline sulphites or of the earthy sulphites, or concentrated sulphurous acid, which I prefer to be somewhat concentrated, I then allow the substances to drain, and expose them to the air for about two hours in a warm place, so that the water contained in the solution of the salt remaining on the surface may evaporate and leave the dry salt on the surface of the preserved substances. The preserved substances are now ready to be packed in casks, chests, or other cases, and in doing this the different pieces should be so placed that in the package they do not come into actual contact. This may be obviated by rolling the surfaces of the pieces in any of the alkaline or earthy sulphites reduced to the form of dry powder, and any interstices which may be left in the packages are to be filled with the same powder, and the cases closed up in the same manner as possible to prevent the access of air. A variation in the dry mode of packing just described consists in this, that, instead of rolling the preserved pieces in the dry powder, I envelope each piece in a cover of linen or of cotton cloth, such cloth having been previously steeped in a concentrated solution of sulphite of lime, or of sulphite of alumina in sulphurous acid, and dried. Then, enveloped, the pieces are to be placed in the packages, and the interstices filled with the dry powder in manner as above described.

Second, or liquid mode.—I shall now describe this mode of preserving substances when packed in cases. The substances having been submitted to the treatment above described as the first part of my invention, and also dipped into a solution of the sulphite in manner as I have described in the dry mode of packing, are, without being dried, to be at once packed in the intended cases in the same manner as to prevent their rolling about, yet not so much so as to obstruct the liquid to be put along with them from getting into contact with their surfaces.

Upon the cases being filled the interstices or vacant parts in them are to be filled with a solution in sulphurous acid of any of the sulphites already mentioned, of strength measuring about 2° on Twaddell's hydrometer. As described in the dry mode, in this mode also I have found it advantageous for each of the substances to be enveloped in covers of linen or cotton cloth previous to being packed, and the solutions added as above described. I prefer the dry mode of preserving substances in packing cases above described, and I may remark, that whether the dry or the liquid mode of packing be selected, it will be necessary to have the cases selected for packing of substantial make, and as securely air and water tight as possible.

In treating raw hides by my invention, I plunge them or suspend them in either of the stronger acid solutions above mentioned, that is to say, No. 4, and I submit them to only one or two applications of such dilute acid. After draining I treat them with either of the dry sulphites, but I prefer sulphite of lime, alone or mixed with a portion of dry sulphite of alumina. The hides are

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) The respondents having made use of bisulphite of lime alone for the preservation of meat, and that article having been well known and generally used by the public prior to June 1866 (the date of the alleged letters-patent), the respondents have not infringed the alleged letters-patent. (2) The alleged letters-patent and relative specification do not apply to the use of bisulphite of lime alone in the preservation of animal substances, and the use of that article alone is not an infringement of the alleged letters-patent. (3) Assuming that the said letters-patent and relative specification apply to the use of bisulphite of lime alone for preserving animal substances, the same are null and void in respect that bisulphite of lime was well known and generally used by the public for the preservation of animal substances prior to the date of the said letters-patent. (4) The application of bisulphite of lime alone to the preservation of animal substances is not any manner of new manufacture, and is not an invention which could be the subject of a patent. (5) Assuming that the alleged letters-patent and relative specification apply to the use of bisulphite of lime alone for the preservation of animal substances, the same, quoad that application, are null and void, in respect that the so-called invention was known and published within the United Kingdom prior to the date of the said letters-patent. (6) Assuming that the alleged letters-patent and relative specification apply to the use of bisulphite of lime alone in the preservation of animal substances, the same, quoad that application, are null and void, in respect that the said Henry Medlock and William Bailey, the alleged patentees, were not the first and true inventors of the said application. (7) The alleged invention as described in the final specification, varies materially from the invention as described in the provisional specification, and the said letters-patent are therefore null and void. (8) The letters-patent are null and void, in respect that the final specification claims the absolute application of bisulphite of lime for the preservation of animal substances without limiting its application to the modes of using it described in the specification. (9) The alleged letters-patent founded on by the petitioners are null and void, in respect that the alleged invention was publicly known prior to the date of the letters-patent.

A proof was led. The material facts fully appear in the interlocutor and the opinions of the Judges.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—“That the pursuer is assignee of the letters-patent, No. 6/1 of process, which were granted to Henry Medlock and the pursuer, dated 27th June 1866, and sealed 27th December 1866, in pursuance of which the said Henry Medlock and the pursuer filed the specification of which No. 6/12 of process is a certified printed copy: Finds that the defenders have failed to establish any of the objections to the validity of the said patent stated in the petition: Finds that, during the years 1873 and 1874, or during part of the said years, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders then to be compactly folded in bundles, so that the flesh sides may be placed towards the interior.

“Having now particularly described and ascertained the nature of the said invention, and the manner in which the same is to be performed, I declare that I claim as of my said invention,—

“First, the preserving of animal and vegetable matters by means of the solution of sulphurous acid, as above described.

“Secondly, the preserving of animal and vegetable substances by means of alkaline and earthy sulphites when packed in vessels or cases, as above described.”

their shops or premises in Gallowgate Street and Duke Street, Glasgow, No. 88.
 lawfully and in contravention of the said letters-patent, use the inven-described in the said letters-patent and specification: Therefore re- Feb. 23, 1877.
 all the defences, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges in terms of Bailey v.
 prayer of the petition: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in Roberton.
 cases; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax and report, and decerns." *

NOTE.—The pursuer is in right of a patent obtained on 27th June 1866, the object of the invention to which it applies is 'to preserve animal substances, such as meat, poultry, game, and fish, for a long time in a fresh state, so when eaten they cannot be distinguished from the same when recently killed, and for the preservation of hides.' It may be said, generally, that the process employed for this purpose is the application of a solution of a substance mentioned in the patent bisulphite of lime. The defenders are butchers in Glasgow, who do not dispute that, after purchasing that solution from the pursuer, they proceeded to do so, and have for some time got it from the Glasgow Apothecaries' Company, and have been in the habit of using it for the preservation of meat in the course of their trade. Indeed, it has been used in the same way by many others in Glasgow, and it appears that this action is defended in the interest of the trade, for the purpose of trying the validity of the pursuer's patent.

In the very clear and able argument submitted for the defenders it was not denied that the subject-matter of the invention was not patentable. That, therefore, which appears to be raised by the fourth plea on record, does directly at least, demand consideration.

The grounds on which the defenders challenge the pursuer's patent resolve into three—(1) That the invention set forth in the specification is not in conformity with the provisional specification; (2) that the conditions of the patent have not been complied with, in respect that the patentees have not detailed in the specification the nature of the invention and the manner in which it is to be performed; (3) that the invention for which the letters-patent are issued was not novel.

It will be more convenient to consider these objections to the validity of the patent in a different order, taking, first, the question, which is purely a question of fact, whether the pursuer's invention was anticipated by the specifications of the earlier patents produced and founded on by the defenders? . . .

We have therefore little difficulty in holding that this patent is not void by reason of any prior publication or user of the invention which it discloses, seeing that invention to be the application of the solution called bisulphite of lime for the preservation of meat in a fresh state.

It is said, however, that the specification of Messrs Medlock and Bailey does not satisfy the condition on which alone their letters-patent are granted, that 'they shall particularly describe and ascertain the nature of their invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed.' In this part of the argument, as I understand it, the defenders disregard the 2d, 3d, and 4th claims described on pages 3 and 4 of the specification 6/12, and the 2d, 3d, and 5th claims on page 5, looking only to the use of solution No. 1, which is the article in the use of which the alleged infringement by the defenders is said to consist. They say that the specification only discloses that the patentees have provided a solution for certain purposes, and that, in describing the manner of using the solution, nothing more is detailed than that 'we employ a solution,' &c., without specifying in what way that solution is to be used or applied, except when it forms an essential constituent part of the solutions and processes afterwards described. The defence is that the letters-patent do not include the application of that solution used alone, which, so far as appears in this case, is the use chiefly made of the solution in Medlock and Bailey's patent. It may be remarked that this argument might be equally applicable to the patent, but merely in shewing that the solution No. 1, used by the defenders, was not included in the patent, according to its fair construction and the original intention of the patentees; but for this case, in

No. 88.

The Sheriff (Dickson), on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor:—"And heres to the findings in the judgment appealed against, that the pursuer

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

which the application of their other solutions and processes is not in question, does not seem to be material in what way the defenders' argument is taken. Their objection was put, however, as going to destroy the patent, and it was said further that if we take the word 'employ,' along with the first claim, including every conceivable way in which the solution could be employed, the specification would be virtually a description of a mere principle, for which valid patent can exist.

"I think that the defenders have not substantiated this objection. It may be observed that while the construction of a specification is matter of law for the Court, with the aid of scientific evidence as to the meaning of technical language, it is a simple question of fact whether the description of the invention in the specification is sufficient—(1) to enable a workman of ordinary skill to carry it into effect; and (2) to shew persons reading the patent what they must avoid, so that they would not infringe the patent—(Morton v. Middleton, March 20, 1860, 1 Macph. 718, 35 Scot. Jur. 542; Hill v. Thomson, 1 Webs., P. R., 235; Neilson v. Betts, H. L., 40 L. J., Ch., 317, 329; Agnew on Patents, 117, 118). I think that there is sufficient evidence to shew that the description in this specification is enough to direct any ordinary workman to the proper manner of using the solution No. 1 for preserving meat. The specification indeed does not say whether it is to be brushed upon the meat, or the meat is to be dipped in it, nor does it direct the solution to be poured upon minced or sausage meat. But the pursuer's witnesses say, as matter of fact, that it is generally used in that manner by butchers now, and that the instructions in the specification are sufficient to enable any butcher to apply it. The pursuer has given at least prima facie proof that his description is practically sufficient, and the defenders, on the other hand, the onus rests of shewing that it is insufficient—(Bickford v. Skewes, 1 W. P. R. 219; Neilson v. Betts, L. R., 5 H. L., Ch., 317)—have adduced no evidence on that point at all.

"With regard to the question which falls to be considered here, whether the specification does claim every method of applying the solution No. 1 for the preservation of meat, I think that the sound construction of it is that it does. The first claim is expressly for 'the use of solution No. 1 for preserving substances.' There is no limitation or restriction of the extent of the word 'substances' have already considered whether this claim is too broad because it claims every thing known and disclosed before. But the defenders argue that it is too broad for another reason, viz., that it really is the assertion of a claim to the exclusive use of a principle. There seems to be no weight in this argument; for I am not aware that the property of a chemical body can well be called a principle in the sense in which that word has been used in the law of patents (Young v. Fernie, 10 Eng. Jur., N. S., 926; Higgs v. Goodwin, 27 L. J., Ch., 421, E. B. and E., 529; Unwin v. Heath, 5 H. L. Ca., 505, 25 L. J., Ch., 111; Hills v. London Gas Light Company, 5 H. and N., 312, 29 L. J., Ex., 111). and (2) if the defenders' witnesses are correct in asserting that the bisulphide of lime does not exist, the property is not even that of a distinct chemical substance, but of a chemical preparation, which Messrs Medlock and Bailey have shown us how to prepare and apply. Apart from this, however, and as matter of fact, it may perhaps be held that the rule on which this argument of the defenders is founded cannot in any view apply to this patent. It is true that 'you may take out a patent for a principle, but you may take out a patent for a principle coupled with the mode of carrying the principle into effect, provided you have not only discovered the principle, but invented some mode of carrying it into effect. If you have done that then you are entitled to protect your principle from all other modes of carrying the same into effect'—Per Baron Alderson in Jupe v. Brett, 1 Webs., P. R., 146. This statement of Baron Alderson was made in the course of argument; but it has received confirmation in other cases (Cochrane and Galloway, 1 Webs., Law of Pat., 79. And the same objection was stated in Neilson's Hot-blast Patent, where the ruling of the Lord Justice signee of the letters-patent mentioned in the said judgment, and that, No. 88.

 ursuance thereof, he and the original patentee filed the specification

Feb. 23, 1877.
 Bailey v.
 Robertson.

1st it was supported by the Inner-House, and was not challenged in the se of Lords—Neilson v. Househill Coal Company, April 7, 1842, 4 D., 1187, 5 D., 86, 117 (14 Scot. Jur. 626). The charge of the Lord Justice-Clerk, the opinion of Lord Moncreiff, on the bill of exceptions, shew the law to be id down by Baron Alderson; comp. also Winter v. Wells, 1 Webs., P. R., 134, 135.

Assuming, then, for a moment, that this is the statement of a principle, it be a sufficient answer that it is the statement of a principle combined with us modes of carrying it out, viz., the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th claims; and these modes being given, the patentees are entitled to claim over and above
 , as part of the subject-matter of their patent, every other mode of using rinciple for the specified purpose. I prefer, however, to rest my judgment this part of the case on the evidence that the specification is sufficiently or practical purposes; and I think that if it be admitted that the patentees t to have said expressly that the solution No. 1 was to be applied per se, hat it might be applied by brushing it on the meat, or by mixing a certain tity with minced meat, this is proved to be an omission of no materiality to petent tradesman, and therefore is within the authority of the cases of ley v. Beverley, 9 B. and C. 63, 1 Webs., P. R. 111; Neilson v. Harford, bs., 118, and Neilson v. Househill Coal Co., cit., and 1 Webs., P. R. 687.

t. With regard to the alleged disconformity between the provisional and the specification, the pursuer's argument goes perhaps rather too far when it is on the authority of a dictum of the Lord President, that this is not now vant plea in law. The Lord President cannot, I think, be understood to that it is no matter, provided the complete specification be within the though it should be for an altogether different invention from that set in the provisional specification. As explained in his Lordship's opinion e case referred to (Dudgeon v. Thomson, July 4, 1873, 11 Macph. 863, which compare Penn v. Bibby, 36 L. J., Ch. 455, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap. 127, Westbury's judgment), it is only meant that, in ascertaining whether the specification exceeds the subject-matter for which the letters-patent were el, we must compare it not with the provisional specification alone or the done, but with both read together.

o comparing the documents in this case, I do not think that the facts that ne is always associated with the bisulphite of lime in the provisional ication, and that the composition is to be applied while hot, make a mateariance from the final specification, in which the primary solution employed hout gelatine; for the evidence of the experts satisfies me that the real tion in this case is the use of bisulphite of lime for the preservation of in a fresh state, and that the gelatine in the provisional specification, and subordinate or secondary solutions described in the final specification, is y a vehicle or adjunct used for making the true preservation adhere and ue its operation for a longer time. The only rule as to this sort of variwhich can be laid down is that the provisional and final specifications must escribe different inventions,—in other words, that the final specification not describe different inventions; that the final specification must not con-y addition or alteration by which the nature of the invention becomes, in erial respect, different from that described in the provisional specification cwell v. Bostock, 4 De G., J. and S. 298; Thomas v. Welch, L. R., 1 C.
 2, 35 L. J., C. P. 200; Newall v. Elliott, 4 C. B., N. S. 269, 27 L. J., C.
 7; Agnew on Patents, 151, seqq. It is not, in my opinion, proved that anges introduced in the final specification make the invention substantially one. On the contrary, they appear in the light of the scientific evidence merely improvements in details, probably discovered by the patentees in urse of perfecting their invention, and which it was their duty to com-ate to the public in their final specification.

pon the whole case, therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders have not ed in shewing that this patent is invalid.

No. 88. (hereinafter called the complete specification) mentioned in the judgment.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

For the reasons stated in the note hereto, recalls the said judgment ultra: Finds that the said complete specification sets forth that the manner in which the alleged invention to which it implies is performed is employing a solution of bisulphite of lime (mentioned in the specification as solution No. 1) alone, and also in combination with certain other solutions: Finds that the defenders used the said solution No. 1 alone for preserving animal substances, but that it is not proved that they used it in combination with any of the said other solutions: Finds that the letters-patent were issued after the said original patentee had lodged with the Patent Office a provisional specification, describing the nature of the alleged invention: Finds that the said provisional specification does not describe the use of the said solution No. 1, or any other solution of bisulphite of lime, alone as a means of preserving animal substances, but merely describes it as to be used, in combination with a solution of gelatin: Finds that the said complete specification does not sufficiently describe the manner in which the said solution No. 1 is to be employed for preserving animal substances: Finds that a solution of bisulphite of lime for the said purpose was not a new invention at the time the said letters-patent were obtained: Therefore, and under reference to the note hereto, finds that the said letters-patent are not effectual for preventing the defenders from using the said solution No. 1 alone for the said purpose: Sustains, accordingly, the defences to that effect, and refuses the prayer of the petition: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses; and an account thereof to be given in, and remits," &c. *

"4. The only remaining question is, whether there has in fact been a fringement of the patent. Upon this point, although something was said in argument, I am unable to see that there is any real dispute as to the fact that the defenders have been using a liquor practically identical with the pursuer's solution, and, indeed, an imitation of it, without their license. The pursuer is therefore entitled to interdict."

* "NOTE.—Questions of considerable difficulty and importance are involved in this case.

"The pursuer avers on record that the defenders have used for the preservation of meat a solution of bisulphite of lime similar to No. 1, both alone and in combination with other substances mentioned in his letters-patent. But he has admittedly failed to prove the use of it except alone.

"On the other hand, the defenders' counsel admitted that they have used a solution similar to No. 1 in such a way as to infer an encroachment on the pursuer's rights, if the patent validly prohibits such use. They contend that the patent does not, on the following grounds:—

"I. It does not apply to No. 1 solution when used alone.

"II. The complete is materially different from the provisional specification.

"III. The former does not describe the mode of using No. 1 solution for preserving meat, and

"IV. The use of such a solution for preserving meat was not a new discovery of the patentee.

"I. The proper construction of the complete specification is thought to be that the use of No. 1, not only along with the other solution which it specifies, but also alone. At the same time, the absence (1st) of any explanation as to the effect of using it alone, and (2d) of any reference in the provisional specification to that use, makes it doubtful whether the patentee intended his complete specification to bear such a meaning.

"II. A comparison of the complete with the provisional specifications shows that the latter states the object of the invention to be to preserve animal substances for a long time in a fresh state, 'so that, when eaten, they are not distinguished from the same when recently killed.' It does not mention he petitioner appealed. Additional pleas were given in for the parties. No. 88.

respondents' pleas were ;—1. On a sound construction of the letters-

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.

Robertson.

ervation of such substances salted. But the complete specification includes use of solution No. 1, with one of salt, which admittedly would not preserve meat fresh. It may be doubted whether the patent can cover the latter

But without dwelling on this, it will be observed that the provisional specification thus describes a process for which the patent is claimed :—' We dissolve ordinary commercial gelatine in boiling water, using about two pounds of lime to ten pounds of water. We then add, while hot, a volume equal to volume of the solution of gelatine of a solution of bisulphite of lime (usually assessed by the formula $\text{Ca O}, 2 \text{ S O}_2$) in water of about the specific gravity of
. While the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime is still warm and we coat the substance to be preserved with it, either by dipping the substance into it, or by brushing it over with two or three coats of the solution.'
Directions conclude thus :—' Before the meat is cooked the coating of gelatine and bisulphite of lime must be removed by soaking it for a sufficient time later.'

The process is thus the application to the meat of solutions of gelatine and bisulphite of lime in combination, in defined proportions, warm externally, so as to produce a coating which must be removed before the cooked meat can be cooked.

The complete specification repeats this description as to the use of 'solution ' with only an unimportant modification in the specific gravity of the dissolved bisulphite. So far it is unobjectionable.

But it also specifies the solution No. 1 uncombined with gelatine, without whether it is to be applied hot or cold, or whether it is to be used only externally and by way of coating, or otherwise. It thus includes application by boiling, by saturation, and by mixing up with the meat when minced, the being one used by the defenders which the pursuer seeks to prevent. The specification deals with the combined solution as unfit for the human stomach, from being either unpalatable or deleterious ; the other deals with one of compounds as being wholesome, for it says nothing about its removal from the meat to which it is applied is cooked.

It is not easy to see how preserving meat by means of two solutions, the one of which 'must be' removed before consumption of the meat, can be so identical with preserving meat by one of the two solutions which may be eaten on or mixed up and eaten with the meat. It can hardly be imagined that the patentee had the simple and wholesome agent in view when he got a patent for the compound, and apparently unwholesome, one.

It was urged for the pursuer (and is clearly proved) that the only preserving agent in the double solution is the bisulphite, the gelatine being only used as a vehicle, and for fixing it on to the meat. But in the provisional specification two substances stand together as equally important, or, if one could be said to be the more so, it would be the gelatine, which is mentioned first, and to the bisulphite is to be 'added.'

It will not do for a patentee to say,—as the pursuer now does,—that of two agents apparently equally essential to his invention one is non-essential, merely intended for conveying and fixing the other. The provisional specification contains no data for thus discriminating between the two. It claims preserving virtue for them in combination ;—for neither of them alone.

The object of every provisional specification is to disclose the nature of the invention. It is published in order that all persons interested may have an opportunity of opposing the application for the patent, and that the law may know what is claimed as an invention (15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83, secs.
1 and 2).

It may fairly be contended that while persons in the defenders' trade may have known that a solution of bisulphite of lime was a preserving agent which could be applied in certain ways they did not know of the special virtues

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

patent founded on, the use of bisulphite of lime alone in the preservation of animal substances is not thereby claimed, and the use of that ar claimed (rightly or not) for a combination of it with dissolved gelatine, applied hot, and by way of a coating over meat. They had therefore no reason to dispute such a claim.

"If, however, the provisional specification had disclosed a claim for a process for preserving meat in any and every way by bisulphite of lime, Mr Clark held at the time a patent for doing so by solutions of bisulphites generally (without specifying that of lime), and Mr Rattray, who held one for a process consisting partly of enveloping the meat in cloth, steeped in a concentrated solution of sulphite (i.e., a solution of bisulphite) of lime, would have had an opportunity of opposing the application. They were deprived of that opportunity by the provisional specification not making such a claim. The law officers must have been unaware and been misled as to the true nature of that alleged invention as stated in the complete specification.

"The object of the statute in requiring a provisional specification to be made and published would be defeated if the patent in this case were held to cover the use of the bisulphite alone.

"The importance of any material difference between the provisional and complete specification is evident from the terms of the Patent-Law Amendment Act (15 and 16 Vict. cap. 83). The former is there defined (sec. 16) as the provisional specification describing the nature of the said invention.' The definition in the schedule is—'I do hereby declare the nature of the said invention to be as follows,' &c., and it is for the invention as there described that the letters-patent are issued. The complete specification is filed after by the patentee, and is not examined or passed by any public officer.

"The invention patented is that described in the provisional specification, which the complete specification may and ought to amplify and supplement with matters of detail, but from which it may not vary materially.

"This is clearly laid down by Lord Chief Baron Pollock in Newall v. Higgins (1864, Higgins' Patent Cases, 163, and in 10 Eng. Jur., N. S., 955); the object of the statute, which requires a provisional specification, is nothing more than a legislative recognition of the custom which called upon every patentee when he applies for the patent, to give some notion of what his invention is. That has been followed by an Act of Parliament requiring it to be done. The object in both cases is to ascertain the identity of the invention, and to make it certain that the patentee shall ultimately obtain his patent for that invention which he presented to the Attorney-General in the first instance. . . . There can have no doubt that the object of the Act of Parliament was not to ascertain the entirety of the invention, but the identity of the invention, so as to enable the Attorney-General, and, in fact, to enable a jury, ultimately to determine whether the invention fully specified was the same invention as that which was presented to the notice of the Attorney-General by the provisional specification.' Lord Channell said in the same case,—'I entirely adopt the test which my Lord Chief Baron suggested, that the question is as to the identity of the invention, and whether it is disclosed by the full specification, with that of which a short note or abstract was made in the provisional specification.'

"The law is laid down to the same effect by Lord Chancellor Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock (1864, Higgins' Patent Cases, 164, 10 Law Times, 144); and by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford in Penn v. Bibby, 1866 (Higgins' Patent Cases, 165, Law Rep., 2 Chan. App., 134).

"The same rule was laid down by Lord Chief Justice Erle in The Welsh (1 Law Rep., C. P., 192), in which the patentee succeeded on the ground that the 'difference between the provisional and complete specification was a slight one which injured nobody.'

"The pursuer's agent contended that a Sheriff Court must disregard the authorities, on account of the observations of the Lord President in Dugald Thomson (1873, 11 Macph. 863), that 'the plea' (of disconformity between provisional and final specifications) 'as stated, is altogether futile; nor

e is not an infringement of the said letters-patent. 2. Separatim, No. 88. said letters-patent are null and void, or invalid, in respect (1) the

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.
Robertson.

it a relevant plea in law; because, if the letters-patent and complete specification are in accordance with one another, and the two make a valid and complete patent, then an imperfection in the provisional specification, I apprehend, would be altogether immaterial.' It is evident both from this observation, and from the rest of the opinion, that his Lordship did not mean to lay it that disconformity between the provisional and complete specifications did not in any case be fatal, and that he only criticised the plea 'as stated,' mere disconformity in itself is fatal, and observed that a mere imperfection (incompleteness) in the former is unimportant; for the learned Judge goes on to say,—'It appears to me that in these circumstances the true question under consideration of this kind is, whether the complete specification goes beyond the title of the provisional specification, for these two must be taken together. . . . Is something more claimed in the complete specification than was claimed and specified in the title and provisional specification?'

Applying the principles thus explained to the present case, the Sheriff concludes that the pursuer's complete specification both materially differs from and goes beyond the provisional specification, the latter having been limited to the use of a solution of bisulphite of lime in combination with one of gelatine, and at a particular temperature and externally, while the former extends to the use of the solution of the bisulphite in every way, at every temperature, and alone and in that combination.

It is unnecessary to say whether the effect of this difference is to render the patent null to all intents. It is enough that it is fatal to the patent for a solution of the bisulphite as a preserving agent in the unqualified terms claimed in the complete specification. The defence to that effect, therefore, falls to be rejected.

II. The defenders contended that the complete specification does not define the mode of applying solution No. 1 when used alone, to which the pursuer answered that any such description is unnecessary, because the solution can be, and has been, successfully applied by persons skilled in such matters, and is all that the law requires.

This question involves two points—(1st), Whether, in point of law, a patent for a process is sufficient which does not define at all the way in which the materials employed in the process are to be employed? and (2d), Whether, as a matter of fact, the solution No. 1 can be employed properly without special directions?

1) It must be kept in view that the patent is not for a preserving agent, but for the mode of using which had been previously known, but for preserving meat in a manner not previously known. It is for producing a certain result by (alleged) discovered means, viz., the use of a certain solution,—in other words, it is a process.

The law is laid down in all the authorities that the complete specification must state fully and clearly the manner in which a process patented is to be carried out. 'The patentee must give the public every information which is necessary to enable them completely to perform every part of the patent which is claimed, although it may be sufficient to refer in general terms to such things as are well known'—(Hindmarsh on Patents, p. 170; see to the same effect Wheeler, 1819, Higgins' Patent Cases, 169; Brunton v. Hawkes, ibid. Morgan v. Seward, ibid. 172). The questions which have arisen under this rule have been, whether the description of the process in certain cases was sufficient, being only intelligible to persons of skill or persons in certain trades. The law was cited, or has been found by the Sheriff, indicating that a specification could be sustained which is quite silent as to the mode of performing the process patented.

The complete specification as to No. 1, when used alone, is in that position, and only says 'we employ' it. That is thought to be insufficient.

2) Upon the question of fact, the pursuer contends that butchers and

No. 88. alleged invention described in the complete specification is materially different from the invention described in the title and provisional specification.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

housekeepers are able to apply properly a chemical agent not previously used by them for that (or, indeed, any other) purpose, without any explanation or instructions whatever from the inventor. But neither butcher nor housekeeper would know, without some instructions or investigation, whether it was to be applied hot or cold, whether only externally or mixed up with the meat (as in collops) or how long it was to be applied in the one case, or in what proportions in the other. If, as the pursuer's witness, Dr Macadam, observes, the tendency of the dissolved bisulphite alone, as well as combined with gelatine, is 'to form an encrusting crust outside the meat,' novices would be surprised at finding such a result, and would probably think it not a wholesome or satisfactory sign. They would likely stop a process which produced effects so different from that resulting from any other processes for the purpose of which they had experience. But if, notwithstanding of this, they continued to have confidence in the process, how could they know how long to leave the meat exposed to it? or what would be the proper thickness of the crust? or at what point the maximum of preserving effect was reached with the minimum of expenditure of the preserving agent, would be attained? What could they know as to the proper way of dealing with the meat with the crust on? Was the joint to be put to the fire, or into the stewpan, with or without its new cover? If without, how was the 'crust' to be removed? If they found out, or guessed, or were told something on these points, how could they have known the best way to apply the agent, or to remove it, or that they were doing either in the way the patentee intended? They might have discovered a different process from that which was patented.

"The mixing up of the chemical solution in collops would probably have occurred to either a butcher or a housekeeper, however ingenious. The quantity to mix must have been unknown; and it would have been the result of rashness and recklessness to have proceeded on mere guess in a matter which (for all they knew) health, and even life, might have been imperilled by mistake.

"Lastly, how long and how often could the solution be used? Would the properties be impaired by the dipping of one piece of meat in it, or could the same solution be used twice, or how many more times?

"The Sheriff cannot hold that a specification, which gives no light on matters of such essential importance comes within the principle that a patent is granted on condition of the patentee giving to the public sufficiently specific information as to the process patented that persons of skill in such matters could get the full benefit of it.

"The pursuer's argument that the process is so simple that no instruction required is farther negatived by the fact that he issued cards for instructing the butcher trade as to the way to use the solution. It has repeatedly been held that a specification is incomplete which can only be applied by skilled persons after they have learnt how to do so by experiment (cases in Higgins, p. 11, seq.) In this case, such persons could only have learned about it in this way, or from information which the specification does not afford.

"The pursuer's law agent tried to escape from this difficulty by contending that the patent is not for a process, but for an agent, like chloroform, chlorodyne, or some patent medicine. This is erroneous. The title clearly indicates a process, not an agent; for it is for 'improvements in preserving animal substances' and the minute directions as to all the solutions, except No. 1, when used, clearly shew the same thing.

"The Sheriff accordingly is of opinion that the pursuer's patent for the process of that solution by itself is ineffectual from want of sufficient description of the process.

"IV. He concurs with the Sheriff-substitute that prior use with regard to No. 1 is not to be inferred from the pursuer's patent of 1861, or Clark's patent of 1864.

"Rattray's patent is thought to be different. Its title is 'for improvement ion, and the complete specification claims more than was claimed and closed in the said title and provisional specification; (2) the said complete specification does not particularly describe and ascertain in what manner the alleged invention is to be performed; (3) the said Henry Dlock and William Bailey were not the true and first inventors of the alleged invention claimed in the letters-patent; and (4) the said alleged invention was publicly known and used at and prior to the date of the letters-patent. 3. The respondents not having infringed the said patent, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Argued for the petitioner;—The three objections sustained by the court against the validity of the patent for the use of solution No. 1 were not well founded,—(1) As to the alleged disconformity between the provisional and the final specification: The object of the provisional specification was to disclose the nature of the invention, and if that was the case the inventor had six months to experiment and perfect his invention. The object of allowing him six months was to enable him to find out the means of applying the invention, and it would be unreasonable to require him strictly to the details of the provisional specification. All that was required to give was some notice of the invention. The onus of shewing disconformity lay on the respondents, and in order to succeed they would require to shew that the final specification disclosed a different invention. The essence of the invention was the antiseptic properties of sulphite of lime as applied to animal substances, and this was sufficiently disclosed in the provisional specification. It did not matter that gelatine was also mentioned. This might have been disclaimed in the final specification, and the fact that it was not claimed under the first head was equivalent to a disclaimer. The only use of the provisional specification was to satisfy the law officers of the Crown, and the public had no concern with it.¹ (2) This objection was that the final specification did not shew the manner of use of No. 1 solution alone. It was not open to the respondents, as they had not stated it upon record, and originally they made no plea upon it. The word "employ" was sufficient to disclose the manner of use, and this was made clear by the fact that butchers and others had no difficulty in finding out the manner of use. The patent

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

preserving organic substances; and the provisional specification for it, after describing the first part of the process as impregnating the animal and vegetable substances with an aqueous solution of sulphurous acid, proceeds,—'My invention consists, secondly, of the use of the alkaline and earthy sulphites in packing preserved animal and vegetable matter in cases.' The complete specification describes part of the process as being the use of a concentrated solution of sulphite of lime in sulphurous acid, which admittedly is the same as a solution of sulphite.

For this limited purpose, therefore, Rattray clearly has right to use a solution similar to the pursuer's No. 1; and his patent has anticipated to some extent the use of this substance as a preserving agent. Nay, more, for all that is in the pursuer's complete specification, his solution could only be applied in the same way as Rattray's.

The Sheriff inclines to think that this infers a prior patent and use by Rattray. If the pursuer's claim as to No. 1 were sustained, Rattray and those holding a license could no longer profit by his patent."

Food v. Zemmer, &c., July 1, 1815, Holt's Nisi Prius Cases, p. 58; Newall v. Elliott, Jan. 29, 1863, 32 L. J., Exch. 120; Thomas v. Welch, Jan 18, 1866, 11 C. P. 192; Penn v. Bibby, Nov. and Dec. 1866, L. R., 2 Chan. App., Wright v. Hitchcock, Jan. 11, 1870, L. R., 5 Exchequer, 37; Dudgeon v. Brown, July 4, 1873, 11 Macph. 863, 45 Scot. Jur. 528; Cosley v. Bevan, 27. 1829, 9 Barnewell and Cresswell, 63.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

was for a principle which might be used in a variety of ways.¹ (3) The had been no anticipation of the use of bisulphite of lime for preserving animal substances in a fresh condition. In Rattray's patent the meat was preserved pickled, and not in a fresh state. The strength of the solution was different, and the selection of a particular strength would be enough. Besides, in Rattray's patent the use of bisulphite of lime was only part of a complicated process. Here it was used alone.²

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The final specification was different from the provisional specification. The provisional specification did not describe the use of solution No. 1 alone. The Patent-Law Amendment Act did not require the manner of use to be set forth in the provisional specification, but if the inventor set it forth he was bound to do so. The invention described in the provisional specification was a combination of gelatine and bisulphite of lime, and could not be held to include the use of bisulphite of lime alone. (2) The final specification set out a particular manner of use as to solution No. 1. The word "employ" was not enough to enable people to use the solution. If the claim was for a principle, the principle was disclosed.³ The subject-matter of the patent was previously known for preserving beer, and its application to meat was not a sufficient difference to justify the granting of a patent. Besides, it had been previously applied to the preservation of meat in Rattray's patent.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the petitioner in the inferior Court obtained in 1866 a patent for "improvements in preserving animal substances," and the prayer of the petition to the Sheriff is to interdict the respondents from "using or applying the material known as bisulphite of lime in solution for preserving animal substances, or preventing and arresting decomposition in animal substances, and from using or applying the bisulphite of lime alone or in connection with gelatine or salt for the preservation of joints of meat, or of the bodies of animals, whether the skin or feathers have been removed therefrom or not, fish, game, poultry, or other animal substances, or for the purpose of preventing and arresting decomposition in animal substances in any manner described in said specification, and from using and applying the bisulphite of lime alone or along or in connection with any other substance or substances for any of the purposes foresaid."

Now, among those alternatives there is this general distinction, that interdict is sought against the use of bisulphite of lime in solution for preserving animal substances absolutely, and without any admixture with other substances. On the other hand, interdict is sought against the respondents using bisulphite of lime in solution along with other substances for the same purpose. The

¹ Hills v. London Gas Light Co., Feb. 25, 1860, 29 L. J. (Exch.), 409; v. Evans, Jan. 29, 1862, 31 L. J. (Chancery), 457.

² Young v. Fernie, May 26, 1864, 4 Gifford, 577; Young v. White, Dec. 1854, 23 L. J. (Chancery), 192, 1 H. L. p. 63; Minter v. Mower, 1 Webster's Patent Cases, 138; Betts v. Menzies, Feb. and June 1862, 10 Clark's High Court Cases, 117; Rex v. Wheeler, 1819, 2 Barnwell and Alderson, 117; Regina v. Mill, Nov. 18, 1850, 10 Scott's C. B. Reports, 379, Rex v. Mill, 1817, 2 Starkie, 249.

³ Booth v. Kennard, May 2, 1857, 26 L. J., Exch. 305; Jordan v. Minter, April 27, 1866, L. R., 1 C. P. 624; Arnold v. Bradbury, July 20, 1871, 16 Chan. App. 706; cases quoted in Agnew on Patents, p. 147; Canning v. Nuttall, June 12, 1871, L. R. 5 E. and I. App. 205.

⁴ Rushton v. Crawley, June 16, 1870, L. R., 10 Equity, 522.

the evidence is that the respondents, who are butchers in Glasgow, have been some time in the habit of using bisulphite of lime alone for preserving joints of meat, and the petitioner alleges that that use is a violation of the rights secured to him under his letters-patent. In other words, his contention is that he has secured during the currency of the patent a monopoly of the use of bisulphite of lime for preserving animal substances; nor does he claim the use of solution No. 1 except for the purpose of preserving animal substances. Now, the defences which have been proponed upon the part of the respondents resolve themselves into objections to the validity of the patent as securing that right—namely, to say, securing to the patentee a monopoly of the use of bisulphite of lime for preserving animal substances without reference to the manner in which it is used, or the combination in which it is used, or whether it is used simply in combination with other things.

The first objection which is maintained by the respondents is that the specification does not describe the manner in which bisulphite of lime, pure, is to be used for the preservation of animal substances. This objection assumes that the specification sufficiently discloses the nature of the invention, because the objection is that it fails in the second part of the office of a specification only, viz., in describing the manner in which the invention is to be performed.

But, in judging of the soundness of this objection, it is necessary to examine the specification as a whole; but the question will ultimately be, whether the claim made by the patentee is a good claim, in respect that he has, with reference to that first claim, both described the nature of the invention and the manner in which it is to be performed? The claim is stated under five heads, namely, the use of solution No. 1 for preserving animal substances. Secondly, the preservation of joints of meat, animals from which the skin or hide have been removed, fish, and hides, by means of solution No. 2 in manner hereinbefore described. Thirdly, the preservation of animals without the skin by means of solution No. 3 in manner hereinbefore described. Fourthly, the preservation of fish, game, and poultry by means of solution No. 4 in manner hereinbefore described. Fifthly, the preventing and arresting decay in animal substances by means of solution No. 4 in manner hereinbefore described. Then follows this sentence of disclamation,—“But we do not claim the employment of gelatine or salt, nor of the processes of cleansing or drying, nor of air-tight vessels, except in connection with and in aid of solution No. 1, and for the purpose of preserving animal substances, nor do we claim the use of solution No. 1 except for the purpose of preserving animal sub-

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

it is impossible to read those different heads of the claim without much rack with a distinction between the first and all the other heads of the claim. In all the other heads of the claim the solution, whether No. 2 or No. 4, is claimed for the purpose of preserving animal substances “in the manner hereinbefore described;” but in the first head of the claim the solution is claimed for preserving animal substances without reference to any manner hereinbefore described. I do not say that that in itself constitutes any objection to the claim, but it is certainly a circumstance to be taken into account when we come to consider whether in regard to solution No. 1 there is in truth a monopoly in the patent of the manner in which the invention is to be performed.

Coming now to the specification, at the beginning we have this statement

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

—“The nature of our said invention is to preserve animal substances, such as meat, poultry, game, fish, and other animal substances, for a long time, and so that the same substances when so preserved, and although the animals from which the same are derived have been killed for a considerable time, cannot be distinguished when cooked from the like substances derived from similar animals which have been recently killed, and also for the preservation of hides.” This is a certain impropriety in the use of the language here, because this paragraph which I have just read professes to state the nature of the invention, and that it certainly in my opinion does not do. It states the object or end of the invention—the preservation of animal substances,—but it does not state the nature of the invention by means of which that object is attained. That, however, is but a verbal criticism, and would be no objection to the validity of the specification if within the specification itself you find, notwithstanding that proper use of language, that the nature of the invention is described; and accordingly I think that, with regard to the first head of the claim, which, it must be borne in mind, is only for the use of solution No. 1 for the preservation of animal substances, the nature of the invention embraced in that head of the claim is set out in the body of the specification; and it is in the words which immediately follow the paragraph I have just read. The specification goes thus—“The manner in which our said invention is performed is as follows. We employ a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 1, being a solution of bisulphite of lime (usually expressed by the formula $\text{Ca O}, 2 \text{ S O}_2$), in water of about the specific gravity of 1050, which specific gravity we find preferable to that of 1070.” Now, here again there is an impropriety of language in what I have read this paragraph, because what I have read appears to me to be a sufficient description of the nature of the invention, viz., the employment of bisulphite of lime as an antiseptic, or, in other words, to attain the object of preserving meat as that object is described in the preceding paragraph. It is introduced by the inappropriate words—“The manner in which our invention is performed is as follows.” It is certainly not a description, in so far as solution No. 1 is concerned, of the manner of performing the invention, but a description, and the only description within the specification, of the nature of the invention. There is no more about solution No. 1 or about the first head of the claim in this specification at all. I have read every word of the specification that applies to the first head of the claim, or, in other words, to solution No. 1, and the question comes to be, whether within what I have read there is a description whatever of the manner in which the invention “is to be performed.”

It was contended that what is here stated is quite enough to suggest to the mind of any intelligent person that the application of bisulphite of lime to meat will act as an antiseptic. Very true so far, and that is the nature of the invention. But it is contended further that that being once understood you may apply it in any way, and that it is not necessary to tell you how to apply it. But I am afraid that that is not a good argument in patent-law. You must comply with the proviso in the letters-patent, to state the manner in which the invention is to be performed, as well as the nature of the invention. You may combine the two in one set of words—that I do not dispute. But you must tell the world not only what the nature of your invention is, but also in what manner it “is to be performed,” and it will not absolve the patentee from that duty to say that any one can conjecture how it is to be performed, and that there is no mystery about it. That is not a good argument.

ent-law. But neither do I think it is a good answer here in point of fact, No. 88.
 applicable to the circumstances of this case. Observe, again, the words which are used with regard to this solution No. 1—"We employ solution No. 1—" which is a synonym for bisulphite of lime, "in water of about the specific gravity of 1050,"—that is to say, "We employ bisulphite of lime of the specific gravity of 1050;" and that is all that is said. He has already stated the object which it is to be employed, viz, the preservation of animal substances, but, what he tells as to how it is to be employed (he does not even say applied) is bisulphite of lime of the specific gravity of 1050 is to be employed.

Feb. 23, 1877.
 Bailey v.
 Robertson.

The natural question occurs to any one reading that, how am I to employ this solution? There are a great many ways in which a substance of this kind may be employed with reference to animal substances. It is not said that it is particularly applicable to animal substances in any particular state. It is not said that it is to be used for preserving joints of meat in particular, or whether it is to be employed in preserving entire carcases of animals, with or without the skin, or with or without the feathers. It is not said whether it is to be rubbed on the animal substance to be preserved, or whether the animal substance is dipped in it, or whether it is to be used hot or cold, or whether it is to be used by evaporating the bisulphite of lime and creating a vapour which shall preserve the meat. Any one of those methods may occur to the mind of a man reading this part of the specification, and he obtains no light whatever on the subject from the patentee.

Now, contrast this with what this same patentee has done in regard to the other heads of his claim, all which, observe, are claimed quite distinctly separately from this No. 1. He gives next a description of solution No.
 2. He tells how that solution is to be made, and what its ingredients are, and so he describes the nature of that part of his invention. But then he follows that up with a very distinct specification of the manner in which that part of the invention is to be performed. He begins the description of the manner in which it is to be performed with these very important words, "for this purpose." Again, as regards the third head of his claim, he tells you of compound solution No. 3, and to apply that solution to the preservation of animal substances in a particular condition, and then, when he has disclosed what solution No. 3 is, he goes on introducing the manner of performing that part of the invention with the same very significant words, "for this purpose." Again, in regard to solution No. 4, he describes, in the first place, what the ingredients and composition of that solution are, and again he introduces the manner in which that part of the invention is to be performed with "for this purpose."
 Lastly, in regard to the second application of solution No. 4, he says—"We use that solution No. 4 is also useful for preventing and arresting decomposition of such butchers' meat, game, poultry, and fish,"—and again he goes on to describe the manner of performing it, introducing it in the same terms.
 Now, this examination seems to me to give great significance and importance to the very peculiar way in which the claim in regard to No. 1 is made at the close of the specification. No. 1 solution, being nothing else than what we all know as bisulphite of lime, is claimed for preserving animal substances without any reference to the manner in which it is to be used for that purpose, in all the other heads of the claim reference is expressly made to "the manner hereinbefore described" in which these different solutions are to be

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

I therefore come to the conclusion that this specification is defective in of the essential particulars required to make a specification good, and that is description of the manner in which the invention is to be performed. Let in conclusion, on this branch of the case, suggest this test of the sufficiency of the specification. When the specification is analysed, so far as applicable the first head of the claim, or solution No. 1, what does it in reality amount to? This, and no more—"Use bisulphite of lime of specific gravity of 1050 for purpose of preserving animal substances." That, and not one idea beyond what the patentee conveys to the world in so far as regards the first head of claim. Now, just let us suppose that the other heads of the claim had not been here at all, and that the only thing in the specification was solution No. 1. It would have been a very short and simple specification certainly, but it would have been such a specification as never was heard of in patent-law before, and such as has been sustained as a sufficient compliance with the proviso contained in letters-patent.

But, then, in the second place, the respondents object that, in so far as the invention is concerned, there is such disconformity between the invention as disclosed in the complete specification and the invention as embraced in the title of the patent and the provisional specification as to constitute a fatal objection to the patent, upon the ground that there is no identity of invention between the two, and that the complete specification claims a much larger and very different invention from what is claimed in the provisional specification. I think this objection is perfectly well founded.

We have already seen quite sufficiently what it is that is claimed in the complete specification under the first head of his claim in the complete specification. Let us see what it is that is alone claimed in the provisional specification. The provisional specification says—"The object of the said invention is to preserve animal substances, such as meat, poultry, game, and fish, for a long time in a fresh state, so that when eaten they cannot be distinguished from the same when recently killed, and for the preservation of hides." Here the language used by the patentee is more accurate than when he states the object of the invention in his complete specification, for he here very properly calls it the object of the invention, while in the other he calls it very improperly the nature of his invention. Then he goes on to comply with what is required by the statute in the provisional specification, which is to state the nature of the invention. One first reads that which follows, and which I am about to read, it certainly sounds more like a description of the manner of performing an invention than a statement of its nature. I cannot but admit that while it partakes of that character it still does sufficiently disclose the nature of the invention,—“The object of the invention is to preserve animal substances, such as meat, poultry, game, and fish, for a long time in a fresh state, so that when eaten they cannot be distinguished from the same when recently killed, and for the preservation of hides. For this purpose we dissolve the ordinary commercial gelatine in boiling water, using about two pounds of gelatine to ten pounds of water. We then, while hot, add a volume equal to the volume of the solution of gelatine of a solution of bisulphite of lime (usually expressed by the formula $\text{CaO}, 2\text{SO}_2$) in water of about the specific gravity of 1070. While the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime is still warm and liquid we coat the substance to be preserved with it, either by dipping the substance into it or by brushing it over with a brush, or three coats of the solution. If the substance has to be transported ance in wooden vessels, the vessels should be saturated with some of the before-mentioned solution of bisulphite of lime in water, and when dry brushed over the said solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime. When the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime has firmly solidified on the surface of the animal substance, the latter may be packed, the vessel being closed as air-tight as possible. For the preservation of hides the interior surface only requires to be coated with the solution of gelatine and bisulphite of lime. The coating on the skins and the hides must be dried before they are packed. Before treating the animal substance other than hides as above, the viscera must be removed and inside washed free from blood; it is then to be coated internally and externally as above described, and before it is cooked the coating of gelatine and bisulphite of lime must be removed by soaking it for a sufficient time in water." Now, it appears to me that that is as nearly as possible a description of the second head of the claim in the complete specification. It is not quite technical—that is of small importance—but it is as nearly as possible the claim made under the second head of the complete specification, for the thing claimed is not the use of bisulphite of lime under all circumstances and conditions, pure or mixed with other substances, for the preservation of animal substances, but it is the use of bisulphite of lime in a particular combination. There is not a word about bisulphite of lime in the commencement of the description. The first thing to be done is to dissolve a certain quantity of the ordinary commercial gelatine in water of a particular temperature, and then to add to it a solution of lime, and with that solution, composed of gelatine and bisulphite of lime, a certain application to the substances to be preserved is to be made, so as to create over and around the substances to be preserved a certain solid coating which is to have the effect of preserving the animal substances, which coating must be removed before the animal substances can be used as human food. Now, that is a very precise and specific and limited claim. It is a claim for one particular solution, composed partly of bisulphite of lime and partly of gelatine, and the object, which is distinctly stated, is so to apply that solution to animal substances as to make a solid coating all over them, which coating you must remove before you can use the meat. Now, is that a claim which can be identified with, or which in any reasonable sense can be said to comprehend, a claim for the use of bisulphite of lime under all circumstances and conditions, pure or mixed, for the preservation of animal substances? I do not answer that question in the negative. I think the claim in the complete specification is a great deal wider, and of a different kind, and therefore there is not that identity between the invention disclosed in the one specification and in the other which is necessary to comply with the provision of the law and to make a good patent in the eye of the law. In that view also I am disposed to say that this patentee cannot prevail.

The third objection which is maintained is an objection of want of novelty, and I confess I am not very willing to enter upon the consideration of that question because it is really excluded by the construction which I have already put upon the complete specification. If there is no good claim for a monopoly of the use of lime under all circumstances and conditions for the purpose of preserving meat, it is in vain to inquire whether other people beforehand have used bisulphite of lime for that purpose. In short, judgment upon the first objection seems to me necessarily to supersede the consideration of the question of novelty or no novelty, and therefore I am not disposed to base my judgment

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

upon that ground at all; but I think that the patent is bad—first, because the complete specification does not disclose the manner in which the invention under the first head of the claim is to be performed, and secondly, because that head of the claim is greatly in excess of that which is claimed in the provisional specification.

For these reasons, I am disposed to adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff in substance, though perhaps it may be desirable in some respects to modify his findings, if your Lordships should not be prepared, as I confess I am unwilling to deal with the question of the novelty of the supposed invention.

LORD DEAS.—In December 1866 the complainers obtained letters patent for “improvements in preserving animal substances,” subject to the usual conditions that they should particularly describe and ascertain the nature of their invention and in what manner the same was to be performed, and cause the same to be filed in the Great Seal Patent Office within six months after the date of the patent.

Under the terms of their completed specification, lodged within the specified period, the complainers maintain that they have a good patent for the application of what is therein called solution No. 1, to preserve meat, &c., in a fresh state. If this be so, the respondents admit that they have infringed the patent by using that solution for the purpose referred to. On the other hand, the complainer does not allege that the respondents have used any of the other solutions mentioned in the completed specification and said to be protected by the patent; so that the only question before us for decision really is, whether there is a good patent for the use of the solution No. 1 for the specified purpose—that is, for preserving animal substances, such as butcher-meat, poultry, &c., and fish, in a fresh state for a long time, so that the same shall not be distinguishable from butcher-meat, poultry, &c., newly killed.

The two great leading features of a patent or the subject of a patent are utility and novelty.

The utility of the complainer's invention is admitted on all hands. It is because of its utility that the Butcher Trade Association of Glasgow, through the Messrs Robertson, defend the action, in order that they may enjoy the benefit of that utility without paying for a license to use the invention. Mr. Robertson, the principal partner of the respondents' firm, deposes that he began to use the solution No. 1 shortly after its introduction into Glasgow by the complainer's agent, Mr M'Tear, which was in the same year in which the patent was taken out. “We have used it,” he says, “more or less ever since, the quantity used depending on the season of the year. We use it more largely during the hot weather of summer than during winter.” He says they got the solution at first from Mr M'Tear, but afterwards from the Apothecaries' Company, where it came to be sold quite publicly to the trade. He admits it is convenient to his firm in their trade, and on re-examination he says, “I believe the trade use this bisulphite of lime very largely. I suppose it is used in every shop in town.”

The evidence of Mr Robertson is confirmed by that of Mr Laidlaw, the principal assistant to the Glasgow Apothecaries' Company. He deposes that the Messrs Robertson “have been customers of the company for at least twelve months. They got various things from us—among others the bisulphite of lime or solution of sulphite of lime. I believe they began to get it from us.”

1873. The constituent elements of that solution are sulphurous acid, No. 88.

and water. The symbol of it is $\text{Ca O}, 2 \text{ S O}_2$." Mr Laidlaw then as to the question whether it is or is not a chemical compound; but as that admitted in the argument to be of no moment I need not quote what he or say on that point. Mr Laidlaw goes on to say that the solution, in the in which it was sold to the Messrs Robertson, has been "among the com-articles of sale for a number of years, but I cannot say the exact number.
 principal customers for it are the butchers. The brewers use it also, but do not buy it very much from us. I believe the butchers we sell it to use the preservation of animal food. We make no secret of selling it, but we quite openly. We sell it occasionally under the title of bisulphite of but very often under other names. It is asked for as 'Parlez vous,'
 'une Rachel,' 'Jerry,' 'Lime-juice,' 'The Doctor,' and various other names.
 large 2s. 6d. per gallon for it. So far as I am aware we have never any of it from Mr M'Tear. His price is 3s. 6d. per gallon."

Feb. 23, 1877.
 Bailey v.
 Robertson.

Other names besides "bisulphite of lime" are obviously used to avoid the challenge by the patentees; and, on the other hand, the higher price paid by Mr M'Tear seems to have been intended in lieu of license duty; either of these facts are material to the present issue.

Mr Laidlaw afterwards says—"Since the butchers began to use it our sale of has been very large. I could not say what the amount of our sale of it has During certain seasons it is a very important article of sale. During the season we get through a good deal of it. I believe nearly every butcher now uses it. We had a great many of them who were constant customers and I believe they regard it as an article of great utility to them. We sell so much of it now. I believe the falling off of our sales is due to say,—many of the butchers having stopped using it in consequence."

We have also evidence of the practical utility of the solution, for the purpose of, from other witnesses on both sides, including the men of skill. It is necessary, therefore, to say more upon that point. The utility is palpable.
 As to its novelty, I am of opinion that that also is established. Of prior use of the solution for the purpose of preserving animal food of any in a fresh state we have no trace whatever. Certainly nothing of the kind suggested itself to the respondents or to the butcher trade of Glasgow.

Mr Robertson candidly says—"I had never heard before of bisulphite of lime being used for the preservation of meat until Mr M'Tear brought it to me with Mr Bell's certificate. It was a novelty to me. We had used nothing at all for the preservation of fresh meat. For salt beef we had proceeded in the ordinary way, of making a pickle by salt, saltpetre, and sometimes sugar.
 These were the only antiseptics that I knew to be applied, and they were only used when we intended to have beef cured or salted. The notion of having a solution that would preserve meat in a fresh state was something new in the knowledge of the trade, so far as I knew; and I am not aware that anything had been found better adapted for that purpose than the use of this bisulphite of lime. I am not aware of anything that would produce the same results."

As to the state of practical knowledge on the part either of the sellers or consumers of animal food in other parts of the kingdom had been different from what has thus proved to have been in Glasgow there can be no doubt that I should have had evidence to that effect. In the absence of any such evidence we must conclude that there was no such difference.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

The evidence of Dr Wallace as a skilled witness (as well as that of Mr Ogilby who was held as concurring with him in omnibus), goes distinctly in the same direction. He says—"The result produced by the application of bisulphite of lime to meat is a specifically different result from what sulphurous acid produces when applied to meat, or saltpetre, or any other antiseptics. It resembles the effect of sulphurous acid, but there is this difference, that sulphurous acid has nothing to fix it, whereas the bisulphite of lime has the lime to fix the sulphurous acid, so that its action may be continued for a longer time, and is gradually given out as the beef requires it. The effect produced upon the meat is also different from what sulphite of soda or potash produces. I do not know that the effect itself is so very much different, but I regard the sulphites of the alkalies as not being applicable to this purpose, because they would communicate a distinct taste to the meat. They would therefore produce a different result from what the bisulphite of lime produces, and it is also a different result from what the chloride of sodium or nitrate of sodium, or nitrate of potash or saltpetre, or any other antiseptic, that I know of, produces. Therefore this invention is an invention for the purpose of producing an effect specifically different from that of any other known antiseptic. I consider that the result which it obtains is a better result than any obtained before. I think that the fact that this is the only patent that has ever come practically into use is sufficient to shew that it is the only chemical antiseptic that has ever been a practical success; and it was a new contrivance for preserving meat at the time when it was introduced."

But it is upon certain prior patents, or what appears on the face of some of them, that the respondents rest their objection to the want of novelty in the complainer's patent, and it is said that, although none of these patents are valid for the purpose in question, there may be enough disclosed on the face of one or more of them to exclude the complainers from claiming novelty for their invention. Now, without denying the possibility of this being so in some cases, I am unable to see that it is the case here. The Sheriff-substitute gives detailed reasons for his opinion that none of the patents referred to can be held either as making such a disclosure or to be anticipations of the complainer's patent, and these reasons I substantially agree. The Sheriff differs only as to Rattray's patent, and it was upon that patent only that the argument at the bar as to the novelty was seriously rested. I am not, however, convinced by that argument.

Rattray's patent was obtained on 8th July 1861, for "improvements in preserving organic substances."

His completed specification bears that his invention consists of two parts. First, of a mode of preserving animal and vegetable matters by impregnating them with an aqueous solution of sulphurous acid, the effect of which is to preserve them from decay for a considerable period. Secondly, of the use of alkaline and earthy sulphites in packing these preserved animal and vegetable matters in vessels or cases.

He then gives a long description of the mode in which he uses the invention, sometimes four solutions of sulphurous acid of different strengths in succession upon the material to be preserved in a water-tight curing vessel. When the material has been covered by the solution No. 1 the vessel is to be covered and kept undisturbed for from three to five hours, more or less, at the lapse of which time the liquid is to be allowed to drain off for from three to four hours. Then solution No. 2 is then to be run into the curing vessel and left to act undisturbed.

from three to five hours, after which it is to be allowed to drain off as for-y for from three to four hours more. The solution No. 3 is then to be run ad left undisturbed for from three to five hours, at the lapse of which time to be allowed to drain off for three or four hours like the others, making a s of steeping and draining processes occupying altogether from 18 to 27 hours.
effect of the three solutions thus employed, Mr Rattray says, generally is, the substances submitted to the treatment are found to retain a somewhat gent smell of the acid, and to be in appearance somewhat plump and swelled ; it is this pungent smell and swelled appearance which alone are said to ine that the treatment has been sufficient to secure their preservation, so that, se characteristics are not sufficiently developed, the solution No. 4 must be ed, but for a shorter period. The above, it is added, concludes the first of the patentee's invention, and the substances are then ready for the second of the invention, which he then goes on to describe as consisting of two s—the dry mode, by which the pieces are packed in casks or cases in dry er ; and the liquid mode, by which they are packed in cases as securely ght as possible. It is only when Mr Rattray comes to these two modes of ing the second part of his invention that he mentions sulphite of lime at He says that when he gets the length of packing he adopts either what he the dry mode or the liquid mode of applying sulphite of lime. According dry mode, he envelopes each piece of the material in a cover of linen or a cloth, “such cloth having been previously steeped in a concentrated solu-of sulphite of lime or of sulphite of alumina, in sulphurous acid, and dried, interstices between the packages being filled up with the alkaline or earthy ites reduced to dry powder in the manner previously described. According liquid mode, he says the substances, after being dipped into the same on as in the dry mode, are packed without being dried, and upon the cases filled, the interstices are filled up with a solution in sulphurous acid of the sulphites previously named of strength measuring about 2° on Twaddell's meter. In either case, he adds, it will be necessary to have the packing as securely air and water tight as possible.

w, the merit, and the whole merit of the present complainer's patent, so far have now to deal with it, consists in this,—that his solution No. 1 of hite of lime may be practically used for preserving meat, &c., in a fresh for a long time, so that it cannot be distinguished from meat, &c., recently . That this is a valuable use of the bisulphite of lime there can be no
, and of this use we do not find the slightest idea or trace in Rattray's cation. He does not propose to use the bisulphite of lime at all till by ed applications of sulphurous acid, and repeated drainings of that acid from eat, he has succeeded in causing the meat “to retain a somewhat pungent of the acid, and to be in appearance somewhat plump and swelled,”—that ay, he does not suggest the use of bisulphite of lime at all till the meat come different in smell and appearance from fresh meat, so that it never ain have either the actual freshness or the appearance of recently killed

It would be very unreasonable, I think, if Rattray's proposal to use hite of lime to keep the meat in the state into which he had thus brought uld exclude the complainers from the benefit of their discovery that bisulof lime may be practically used for keeping meat ab initio in the same state in which it was when killed. By Mr Rattray's method, as Dr Walbeerves, “there are sixteen hours at least of alternate steepings in sulphur-

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.

Robertson.

ous acid ; these would go to exhaust the natural juices of the meat. Then it would be a great amount of handlings of the beef by steeping it, drying it, steeping it, and so on, and that handling would be injurious. Then there is time occupied and the labour,—all causing expense. In the sulphurous process recommended by Rattray the appearance of the beef is said to be altered it becomes plump and swelled. That indicates a change having taken place in the substance of the beef, which must necessarily be injurious." It is not surprising that in these circumstances Dr Wallace should say—"I should think a man in his senses, no butcher for instance, would ever think of applying the process as a whole to the preservation of meat." Accordingly it does not appear that Mr Rattray's method has ever been a practical success to any extent ever.

Sulphurous acid was, of course, all along known as an antiseptic, and a pound of sulphurous acid with lime in solution, now called the bisulphite of lime, was, I doubt not, also known. But the adaptation of known substances to a new purpose may be quite legitimately made the subject of a patent. The discovery that they may be practically used in combination for a useful purpose may, in like manner, be legitimately made the subject of a patent. The patentees found that a solution of bisulphite of lime, which is a compound of sulphurous acid with lime, might be practically used for preserving meat in a fresh state. That was the merit of their invention, whether it be called a discovery of a use of the compound or an important improvement on the method formerly known. The sulphurous acid would not have succeeded by itself, because, as Dr Wallace observes, "the sulphurous acid has nothing to do with the lime, whereas the bisulphite has the lime to fix the sulphurous acid, so that its action may be continued for a longer time, and it is gradually given out as the meat requires it."

I cannot think, therefore, that the novelty claimed for the complainant's invention is excluded by the curing processes described in Rattray's specification. Both parts of his invention were really curing processes, whether taken separately or together. The meat may have been cured by the sulphurous acid and the first part of the invention with less change upon it than when cured by saltpetre, but it was certainly not thereby preserved or proposed to be preserved in a fresh state. The second part of the invention does not seem to have been intended to be used without the first ; but supposing it to have been so used, it is not suggested that the meat would thereby be effectually preserved without being at once packed in casks or cases "as securely air and water tight as possible."

In short, neither by the first part of Rattray's invention taken by itself, nor by the second part of that invention taken by itself, nor by both parts taken together was it either proposed or suggested that by the application of bisulphite of lime to animal substances such as meat, poultry, game, &c. might be preserved in a fresh state for a long or considerable time, so that they could not be distinguished when cooked from what had been recently killed. Accordingly it never occurred to any of the butcher trade that such a result could be effected or had been contemplated by Rattray's patent, published in July 1861 ; and, on the contrary, the whole trade was taken by surprise by the discovery revealed by the complainant's patent published in December 1866. Bisulphite of lime was not known before the days either of Rattray or the complainant. If Rattray's patent was otherwise good, he may be entitled to monopolise the use of sulphite of lime to produce the result which it was his object to produce. But that will not complainers' patent from being good for the use of the same sulphite of lime No. 88.

 to produce the practically useful and very different result which it was the patentees' Feb. 23, 1877.
 object to produce. They were the inventors of that application to the purpose Bailey v.
 that effect. To use a known substance to produce a particular effect which is Robertson.
 of great practical utility, and which has not been produced before, is undoubtedly a proper subject for a patent. Atmospheric air, for instance, is the same substance whether cold or hot, but the discovery that heated air produced upon a heating furnace an important and useful effect not known before became the subject of one of the most valuable patents known. The heated air was not patented, but the application of it for that particular purpose was. So here the sulphite of lime is not patented by the complainers, but the application of it for the particular purpose of preserving meat for a long time in a perfectly fresh state is so. The principle of contract between the patentee and the public, on which all patents are held to proceed, is here most justly applicable. Assuming,
 I am doing in the meantime, that there are no fatal objections of a formal or technical nature to the working of either of the complainers' specifications, the complainers have discovered and communicated to the public a fact of great practical utility,—viz., that by the application of a certain known agent—viz., sulphite of lime—to such animal substances of meat, poultry, &c., the meat, may be preserved for a long time in the same fresh state as when newly killed; and it is only fair and reasonable, therefore, that in the use of his invention, the petitioner's protection should correspond to the benefit he has conferred on the public.

But two objections, of a different class, are made to the complainers' final or completed specification. It is said, 1st, that it does not sufficiently disclose the nature of the invention; and 2d, that it does not at all disclose the manner of using that invention.

I am not satisfied that either of these objections is well founded.

It must be recollected that, although skilled assistance is frequently taken in drawing a specification, the specification is nevertheless to be regarded as the work of the patentee himself, and as addressed to persons of ordinary or average skill. A fair and reasonable construction is therefore to be given to it.
 It is not required to be artistically divided into heads;—one dealing with the nature of the invention, and the other with the manner of using the invention.
 These two may be mixed up together, and yet the meaning may be clear enough.
 The manner of using the invention may sometimes throw light on the nature of the invention; and the nature of the invention may sometimes throw so much upon the manner of using it as to render very little, if anything, necessary to be added on that subject.

Limiting myself to the claim for solution No. 1, as being the only claim now in dispute, I find what is said about it in the completed specification to be this:
 "The nature of our invention is to preserve animal substances, such as meat, poultry, game, fish, and other animal substances, for a long time, and so that the same substances when so preserved, and although the animals from which the same are derived have been killed for a considerable time, cannot be distinguished when cooked, from the like substances derived from similar animals which have been recently killed." (The preservation of hides may at present be added). "The manner in which our said invention is performed is as follows:
 We employ a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 1, being a solution of bisulphite of lime, usually expressed by the formula $\text{Ca O}, 2 \text{ S O}_2$,

No. 88. in water of about the specific gravity of 1050, which specific gravity we find preferable to that of 1070. We sometimes form a solution, hereinafter distinguished as solution No. 2, by dissolving the ordinary commercial gelatine in boiling water, using from one to two parts of gelatine in ten parts of solution No. 1." The specification then goes on to mention solutions Nos. 3 and 4, which are used for different purposes; but as we are here dealing only with solution No. 1 these need not be quoted.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

At the end of the specification the patentees say—"What we consider to be novel and improvements, and therefore claim as the invention secured to us by the said in part recited letters-patent are—firstly, the use of the solution No. 1 for preserving animal substances"—(2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th, I need not quote). "But we do not claim the employment of gelatine or salt, nor of the process of cleansing or injection, nor of air-tight vessels, except in connection with the use of the solution No. 1, and for the purposes of preserving animal substances, nor do we claim the use of solution No. 1 except for the purpose of preserving animal substances."

Now, taking all this in connection with the title of the letters-patent "for improvements in preserving animal substances," I confess I do not see any insufficiency in the description of the nature of the invention, or, in other words, of the discovery or improvement, which had been patented. On the contrary, I think it is clear enough to what class of "manufactures," to use the comprehensive word in the old statute, or of "inventions," to use the equally comprehensive word in the modern statute, the invention in question belongs, and to what class of inventions it does not belong; and this, I think, was what was intended by requiring the "nature" of the invention to be stated in the provisional or completed specifications. When it is stated in the title that the patent is "for improvements in preserving animal substances," and in the body of the specification that the patentees' discovery or invention is, by the use of bisulphite of lime, meat, &c., may be preserved, for a long time as fresh as when newly killed, the nature of the discovery or invention is distinguished from other discoveries or inventions, or from other classes of discoveries or inventions, is at once disclosed, and I know no plainer way in which the nature of the discovery or invention could well be described so as to conform to the object of the statute and relative regulations on this particular head.

The objection that the complainers' completed specification does not describe the manner, or any one manner, of using the invention, appears at first sight more formidable. But, on the whole, I think it is an objection more in form than in substance, and too critical to be sustained. The object of requiring the manner of using the invention to be specified, of course, is that persons of ordinary or tolerable skill may be enabled to use it. But how much or how little must be said for that purpose depends on the nature of the invention on the one hand, and the prevailing knowledge of the subject on the other. Accordingly, in the complainers' specification, when they come to deal with their solutions, which were to be used for a variety of curative purposes, they give more ample directions as to the manner of using or employing them, because these somewhat complicated processes, full directions might naturally be required, at least expected, to be given. The use of solution No. 1 is substantially described for the purpose of preserving animal substances for a long time in a fresh state, and for that purpose only. The solution is stated to be a solution of bisulphite of lime, usually expressed by the formula $\text{Ca O}, 2 \text{ S O}_2$, which is proved to in and recognised formula in the Apothecaries' Hall, Glasgow, so that any man can have the solution by asking for it. The strength of the solution, more is stated. It is to be in water of the specific gravity of 1050, which the complainers say they find preferable to 1070, thus explaining the preparation of the solution independently of the formula. The complainers do not say in so many words that they then put the solution on the meat, but they say that they use it to preserve the meat fresh, which in substance is the same thing. By saying to the butcher trade to employ it for this purpose they really tell them to put it on the meat. To say more than this was quite unnecessary, for the whole butcher trade knew at once how to put it on. To have told them to put it on in any other way would have been misleading, for it requires to be used in a different way, and this the butcher trade, being accustomed to the use of antiseptics (as indeed all housekeepers are) perfectly understood.

Accordingly, the respondent, Mr John Robertson, who represents the complainers after mentioning that in summer time his firm use about a gallon a week of the liquid, says—"For a batch of collops, 10 lbs., we use a wineglassful" (that is, using it to be perfectly wholesome, they simply pour it among the collops). When we apply it to joints we simply brush it over," and, he adds in a passage already quoted, that the trade use it very largely. "I suppose it is used in nearly every shop in town."

It has been objected that there is in the specification, no direction such as is relative to solutions Nos. 3 and 4 for removing the substance used from the meat before the meat is cooked. But the silence on this subject in the one and the direction given in the other, of themselves sufficiently indicate that removal of the substance was required in the one case as it was in the other; and it is obvious Mr Robertson and the trade perfectly understood.

It is important to observe that Mr Robertson, although an adverse party, does not suggest that either he or any one of his numerous constituents, consisting of the associated butcher trade of Glasgow, either required or received any direction to apply the bisulphite of lime in the manner in which he says he and they apply it, beyond what they found in the complainers' specification. The respondent says in his note that the simplicity of the process is negatived by the statement mentioned by Mr M'Tear that he issued cards for instructing the butcher trade as to the way to use the solution. That is not, however, a correct version of the facts.

Mr M'Tear's evidence about the cards, one of which, he says, "I now produce," meaning obviously "one of which I now exhibit," for I find there is no card produced in process, and never was. The words attributed to Mr M'Tear are not very grammatical, but his object, I think, in referring to the cards was to shew that the public were made aware that what the complainers were doing was "the bisulphite of lime alone," and that whoever used it in the manner described in the cards without purchasing it from the respondents or obtaining their authority so to use it, would be liable in the eyes of law. If the respondents had understood Mr M'Tear to mean that the cards were issued the trade did not know how to use the solution. No respondent would of course at once have required the card to be put into the meat, and would have led or attempted to lead evidence to shew the date at which the cards were issued, and that prior to that date the manner of using the solution had not been understood, so that it was to the cards and not to the respondents that the knowledge and the practice were to be attributed. In this the respondents have left us in the position of not being judicially

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.

Robertson.

No. 88. entitled even to see the card, far less to allow conjectures about it and circumstances connected with it to weigh as evidence in the case.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

It is indeed plain enough to me that the respondents, Messrs Robertson and their constituents, never meant to dispute the fact that the terms of the specification had enabled them to know how to use the solution No. 1. It is impossible otherwise to account for the absence from the record of any averment to the contrary, and of any plea in law raising an objection that in this respect the specification was defective. Their 3d statement of facts goes strongly the other way. It is in these terms:—"The respondents have all along applied and applied the bisulphite of lime to their meat in the pure and simple condition in which they receive it from the sellers. They never mixed it with water or with any materials such as gelatine or salt, but they simply apply to the meat the article known as bisulphite of lime, without any admixture whatever." Their 4th statement, without at the same time saying or suggesting that any difficulty had ever been felt as to how "bisulphite of lime, without any admixture whatever," should be applied to the meat, seems to me to be equivalent to a judicial admission that no such difficulty had been felt, and this is quite in accordance with Mr Robertson's evidence.

The state of the record on this subject is all the more important from the fact that the case having been closed, as the proof itself was, with great deliberation. The action was raised in November 1874, and the record was closed in the end of December of the same year. But in October 1875 the respondents got the record open, and made various additions by way of amendments admitted into it, after which it was again closed and the case allowed to be adjudicated upon without any averment, plea in law, or proof being proposed to raise an objection to the specification as not disclosing the manner in which the "bisulphite of lime, without any admixture whatever," was to be used.

Now, I do not say that this excludes the respondents from now pleading that there is in this respect a technical objection to the specification which invalidates the patent. But I do say that in dealing with that objection we must deal on the footing that in point of fact the terms of the specification enabled the respondents, Messrs Robertson, and the whole butcher trade of Glasgow, to know how to use the solution No. 1, and that they did forthwith use it with effect and accordingly. This result seems to me to demonstrate that there has been no omission to give to the workmen who would naturally be employed the instructions which were necessary to enable them to carry out the discovery or, in other words, "the invention"), and this being so, there is, I apprehend, no omission which can void the patent.

Much, as I have already said, must always depend upon the nature of the invention as well as upon the knowledge of those who are to use it. In Re Hancock (6 De G., M. and G. 391) Lord Cranworth laid it down that a discovery that the mixture of two or more simple substances in certain definite proportions would form a compound substance valuable for medical qualities, was a good subject-matter for a patent. Assuming his Lordship to be right in that respect, and the patent to be for a pill for curing a specified disease, I doubt whether, in describing the proportions to be put into the pill it would be necessary to say "then swallow the pill."

There remains, however, the objection of alleged discrepancy between the provisional and completed specifications; or, to put it in its more familiar shape, that the complainers' completed specification goes beyond and claims n was claimed either in the title or in the body of the provisional specifica- No. 88.

of this means that the completed specification claims the bisulphite of lime for other purposes beside the preservation of animal substances, while the title of the specification is limited to improvements in preserving animal substances, the answer obviously is, that construing the words of the completed specification, it is clear enough that the bisulphite of lime is claimed for improvements in preserving in a fresh state animal substances only.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

rather suppose, however, that the objection taken upon the ground of discrepancy between the provisional and final specifications was meant to be based upon the omission in the completed specification of what is said in the provisional specification of the use to be made of the ordinary commercial gelatine as applicable to solution No. 1.

Now, it is quite true that in the provisional specification it was proposed in general terms to mix the solution to be employed of bisulphite of lime with a solution of the ordinary commercial gelatine dissolved in hot water, and that no solution is there made of a solution of bisulphite of lime without the gelatine. The provisional specification did not fall to be published. It remained a document in the hands of the law officer for his information merely of the nature of the invention, which is all that the statute and relative rules and regulations require to be described in the provisional specification, that is to say, the category to which the invention belonged, and which was thus distinguished from the numerous other categories of inventions for which letters-patent might be granted, and to which other categories it did not belong. The schedule of a provisional specification appended to the Act 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, is, accordingly, limited to an insertion of the title and a description of the nature of the invention. The complainers' provisional specification thus contained much that was superfluous; but superfluous matter, even in a complete specification, will render that specification bad if it does not mislead the public. Still less superfluous matter void a provisional specification, which is not for the information of the public, but of the law officer only, who, if he think the title of the specification vague or insufficient, may allow or require that title to be amended. The complainers had the usual period of six months to make experiments with a view to perfecting their invention and preparing their full and complete specification to obtain the benefit of these improvements, and the result seems to have satisfied them that where the object simply was to keep meat, &c., in a fresh state, as contradistinguished from certain curing processes, the gelatine, as only for coating, was unnecessary, as the bisulphite of lime was found sufficient of itself, as Dr Wallace explains in his evidence, to fix the sulphuric acid, which was quite well known to be the only antiseptic.

Now the question is—were the complainers entitled in their complete specification to omit the ordinary commercial article called gelatine, as being unnecessary in the course of their six months' experiments, not to be required in the preparation of their solutions, namely, No. 1, while they found it useful to retain the coating qualities in their weaker solutions, Nos. 3, 4, and 5? I am inclined to answer that question in the affirmative.

It is said about gelatine in the provisional specification had been omitted in the completed specification, the complainers might have eliminated it by disclaimer. But there was no room for a disclaimer as applicable to a provisional specification. The only course open to the complainers was to leave the

No. 88.
 Feb. 23, 1877.
 Bailey v.
 Roberton.

gelatine out in the completed specification so far as applicable to solution No. 1 and that was what they did. It was a matter of indifference as to the practical result whether the gelatine was kept in or left out, for the gelatine neither did good nor harm in the use of solution No. 1. But, at the same time, it was proper to omit the superfluity, and I cannot see how its omission can be said to have extended the title of either of the specifications, or to have changed the substance of the patent from what it would otherwise have been. As I construe the patent so far as now in dispute, it does not prevent Rattray, or any other patentee, from using bisulphite of lime except for the purpose of preserving meat, &c., in the same fresh state in which it was when killed. As regards that purpose, the invention, when presented to the public for the first time, was presented in the shape in which it now stands in the completed specification. The public perfectly understood the nature of the solution No. 1, as well as the purpose for which it was to be applied, and the manner of using it, and accordingly they proceeded successfully to use it. I know no case in which such a variance between the terms of the provisional and completed specifications has been held to void an otherwise good patent; and, in the absence of any precedent, I am not for so deciding the point.

If the patent be good, the infringement, as I have said, is undoubted, and as regards the use of the solution No. 1 for preserving meat for a long time in the same fresh state in which it was when killed, and to that extent I am of opinion that the prayer of the inferior Court petition ought to have been granted.

LORD MURE.—It seems to be admitted in this case, and I think it is just, that the only thing done by the respondents which can be said to be in violation of these letters-patent, is that they have used bisulphite of lime, viz., the solution No. 1, for the preservation of meat. I do not think it is just that they have used any of the other solutions. The only question, then, which we have to dispose of is, whether the petitioner is entitled to stop their use in respect of the patent founded on by him? His right to do so can only arise in the event of his shewing that he has a valid patent for the use of bisulphite of lime alone, or in any manner of way. Now, the petitioner maintains that he has such a patent; and his specification no doubt does so, but he professes to claim the use of bisulphite of lime alone for the preservation of meat. This, I think, is clear from the passages in the specification which have been referred to, and more especially from the statement of the claim itself, in which the patentees claim expressly "the use of solution No. 1 for preserving substances."

That being the case, the question is, Has the petitioner validly and effectually established a right to this claim by his patent? I agree with your Lordships, the chair, and with the Sheriff, in holding that he has not. I do not wish to detain your Lordships by going over the details of the provisional and complete specification, which have been fully explained by your Lordships, and with whose exposition of the meaning and import of these documents I entirely concur. Upon this branch of the case, therefore, I shall simply say that while I think that the patentees have distinctly claimed the use of bisulphite of lime itself, they have nowhere described the manner in which that ingredient is to be used or performed; and that I am also of opinion that the patent is bad, in respect that the complete specification, as regards the first claim—the use of bisulphite of lime by itself—is in essential respect defective.

the provisional specification. The provisional specification is for a particular mode of using bisulphite of lime mixed with certain other things; but it makes no claim, as I read it, to the use of bisulphite of lime by itself; and as your ship has so fully gone into the question of the disconformity between the provisional and complete specifications, and into the question whether there is any manner of using the bisulphite described in the complete specification, I think only to add that I adopt your Lordship's views upon both these points, and think that in both respects the patent before us is open to objection.

As to the third point, viz., the question of novelty and prior use, I agree with your Lordship that it may not be necessary, having regard to the judgment proposed to be pronounced on the first two points, to deal with this question. But I think it right to say that, if it were necessary, I am prepared to agree in the result which has been arrived at by the Sheriff. There is not much evidence of the use of bisulphite of lime prior to 1866; but that may be explained and accounted for by the fact that it has been made matter of distinct admission, and minute lodged during the proof, that between the 21st June 1861 and the date of the petitioner's specification, 27th June 1866, solutions of bisulphite of lime were publicly used for the preservation of animal substances by William Rattray, chemist, Aberdeen, in the manner described in Rattray's specification. Now, Rattray's specification consists of two things—(1) of a mode of preserving animal and vegetable matters by impregnating them with an aqueous solution of sulphurous acid, and (2) of the use of alkaline and earthy sulphites for preserving animal and vegetable matters in cases. In speaking of the first mode—the first, I think, does not apply—he says it relates to the preservation of animal and vegetable matters in vessels or cases, and is more particularly applicable to the preservation of materials operated upon according to the first part of his invention. But he does not restrict the application to materials that have been operated upon according to the first part of his invention. He says it is more particularly applicable to them; but he claims the use of bisulphite of lime for the preservation of materials operated upon in other ways, and he has explained in the first part of his specification; and then when he states his claim he says,—“(2) The preserving of animal and vegetable substances by means of alkaline and earthy sulphites when packed in vessels or cases, as above described.” That may be held to be a restriction of the claim to things packed in vessels or cases; but it cannot, I think, be held to be a restriction of it to materials operated upon in terms of the first part of the specification. For he appears to me to claim distinctly the preservation of all animal and vegetable substances by means of alkaline and earthy sulphites. Being so, it rather occurs to me that if the petitioner's patent be, as he claims, one for all or any modes of using bisulphite of lime for preserving animal substances, and if it had been dated in 1860 instead of 1866, Rattray's patent would have been held to be an infringement of the petitioner's patent inasmuch as it claims the use of bisulphite of lime for the preservation of animal substances packed in cases; and if that be so, then the use of bisulphite of lime for the preservation of animal substances was disclosed, and it is admitted that it was used in the way claimed by Rattray. Therefore the broad claim, in which the petitioner puts it, is not a novelty, because a particular mode of using bisulphite was made known to the public, and, according to the law, was used prior to the date of the petitioner's specification.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.

Robertson.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.
Bailey v.
Robertson.

LORD SHAND.—It is not without regret that I concur in holding that judgment must be pronounced against the patentee in this case, for I think proved that the subject of the patent is one of great public utility, and the claim had been somewhat less sweeping, so as not to have covered the invention which is described in Rattray's specification, it would have been a most novel. But unfortunately, as has frequently occurred in similar cases, the patentee has so framed his provisional and final specifications as to leave letters-patent open to objections which are fatal to his case.

The objections which have been urged at the bar are three—(1) That the final specification describes an invention essentially different from that for which the letters-patent were given as that invention was described in the provisional specification; (2) that the patentee has failed to comply with the conditions of the letters-patent, because he has not described in the final specification in the manner in which the invention is to be performed; and (3) that the invention is in the very wide terms of the claim as made in the final specification, is not a novel, but was in prior use. Any one of these objections, if well founded, would be fatal to the letters-patent, and I am of opinion that all of them have been established. I concur generally in the careful and able judgment of the Sheriff, and of the late Mr Dickson. In one point he has fallen into error—I mean where he says that the provisional specification is published in order that all persons interested may have an opportunity of opposing the application for the patent; but, with that exception, it appears to me that the Sheriff's observations on each of the three objections are sound, and that his reasoning is conclusive. While I concur also generally in the observations of your Lordships, I shall consider the different objections, because the case has been treated as one of great importance, and it may be satisfactory to the parties to know the grounds in some detail on which I have come to the opinion I have indicated.

The first objection is that the final specification describes an invention essentially different from that which is described in the provisional specification. The patentee gets his protection for the purpose of experimenting, and his letters-patent only after compliance with that provision of the statute which requires the deposit of a provisional specification which shall describe the nature of the invention; and the letters-patent for the invention as so described and as contained in the subject to the proviso which they contain, that the patentee shall by his final specification describe not only the nature of "the said invention"—that is, the invention for which the letters-patent have been got, as described in the provisional specification—but also in what manner the invention is to be performed. The effect of the statutory provision and the letters-patent is to make the letters-patent valid, only if there be identity of invention as that invention is described in the two specifications. In short, the invention described in the final specification must be that for which the provisional protection was granted, and for which the letters-patent were issued.

Before considering whether that be so in the present case I shall make some observations. In the first place, I think that the question whether the invention as described in these different specifications is identical is to be answered simply by a comparison of the one specification with the other; and I do not think the construction of those instruments as defining the nature of the invention is entirely for the Court, with the aid no doubt of evidence, if necessary, to explain the state of public knowledge, and any technical or peculiar terms which may be found in the specifications. It is of importance to see er point, because in the argument on behalf of the patentee it seemed to be assumed to some extent that the interpretation of the instruments given by the professional witnesses must guide the Court. With that I do not agree.

No. 88.

Feb. 23, 1877.

Bailey v.

Robertson.

In the question of construction I am of opinion that the invention described in the final specification is different from that which had been described in the provisional specification—and so it is not “the said invention,” in the language of the letters-patent, for which the letters-patent were granted. This involves a comparison of the two specifications and the legal interpretation which they bear. Giving, as I desire to do, the most favourable construction for the patentee, the provisional specification appears to me to describe an invention for the use of a compound agent or combination. It is an invention for the preservation of animal substances, but in preserving animal substances the agent which the patentee says must be used in order to bring about the desired result is one consisting of two different substances, the one gelatine and the other bisulphite of lime. But in the final specification, taking the construction which the patentee himself puts upon it, while the patent is for the same object, the agent is a single agent, for there the agent is not one composed of two distinct substances, but a single agent of bisulphite of lime. I do not think it necessary to go into the provisional specification in detail; but passing from the description of the object of the invention, which is correctly enough given, I find that when the patentee comes to describe the nature of his invention his explanation is that a certain quantity of commercial gelatine in boiling water is the first substance used; with that there is combined a certain quantity of bisulphite of lime of a defined specific gravity; and these two substances being mixed form together the one agent which is described as producing the result. It has been stated that the solution of gelatine is a mere medium in the invention; but the question on the construction of this patent whether the patentee has so intended, and I am of opinion that any one reading this specification according to its ordinary construction must be of opinion that the patentee considered the one substance, gelatine, just as necessary as the other substance, bisulphite of lime, in order to bring about the desired result. Gelatine is not presented as a mere medium (bisulphite of lime is itself a solution, and is a medium so far), but it is stated as having two qualities which, I think, in the mind of the patentee were essential—an adhesive and a solidifying quality; and, as I read the invention there described, I take it to come to this, that with that adhesive and solidifying liquid, combined with the antiseptic liquid, a certain result can be effected; and I see nothing to indicate that the patentee had even an idea that the result could be produced by one of those things alone. Let me suppose that the patentee had been examined as a witness in the course of the proof, and that he had admitted what must, I think, be assumed in this argument, that at the time when he lodged this provisional specification he was in ignorance that bisulphite of lime alone could bring about the desired result,—that he was of opinion that it was absolutely necessary in order to effect the result that bisulphite of lime should be combined with a substance which had an adhesive and solidifying quality, and having found a substance which would have that effect he described the joint agent, which, according to his invention, would produce the desired result, but that after six months he made the discovery that it was unnecessary to combine two agents, and that one would be enough to produce the result,—in that case I am of opinion that that would be not only a discovery of a new invention, for which a third party, if he had discovered it, could have

No. 88. obtained a patent. I do not think that anything so vital could be covered by saying that it was a mere change in the manner of using the invention as the pursuer had originally described it. It is true that provisional protection is given in order to enable a patentee to make experiments and improvements in the manner of using his invention. If the discovery had been made that whereas the patentee formerly thought a solution should be used hot, and now found it could be used cold, or if some slight modification of the original agent had been introduced, such as that the solution might be mixed in somewhat different proportions, I think such variations might be fairly covered by the final specification. But when you have any change so vital as it appears to me you have here, I regard it as a new invention, which would require a new provisional specification and a different patent. I concur in the observation made by your Lordships that the final specification is really a claim for a larger and wider discovery, essentially different from that which formed the subject of the provisional specification.

The next point maintained against the patent is, that the final specification fails to comply with the proviso in the letters-patent requiring that the manner of use shall be described. I am of opinion that that objection also is unfounded. Reading the final specification in the most favourable way for the patentee, and taking it that he has given distinctly the object of his invention and that he has described the nature of it, the next question is, has he described the manner of use? Now, he himself claims under this specification what he thought was not indicated in the previous one—the use of bisulphite of lime alone—but I have found no directions whatever given as to how this agent is to be used. The single word in that part of the specification said to describe the manner of use is the word “employ.” In order to make up for that, which is obviously a want in the patent, it appears from the evidence of Mr M’Tear, A. & W. M’Tear, agents in Glasgow for the patentee, in the course of his examination as a witness for the patentee—“We issued cards describing the manner of using it, one of which I now produce; and it was for the use of bisulphite of lime alone.” Now, it is a very remarkable circumstance, that in order even to enable the trade to know how to use bisulphite of lime alone, the patentee has found it necessary to issue special directions. Lord Deas has made the observation, according to Robertson’s evidence his firm found no difficulty in applying it. His Lordship has failed to notice the evidence I have now referred to, showing that cards of printed instructions were issued to the trade. I am not sure that Robertson should say he had no difficulty, for he had been using bisulphite of lime for a considerable time, having bought it from M’Tear, and therefore he had the benefit of cards issued by M’Tear with special instructions how to use it. The card has not been printed in the proof, but it is stated to be printed by the petitioner’s own witness, and was read by counsel at the bar, and is to the following terms:—“To Preserve Fresh Meat.—Pour out some of the bisulphite of lime into a bowl, and with a clean brush coat all over the meat if very sultry weather, repeat it each day. For Minced Collops or Sausages Put into every 8 pounds or so a wineglassful of the solution, mince all together when they will keep their bright red colour. The saving effected by the use of the above is extraordinary, and it is now used by hundreds of the trade. We can testify to its value. Caution.—Any one found using other than the above will be prosecuted.” What we find thus published is exactly what Robertson admitted, and a knowledge of the manner of use appears to have been thus acquired.

the directions given by the patentee, not where they should be given, in the specification, but in this card. And so I take it that this is a fatal objection. No. 88.
 It is said there may be inventions of such a class that it is not necessary that the patentee should describe the manner of using them. I know of no such inventions. Feb. 23, 1877. Bailey v. Robertson.
 The letters-patent make it a condition of the invention being valid that the manner of use shall be described; and, however simple the manner may be, I think there must be some description. But here I think it was utterly necessary that some description should be given. It was impossible for the trade to know without some assistance whether the agent was to be used by keeping the meat saturated in vessels or casks, or whether it was to be rubbed on, and what quantity was to be rubbed on; whether it was to be kept cold; how often the process was to be repeated, or whether it was to be continued; whether it was to be washed off or left on; and it is a remarkable fact that in the other parts of the specification relating to the other solutions all as in the provisional specification, directions of that kind are given. Therefore, upon this part of the case, I am of opinion that the objection which has been urged is fatal. I may say, with reference to the illustration that has been put in regard to a patent medicine, it would occur to me that a patentee in such a case must not only mention the substances he proposed to use, and the directions of those substances, but must describe some manner of using them.
 I directed that they were to be rolled up into a pill in certain quantities, taken in that way, he has described a manner of use; but even in that case I think that in order to the safety of the public and the validity of the patent an idea must be given of the number of pills to be used and at what intervals the patient is in safety to take them—so in that case it would not be a sufficient instruction to say, “having made up your pill, then swallow it.”
 With regard to the remaining question, whether this patent is objectionable on the ground of prior use, I do not think it necessary to rest the judgment more than your Lordship has done upon that ground, because to my mind the reasons already given are quite sufficient for the disposal of the case. At the same time, as the parties have argued that point, I think it right to say looking to the very wide terms of the claim, the patent appears to me to be objectionable on that ground also. It is admitted in the proof by minute examination of bisulphite of lime was publicly used by William Rattray, chemist, when, in the manner described in his specification. There is no qualification of that admission to the effect that the use of it was not useful; and with that admission I must take it that bisulphite of lime was publicly used with the process which Rattray's patent gives it. I agree with Lord Deas in thinking that Rattray's patent is in many respects essentially different from the present, and I think the patentee here might have had a perfectly good patent if he had framed his specification with a little more caution, because I agree in the view that bisulphite of lime, though publicly used by Rattray in the way there described, was not used as the sole preserving agent, or in the same way that the patentee uses it. In Rattray's patent the use of bisulphite of lime was to preserve animal substances that were already preserved. You must first have the meat treated by various substances till it assumes a special appearance and has a pungent smell, and then the meat in that condition to which bisulphite of lime is to be applied. Having got the meat in that condition, Rattray did use bisulphite of lime, and I use it for the general purpose of preserving animal substances, though they had been subjected to previous treatment. Now, I put the question—the

No. 88. patentee having claimed here the exclusive use of bisulphite of lime for preserving animal substances (he puts his claim in the broadest possible terms) and Rattray thereafter, if this were a good patent, be entitled to go on using bisulphite of lime as he had been doing for preserving animal substances! And it appears to me that if this is a good patent, in the very wide terms in which it is framed, Rattray would be open to the charge of being an infringer. I quite see that if this claim had been a little more guarded—if it had been so guarded as to be a claim limited to the use of bisulphite of lime from the beginning to the end of the process as the sole agent—it would have been a perfectly good patent so far as Rattray's patent is concerned; and even yet a disclaimer might perhaps meet the objection; but having chosen to make the claim so wide as to strike at all and every use of bisulphite of lime, I am of opinion that the claim is too wide, and covers something which is not novel but which was known before.

Upon these grounds I concur in the judgment of the Sheriff, and of the majority of your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 31st January 1876, and of the Sheriff of 9th June 1876: Find that the pursuer (appellant) is assignee of the letters-patent, No. 6/1 of process, which were granted to Henry Medlock and the pursuer, dated and sealed 27th June 1861 in pursuance of which the said Henry Medlock and the pursuer filed the specification, of which No. 6/12 of process is a certified printed copy: Find that during the years 1873 and 1874, and during part thereof, and during the currency of the said letters-patent the defenders (respondents) did at their shops or premises, Gallowgate Street and Duke Street, Glasgow, use and employ the preservation of animal substances bisulphite of lime, bearing solution No. 1 claimed by the patentee under the first head of claim in the complete specification: Find that between 21st June 1861 and the date of the pursuer's provisional specification, 2nd June 1866, bisulphite of lime was publicly used for the preservation of animal substances by William Rattray, chemist, Aberdeen in the manner described in the specification of his patent, No. 6/1 of process: Find that the complete specification describes the nature of the invention claimed under the said first head, but does not describe or ascertain the manner in which the said invention is to be performed: Find that, in so far as regards the said first head of the claim, the complete specification is disconformant to the provisional specification, and claims a different invention from which is disclosed in the provisional specification: Therefore find that the patent is not valid and effectual to secure to the pursuer the invention, or supposed invention, used by the defenders aforesaid: To this extent and effect sustain the defence and the prayer of the petition, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses both in the Sheriff Court and in this Court."

MORISON & KEITH, S.S.C.—DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE, Bart., Petitioner.—Balfour—Murray.

No. 89.

Improvement of Land Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 114, secs. 78 and 80.—Feb. 24, 1877.
A petition presented by an heir of entail in possession, in terms of section 78 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, craving the Court to authorise the Inclosure Commissioners to sanction as a charge upon the estate a sum which he proposed to subscribe towards the stock of a branch railway to be made through the estate, by virtue of sections 78 and 80 of the Act, held that it was not indisable that the petitioner should shew that the making of the railway and consequent benefit to the estate were contingent on his proposed subscription. Edmonstone.

HIS was a petition presented to the First Division of the Court under the 21st section of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 114. 1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

The petitioner, Sir William Edmonstone of Duntreath and Kilsyth, Bart., had presented an application to the Inclosure Commissioners of Scotland for land in Wales, in virtue of the above mentioned Act, and particularly section 78 thereof, craving them to sanction as a charge upon the estate of Kilsyth a sum of £5000, which he proposed to subscribe towards the stock in the Kelvin Valley Railway Company, for the extension of the railway between Kilsyth and Falkirk.*

As the petitioner was heir of entail in possession of the estate of Kilsyth, and as he was the father of Archibald Edmonstone, the next heir of entail, who was a minor, it was necessary for him to apply to the Court of Session, under the 21st section of the Act, for an order "authorising the Commissioners to entertain and proceed with the application," notwithstanding the next heir's minority.

The petitioner set forth "that the estimated amount of increased value of the railway would confer upon the estate proposed to be charged as follows, viz.—(1) A rise of about £300 per annum of rent on two farms jointly, which would fall out at Whitsunday 1877; (2) that the value of the other farms would increase as the respective leases fell out; (3) that there would be a large return from feuing, many feus having been applied for in prospect of the railway being made; and (4) that a more lordship would become due on two mineral fields, as per valuation."

Besides these anticipated benefits to the estate, the stock towards which the petitioner proposed to subscribe was guaranteed by the North

The Improvement of Land Act, 1864, enacted, sec. 78:—"In case any owner shall be desirous of subscribing for any shares or stock in the capital, whether original or additional, of a company having power to construct a railway, navigable canal, or any branch or extension railway or navigable canal, or deviation of a line of railway or a navigable canal already sanctioned, the subscription for which such subscription is to be made being unfinished, or in any case in which the capital to be raised for the completion of any such railway, canal, or extension, or deviation, the same being upon or near to, and which will give or benefit, the lands of such landowner, and who shall be desirous that the same amount, or any part thereof, may be charged upon the lands so to be improved, it shall be lawful for him to apply to the commissioners for that purpose within the time limited by the Railway or Canal Companies Act or Acts for the construction of the works in question."

c. 80.—"If the commissioners shall be satisfied that the railway or canal, when constructed and open for traffic, will effect a permanent increase of the value of the lands exceeding the yearly amount proposed to be charged upon them, they shall execute and deliver to the landowner a provisional order under their seal and the hands of two of them, expressing their sanction of the works proposed" in the form therein set forth.

No. 89. British Railway Company $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, redeemable at 10 per cent premium. The return on the shares would therefore be £262, 10s. per annum to begin with, diminishing as the shares were gradually released by the periodical payment of the rent charge, and appropriated to the petitioner or his successors paying the same, in terms of the 78th section of the statute.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Edmonstone.

The annual rent charge proposed to be laid upon the estate of Kilsyth, in respect of the above-mentioned subscription to the Kelvin Valley Railway, was £343, 15s. for twenty-five years.

The petition was remitted to the Junior Lord Ordinary to inquire and report.

The Lord Ordinary (Rutherford Clark) remitted to Mr Colin Mackenzie W.S., to inquire into the facts and circumstances set forth in the petition.

On receiving Mr Mackenzie's report, and on a minute being lodged by the petitioner, the Lord Ordinary (Adam), on 29th January 1877, reported the case to the Inner-House, with a note containing, inter alia, the following passage:—" . . . The construction of the Kelvin Valley Railway is not contingent on the proposed subscription of £5000 being made to it by the petitioner. It is apparent, therefore, that the increased value of the lands by the making of the railway does not depend on the application being granted. The lands will be equally increased in value whether the application be granted or refused."

From the minute for the petitioner above mentioned, however, it appeared "that the petitioner having been advised that he would be able to present the present application, became bound to the railway company to take £5000 of stock, and they in consequence agreed to divert the line from the edge of the petitioner's property, where it originally was to have gone, to a more central part of his property."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am quite satisfied that the prayer of this petition should be granted, and an interlocutor pronounced in the terms proposed by the Lord Ordinary.

There is only one difficulty suggested by the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship says that an agreement has been made for the guarantee of the stock required to be raised for the extension of the Kelvin Valley Railway by the North British Railway Company, and that consequently the construction of the line is not contingent on the subscription of £5000 by the petitioner, nor does the prospective benefit to his lands depend on this application being granted.

Now, the Lord Ordinary does not express an opinion that it is indispensable to the success of his application that the petitioner should shew that with his proposed subscription this railway could not be made, but he suggests that this might possibly be the meaning and effect of sections 78 and 80 of the statute under which the application is made. I cannot, however, adopt this view, for I do not think that these clauses are susceptible of such an interpretation. They no doubt contemplate that a landowner who makes such an application as this shall be a person interested in the construction of the railway. But there is abundant evidence that the petitioner is in that position. The small branch line is intended and calculated to be of local benefit mainly, if not entirely, and it was therefore most natural that the promoters should have to carry with them the landowners through and near to whose estates the line was to run, and induce them to take shares. The petitioner has accordingly agreed ake shares in the company, trusting to the present application being granted. No. 89.

 Indeed it were necessary under the statute that the construction of the line should depend upon the proposed subscription of the petitioner, then there is no doubt that the application must be refused, for the investment is clearly an active investment, and the company can have no difficulty in obtaining the money elsewhere. But I have no idea that it is indispensable to prove that the success of the undertaking is in any way dependent on the petitioner's subscription.
 On other respects I am satisfied that the petitioner has made out a good case granting the application.

Feb. 24, 1877.
 Edmonstone.

ORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"The Lords on the report of Lord Adam, Ordinary, authorise and require the Inclosure Commissioners of England and Wales, acting under the statute 27 and 28 Vict. chapter 114, commonly called 'The Improvement of Land Act, 1864,' as regards lands in Great Britain, to proceed on the application to them by the petitioner, and to deal with the same according to the provisions of the said Act authorising them on that behalf, notwithstanding the circumstance that the petitioner is the father of a person entitled to an estate in the lands to be improved under the foresaid application immediately after the petitioner, and that such person is a minor, and direct that the costs of the application to the Court, and of the procedure following thereon, as the same shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court, shall be deemed to be part of the expenses of and incidental to the said application to the said commissioners, and decern, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account of said costs."

J. STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—Agent.

CHARLES METCALFE OCHTERLONY of Ochterlony, Baronet, Pursuer.— No. 90.

Balfour—Low.

WID FERGUSON OCHTERLONY AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Asher—Keir.

Feb. 24, 1877.
 Ochterlony v.
 Ochterlony
 and Others.

tail—Disentail—11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36 (Rutherford Act, 1848), sec. 43 not—Failure of Trustees to execute Trust—A testator having instructed his executors to execute a strict entail of certain lands on a series of heirs, the trustees executed an entail, and the institute entered into possession of the lands. Thirty-years afterwards he found that the deed of entail was invalid, the word "irrerevocably" in the clause prohibiting alienations being written on an erasure. In pursuance of (1) of declarator at the institute's instance that under the 43d section of the Rutherford Act he was entitled to possess the lands in fee-simple, and (2) of declarator at the instance of the next heir that the institute had no right to the lands except under a strict entail, and for reduction of the deed of entail, held the deed, being invalid as an entail, the trustees had not executed the trust deed, and that the institute, as a beneficiary under the trust-deed, was not bound to avail himself of the mistake to the prejudice of the subsequent heirs.

THE following narrative of the facts in this case, which was an action of declarator at the instance of Sir Charles Ochterlony, Bart., against himself and the subsequent heirs of entail in the lands of Ochterlony, is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note of 24th October 1876 :—

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Ruther-
 furd Clark.
 R.

By a trust-deed of settlement and commission, dated 10th March 1824, David Ochterlony (then residing in India) directed his trustees and

No. 90. commissioners to purchase lands in Scotland, and to settle them on himself and a series of heirs under a deed of strict entail.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Ochterlony v.
Ochterlony
and Others.

"Sir David died before the execution of the trust, and the trustees having purchased the lands, disposed them under what was intended to be a settlement of strict entail in favour of the pursuer and the heirs of his body, and the series of heirs therein mentioned. The deed of entail was executed in March and April 1840, and infeftment in favour of the pursuer followed thereon in November 1840.

"The pursuer has discovered that the word 'irredeemably' occurring in the prohibitory clause is written on an erasure or is vitiated. He has accordingly raised this action against his son and the other heirs-substitute of entail, in order to have it found and declared that the entail is defective, and that, by virtue of the 43d section* of the Entail Act of 1848, he is entitled to possess the lands in absolute property.

"The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that the word 'irredeemably' is vitiated and that it cannot be read as part of the deed. He accordingly pronounced an interlocutor to that effect dated 13th June 1876."

This interlocutor was as follows:—"The Lord Ordinary having been counsel for the parties, Finds that the word 'irredeemably' occurring on the 28th page of the deed of entail and in the prohibitory clause, is vitiated and erased, and cannot be read as part of the deed; and in respect that the defender stated that he intends raising certain proceedings against the pursuer, sists in hoc statu."

Thereafter, on 21st June 1876, Mr D. F. Ochterlony raised an action of declarator against his father, Sir Charles Ochterlony, for declarator that Sir Charles had no right to the lands contained in the entail except under the conditions of a strict entail and the other conditions contained in Sir David Ochterlony's trust-deed, and that any deed conveying these lands to Sir Charles which might be found invalid as a strict entail was in vires of Sir David's trustees, and should be reduced.

A record having been made up in this action, parties were heard in both cases, and on 24th October 1876 the Lord Ordinary assailed[†] it

* 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 43:—"And be it enacted, that where any tailzie shall not be valid and effectual, in terms of the said recited Act of the Scottish Parliament passed in the year 1685, in regard to the prohibitions and alienation and contraction of debt and alteration of the order of succession, consequence of defects either of the original deed of entail or of the intervention following thereon, but shall be invalid and ineffectual as regards any one of the prohibitions, then and in that case such tailzie shall be deemed and taken to be, and after the passing of this Act, to be invalid and ineffectual as regards all the prohibitions, and the estate shall be subject to the deeds and debts of the person then in possession, and of his successors as they shall thereafter in order to be under such tailzie, and no action of forfeiture shall be competent at the instance of any heir-substitute in such tailzie against the heir in possession under the same, by reason of any contravention of all or any of the prohibitions."

† "NOTE.—(After the narrative given above)—The action is deferred against Mr David F. Ochterlony as the next heir-substitute of entail. He has also raised an action of declarator and reduction against the pursuer, to have it found that the pursuer is not entitled to possess the lands except in conformity with the trust-deed, and to set aside the deed of entail which was executed by Sir David Ochterlony's trustees.

"The Lord Ordinary entertains no doubt that if the pursuer is entitled to possess the lands under the deed of entail of 1840, he is, by virtue of the 43d section of the Entail Amendment Act, entitled to hold them in absolute property. For if the entail is defective in so material a part as the prohibitions against irredeemable sales, it is by the Act ineffectual in all respects.

"But the defender maintains that the pursuer is not entitled to possess fenders from the conclusions in the original action at the instance of No. 90.

Charles Ochterlony.

Of the same date the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree of declarator Feb. 24, 1877.
reduction as concluded for in the action at the instance of Mr D. F. Ochterlony v.
Ochterlony
and Others.

Sir Charles reclaimed against both interlocutors, and argued ;—If Sir David Ochterlony had himself executed the deed of entail which had been found to be vitiated there could be no doubt that Sir Charles would be entitled, under the provisions of the 43d section of the Rutherford Act,¹ to hold the lands in fee-simple. That being so, and the deed having been executed by persons acting as commissioners for Sir David, upon the principle of the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se, the deed was in the same position as if Sir David had executed it himself.² The case could not be argued on the question of intention, as no one ever intended to make a bad entail. In any view, the fault here was one of defect, and not of excess, so the deed could scarcely be called ultra vires of the trustees. The case here was exactly that contemplated in the 43d section of the Act—an original entail, valid in two of the prohibitions, but invalid in the third. It was the policy of the Rutherford Act to destroy entails; and if the fact of interposing trustees protected a faulty entail, the object of the Act would be defeated, and that it must be set aside as disconform to the directions of the trust-settlement of Sir D. Ochterlony.

The pursuer does not dispute that by the trust-deed the trustees were directed to dispose of the lands under a settlement of strict entail. But he maintains that the deed of entail was delivered and received in good faith, and as the error was one which might have escaped notice without any imputation of negligence, the trustees have executed their office, and that his rights must be determined with reference to the deed of entail, as the only legitimate title under which the lands can be held. He urged that if Sir David had himself made the entail, the right of the heir in possession must be determined by the deed of entail as made it, and that the same rule must apply to a deed executed by trustees, who are the mere mandataries of the truster.

The Lord Ordinary is unable to sustain this argument. It is not disputed that the trustees had no power to execute any other deed than one of strict entail.

The pursuer, as beneficiary under the deed, is not entitled to avail himself of his mistake to the prejudice of the other beneficiaries, and as the Court could not have executed the trust, they can, it is thought, correct any error which has been committed by the trustees.

The analogy which the pursuer attempts to draw between the present case and that of a deed executed by the proprietor himself is fallacious. If the latter is not properly framed, the Court cannot reform it. The rights of the persons who take benefit by it must be determined by its condition as it left the hands of the maker. But where the trustees have a duty to perform the Court is bound to see that they duly perform it, and to set aside any deed which is inconsistent with the instructions under which they act.

The pursuer further maintains, that by reason of the long period for which he has possessed the lands under the existing title, his right to possess under that title cannot now be questioned. If prescription had run, the argument of the pursuer would have been sound. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the length of time short of the prescriptive period will exclude the right of the beneficiaries to have the estate settled in conformity with the instructions contained in the trust-deed.

The Lord Ordinary has therefore absolved the defenders, and has given judgment in favour of Mr Ochterlony in the action at his instance."

11 and 12 Vict. cap 36, sec. 43.

Union Bank v. Makin, March 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 499, 45 Scot. Jur.

No. 90. of this clause would be defeated. Sir Charles was under no obligation to put himself under a strict entail. He was a gratuitous taker.¹

Feb. 24, 1877. Argued for Mr D. F. Ochterlony;—The trustees had a plain duty laid upon them, and having failed to execute it successfully they were bound now to do so. As the Court could itself have executed this duty, it was bound to correct any error made by the trustees in carrying out the trust.

Ochterlony v. Ochterlony and Others.

At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—By the trust-deed of the late Sir David Ochterlony directed and appointed, authorised and empowered, a deed of strict entail to be executed, recorded, and feudalised by his trustees and his commissioners, as to be “effectual in terms of law.” But it having been now found and determined by final interlocutor that the entail which was executed is not a strict one, or effectual in terms of law, the question is whether, notwithstanding, it forms a good right and title in the reclamer to the lands and estates referred to, free from the fetters of a strict entail. He maintains that it does, in respect that the trustees, although the entail which they executed cannot be said to be valid and effectual, as they were directed to make it, having acted in bona fide and in ignorance of the erasure in the word “irredeemably,” or of any other flaw in the deed, the deed must be held to form a good and sufficient fee-simple title, in terms of the 43d section of the Entail Amendment Act, 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, and independently of that Act.

I have come to be satisfied that this contention on the part of the reclamer cannot be sustained.

The bona fides of the late Sir David Ochterlony's trustees can be of no avail, if they exceeded or violated, as they undoubtedly did, the powers and directions under which alone they were entitled to act. I am not aware of any law or authority to the contrary, and assuredly the case of the Union Bank of Scotland v. Makin and Sons, cited at the debate for the pursuer, is not so. In that case the question was, whether the power with which Makin and Sons invested their mandatary, Dempster, was so ample and comprehensive as to entitle the bank, as a bona fide third party, to rely on it. Accordingly, the Lord President, in concluding his remarks when giving judgment, observed: “The question was ‘whether Dempster, the mandatary, did not deal with the bank in that department of business in which he was specially authorised to deal.’ I am clearly of opinion he did.” And Lord Ardmillan, the only other Judge who appears to have expressed an opinion, said, “We have no case here of implied authority. We have very clear and ample authority expressly conferred. That authority, given by the defenders to their manager, their general agent and representative in Scotland, the bank were entitled to rely.” But in the present case Sir David Ochterlony gave no general powers to his trustees and commissioners. On the contrary, the powers and directions he gave were plain and explicit as to render it impossible to mistake or misunderstand them.

Independently, however, of the question of bona fides on the part either of Sir David Ochterlony's trustees or of Sir Charles Ochterlony, it was argued for the pursuer—and this was the plea chiefly relied on by him—that the 43d section of the Entail Amendment Act applies, and enacts that where an entail valid under the Act of 1685 in any of its essential prohibitions, it is to be held invalid in all respects, and the estate shall be subject to the acts of the person in possession at the time as if it belonged to him in fee-simple. But ^{Feb. 24, 1877.} ^{Ochterlony v. Ochterlony and Others.} argument proceeds, I think, upon an entire fallacy. The Entail Amendment Act, in the section referred to, has no relation to a deed of entail like that in question, which is absolutely, and was from the beginning, null and inept, as if it had never existed; for I take it that such is truly its nature, seeing that it was executed not only without authority, but in violation of the powers and directions under and in terms of which alone it could have or ever ought to have been executed. And it is made all the clearer that such an unauthorised deed cannot be upheld as good to any effect, when it is considered that there is no reason, as remarked by the Lord Ordinary, why another unobjectionable one should not now be executed, and the purposes of the trust be thus carried into effect. It is not suggested that the existing deed has been, by prescription or otherwise, so fortified as to render it impossible now to put matters right. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors reclaimed must ought to be adhered to. What steps will require to be taken in order to put matters right is a question which has not been brought under our consideration by either of the parties, and therefore I offer no opinion regarding it.

¹ Baillie v. Cochrane, March 9, 1855, 17 D. 659, 27 Scot. Jur. 279, March 1857, 19 D. (H. L.) 14, 29 Scot. Jur. 336, 2 Macq. 552.

ORD GIFFORD.—I concur. Sir David Ochterlony directed his trustees to execute in favour of the heirs mentioned a deed containing all the clauses recited and usually inserted in the strictest entails. The duty of the trustees was therefore to make a strict entail. They purchased lands as directed by the charter, and executed a disposition of these lands which professed to be a strict entail, and under which the pursuer on his charter has possessed for many years, not for the prescriptive period. It now appears that this disposition was an essential part written on an erasure. This was a failure of duty on the part of the trustees, in whose hereditas jacens the estate still is; and I think the pursuer of one of the substitute heirs is now entitled, as he would have been entitled immediately on the execution of the defective deed, to call for the execution of a new deed of strict entail, in terms of the trust-directions. No doubt possession might have fortified the title. It is quite clear that the Entail Amendment Act does not apply to invalid deeds. I had some doubts as to the manner in which the correction of the faulty title should take place, but I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the existing deed must be reduced.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in thinking that the case is a very clear one. The entail is manifestly defective, and so not what the trustees were directed to execute, and the Rutherford Act, in sec. 43, does not apply to cases of breach or non-execution of trust. There may be ulterior questions as to how far the rights of the heir in possession are to be cut down, but I agree that the faulty title must be reduced.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutors in both actions.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—DALGLEISH & BELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 91.

Feb. 24, 1877,
Belch v. Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

JOHN BELCH, Appellant.—R. V. Campbell.
COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—
Sol.-Gen. Macdonald—Rutherford.

Revenue—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 19—Conveyance—Sale—Discharge of ground-annual.—B entered into a contract of ground-annual with C whereby it was provided that he was to pay the amount of the ground-annual for twenty years, but might after that redeem it on payment of twenty-two years and a half's purchase of the ground-annual. After the expiry of the twenty years he paid the twenty-two and a half years' purchase-money and obtained a discharge. Held that the discharge fell to be stamped as a discharge of a security and not as a "conveyance on sale."

2D DIVISION.
R.

A CASE stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 19, set forth the following facts:—In 1856 John Belch entered into an original contract of ground-annual with Duncan Cameron, manufacturer, Glasgow, with respect to certain subjects in Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow. The ground-annual or ground-rent payable by Belch under the contract was £480 and it was made a real burden on the subjects. This contract contained the following clause:—"And it is further hereby expressly provided and declared that the said John Belch and his foresaids shall at any term of Martinmas or Whitsunday occurring after said term of Whitsunday 1876, be not sooner, be entitled to redeem from the said first party or his foresaids the said ground-annual, or any of the allocated portion thereof (provided the subjects burdened with the remainder shall be of the full yearly value to the extent aforesaid), upon giving six months' previous notice in writing, and making payment of twenty-two years and six months' purchase of the said ground-annual, or of the part thereof to be so redeemed: and on payment being made of such redemption-money in the terms fore-said and all arrears, the said Duncan Cameron binds himself and his foresaids to grant and deliver, at the expense of the party redeeming, all discharges or deeds necessary for disburdening the foresaid lands, or the portion thereof liable for said ground-annual, or the allocated portion thereof."

This deed was stamped with a leading duty of £30, being the valorem duty on a ground-annual of £480, under the Stamp Act 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 83, in respect of its being a contract containing "the original constitution" of a ground-annual right, and two progressive duties amounting to £1.

At Whitsunday 1876 Belch, taking advantage of the provision in the clause of the contract above quoted, gave the requisite notice that he was prepared to pay up the stipulated sum of £10,800, being twenty-two and a-half years' purchase of the ground-annual, and the trustees of Cameron who was dead, proceeded to grant him a discharge thereof—the discharge now in question.

The case gave the following abstract of the contents of that deed:—

"The deed narrates that John Belch, in terms of the contract of ground-annual, dated 17th and 19th, and recorded in the books of Councils and Session the 23d April 1856, between Duncan Cameron and John Belch therein-mentioned, has right to redeem on the terms after-mentioned from the said trustees a ground-annual of £480 sterling, upliftable out of subjects in Main Street, Anderston, Glasgow.

"Therefore, and in consideration of the sum of £10,800 paid by the said John Belch, the said trustees discharge the said ground-annual upliftable out of the foresaid subjects, in terms of contract of ground-annual entered into between Duncan Cameron and John Belch.

Further, the trustees redeem and disburden of said ground-annual, No. 91.
 All and Whole the subjects therein described.
 Statement of titles by which said trustees acquired their right to said ground-annual—

Clause of warrandice from fact and deed.

Consent to registration for preservation.

Testing clause."

Feb. 24, 1877.
 Belch v. Commissioners of Inland
 Revenue.

Belch having desired to have the opinion of the commissioners as to stamp-duty with which the deed was chargeable, the commissioners were of opinion that the provisions inferred the payment of the duty of £54, viz the ad valorem duty for a conveyance on sale in respect of the sum £10,800, being the consideration paid by Belch to Cameron's trustees forth as the cause for granting it. The deed being stamped with the duty of £2, 14s., the commissioners assessed and charged the additional duty of £51, 6s. upon it, to make up in all the duty of £54.

Thereupon Belch paid to the cashier of stamp-duties at Edinburgh the sum of £51, 6s. as for the stamp-duties, and the discharge was thereupon stamped with stamps denoting the duty of £51, 6s. in addition to the duty of £2, 14s. with which it was previously impressed. Belch declared himself dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioners, in so far as it assessed the ad valorem duty for a conveyance on sale, on the ground that it was not payable in the circumstances, and that the deed was only liable for the duty of £2, 14s., being the duty under the head of mortgage, bond, and nature, &c., in schedule to the Act 33 and 34 Vict., cap. 97, chargeable in respect of—“(4) Reconveyance, release, discharge, surrender, tender, warrant to vacate, or renunciation of any such security as said, or of the benefit thereof, or of the money thereby secured, for £100, and also for any fractional part of £100 of the total amount due of the money at any time secured, 6d.” Or otherwise, that the deed was only liable to a duty of 10s., either under the head of “release” at schedule, “in any other case than upon a sale, or by way of conveyance,” or under the head of “deed of any kind whatsoever not dealt with in this schedule.”

Therefore required the commissioners to state specially and sign the opinion on which the question with respect to such stamp-duty arose, together with their determination thereon, which the commissioners stated accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the Court is whether the said instrument is liable to be assessed and charged with the said ad valorem conveyance on sale stamp-duty, in terms of the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, or, if not, that other stamp-duty it is liable to be assessed and charged with? The provisions of the Stamp Acts were quoted in the case.*

These were as follows:—13 and 14 Vict. cap. 59, schedule, title “Conveyance,” 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 59, sec. 11, paragraph 2; 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 83, schedule, title “Conveyance,” 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, sec. 70,—“The term conveyance on sale” includes every instrument and every decree or order of court or of any commissioners, whereby any property upon the sale thereof is wholly or equitably transferred to or vested in the purchaser, or any other person on his behalf or by his direction;” also sec. 72, sub-sec. 2,—“Where the consideration or any part of the consideration for a conveyance on sale consists of any sum payable periodically in perpetuity, or for any indefinite period not terminated with life, such conveyance is to be charged, in respect of such consideration, with ad valorem duty on the total amount which will or may, according to the terms of sale, be payable during the period of twenty years next after the date of such instrument;” and sub-sec. 4,—“Provided that no conveyance on sale chargeable with ad valorem duty in respect of any periodical

No. 91.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Belch v. Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

Argued for Belch;—The substance and result of this deed was not a sale. No property passed. It was the release of a security. The ground-annual was extinguished, that was all.¹

Argued for the commissioners;—It was settled in such cases that the true nature of the transaction must be looked to.² The trustees had a separate right of property which they could have sold in the market. What really was effected here was a new transaction.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the facts, and the clauses of the Statute Acts referred to)—The question raised here depends on whether, first, the transaction represented by the instrument proposed to be stamped is a conveyance on a sale of property, or, second, whether it is a discharge of a security by way of mortgage, or, third, whether it belongs to a class not specially enumerated.

I am of opinion that this instrument does not represent a conveyance on a sale of property. If, indeed, the grantee had possessed a perpetual and unconditional right of ground-annual, which he was entitled to retain or not as he pleased, a new bargain with the purchaser to redeem the burden would be in substance a conveyance on a sale, and the sum stated as the consideration would represent the price paid. But such is not the position or nature of the transaction represented by this instrument. The seller never had an unconditional right of ground-annual. He had only a right to his annual payment secured by an instrument as long as the purchaser elected to retain the stipulated price, being two years' purchase of the annual sum. But when the purchaser used his option and paid the price, the sum paid was the consideration for the original conveyance, and the payment of it and the discharge granted in respect of it were a new transaction, but only the completion of the original contract of sale. The discharge only becomes necessary, not for the purpose of conveying any substantial interest, but solely to clear the record.

But, in the second place, I am of opinion that this infestment on the ground-annual right was simply security for the interest on the contract price, being £480 on a principal sum of £10,800, or something short of £5 per cent. That was its real nature, and it only subsisted at the option of the purchaser until payments, and containing also provision for securing such periodical payments is to be charged with any duty whatsoever in respect of such provision, and a separate instrument made in any such case for securing such periodical payments is to be charged with any higher duty than ten shillings."

In the schedule to that Act the following entries occur:—

"Reconveyance, release, or renunciation of any security—see Mortgage."

"Release or renunciation of any property, or of any right or interest in any property—Upon a sale—see Conveyance on Sale; by way of security—see Mortgage, &c.; in any other case, 10s."

"Conveyance or transfer on sale of any property (except such stock or venture stock or funded debt as aforesaid) where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale does not exceed £5, 6d. And so on."

¹ Millar v. Small, March 24, 1853, 15 D. (H. L.) 38, 25 Scot. Jur. 3 Macq. 345; Royal Bank v. Gardyne, May 13, 1853, 15 D. (H. L.) 45, 25 Scot. Jur. 399, 1 Macq. 358.

² Christie v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Nov. 21, 1866, L. R. 2 D. 45; The Limmer Asphalt Paving Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, April 17, 1872, L. R. 7 Exch. 211.

It was paid. I am therefore of opinion that the stamp first proposed by the No. 91.
and party is the correct one.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Belch v. Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

AND ORMDALE.—The instrument or deed in question may in one sense be to be a receipt or discharge for £10,800, the sum on payment of which Belch was entitled to redeem the ground-annual; but the deed or instrument more than merely acknowledge the receipt of that payment. It also declares Mr Belch's property to be redeemed and disburdened of the ground-annual of the contract by which it was constituted. It also contains a clause of arrandice and the other clauses usual in a release or renunciation of such heritable right. The stamp applicable to a mere receipt or discharge for money received is therefore not that with which the deed or instrument in question is chargeable, and this was not maintained.

It was contended, however, on the part of the Crown, that it was of the nature of a reconveyance, release, or renunciation of a right of property, or right or interest in property "upon a sale," and the question really comes to be, is it so or not? The ground-annual had not in its constitution contained, as it does, an express stipulation or provision to the effect that it was redeemable on payment of a fixed sum calculated at twenty-two and a half years' purchase, or, in other words, on a payment of £10,800 by Mr Belch, a great deal might have been said in support of the Crown's contention, for on that assumption Cameron's trustees, if they pleased, have refused to consent to any redemption, and, at any rate, they would have had it in their power to negotiate for payment of a larger sum for the consideration or price, so to speak, of their agreeing to the redemption and subsequent release or renunciation of the ground-annual. But, as the matter was, no such negotiation was necessary or indeed admissible. All Mr Belch had to do was to tender payment of the stipulated redemption money, and thereupon he was to receive the necessary discharge, or, to use the words of the Act, release or redemption. But such a transaction cannot well be said to be of the nature of a sale, which necessarily implies a seller on the one hand and a purchaser on the other, each being entitled to make the best bargain he could for himself. No bargain, however, for any such bargaining was left relative to the redemption of the ground-annual in question, for the consideration in respect of which its redemption could be enforced, and every other characteristic of a sale, were excluded, all that having been previously arranged and fixed in 1856 by the contract of ground-annual itself, on which an ad valorem stamp was then paid. It is not, I think, to be said, however, that the Crown, therefore, my inability to see how the deed or instrument here in question can be held to be of the nature of a reconveyance, release, or renunciation of property, or of a right or interest on property "upon a sale." It is at least impossible, I think, to come to any such conclusion without giving a strained and unnatural construction to the language of the statute, contrary to the established rule that penal and revenue Acts are to be construed strictly, and not extended to cases to which they do not clearly and unequivocally apply. In accordance with this rule it was, in Phillips v. Morrison, in 1844 (13 L. J. 212), laid down by the Court of Exchequer in England that—"The party who brings an instrument within the Stamp Act must shew clearly that it is within it; he must, so to speak, hit the bird in the eye. We," said the Judges, "can make no intendment in favour of the liability."

No. 91.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Belch v. Commissioners of Inland
Revenue.

For these reasons, I am of opinion, in answer to the question submitted in the case, that the commissioners have erred, and that the deed or instrument referred to is not liable to be assessed and charged with an ad valorem "conveyance on sale duty," in terms of the Act 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, and that the stamp-duty it is chargeable with is that which it was stamped with prior to the opinion of the commissioners being taken, viz., £2, 14s., being the ad valorem duty payable on the discharge of a security.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, and agree with the views expressed by your Lordship in the chair. It is now quite fixed on principle as well as by the cases to which we were referred—Christie v. The Inland Revenue and the Ashphalt Paving Co., being, I think, the two leading cases—that in questions like the present we are not to criticise the exact words of the deed but rather to look to the substance and effect of it, to see what the real transaction between the parties was, and to assess the stamp-duty accordingly. Now, I do not think there can be any serious doubt what the real transaction between Mr Belch and the party from whom he purchased this feu was. It was this—In 1856 he bought this property for a price, but it was not convenient for him to pay that price down, and so the price was converted into an annual duty or ground-annual, or annualrent, of £480 per annum, redeemable, however, in manner provided for by Mr Belch when he chose to give notice, in terms of the deed, for twenty-two and a half years' purchase, or, in other words, for the sum of £10,800. That was the transaction, and the bargain about redeeming or paying off the ground-annual is, as your Lordship has said, an integral part of the original transaction. There was no new bargain—no new sale between the parties. It was all included in that deed which fixed the rights of parties in 1856. Now, I think when Mr Belch availed himself of the right to pay down the capital price instead of what was substantially just interest upon it he was not buying a new subject. He was paying the price which he agreed to pay in one of the forms in which he was allowed to do it, and there is an end of the question. At the moment you see it so simply stated as that, because there can be no doubt that if, instead of expressing the original bargain as it was actually expressed in what is called a contract of ground-annual, the price had simply been made a real burden on the property, bearing interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, there could have been no doubt whatever that on payment of that price no new ad valorem duty would be exigible. But in substance and reality that is the true nature of it. This gentleman, in paying off or redeeming the ground-annual, is just paying the price of the subject which he bought in 1856; upon the conveyance in 1856 the stamp for the price was paid, no doubt calculated not at twenty-two and a half years' purchase, but in terms of the statute at twenty years' purchase. That does not make any difference. The statute fixes 5 per cent as the conveyance sum on which stamp-duty should be paid. Here the parties fixed on about 4 per cent so long as the price was not paid. Well, if it had been expressed in that way, that the price of £10,800—for they fixed it to a penny—shall nevertheless be a real burden on the property, and bear interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or bear interest of £480 per annum until paid, could it ever be maintained that when the price was paid that was a new sale, and that the conveyance required to be impressed with a new or ad valorem stamp-duty? I think it would be perfectly impossible to say so. Getting, therefore, at the real contention between the parties, I have not the least hesitation in saying that the only stamp exigible here is that of a releasing a real burden which is now released in consequence of the payment of what was originally stipulated as the price of the subject. Now, that falls under the head of mortgage, bond, or debenture, and I think Mr Belch took the correct view when he stamped the instrument with a duty of £2, 14s., and that no more is exigible.

No. 91.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Belch v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Counsel for Belch having moved for an order for repayment of the duty paid in excess, in terms of sub-sec. 4 of sec. 19 of 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97,

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the instrument referred to in the case is liable to be assessed and charged with a stamp-duty of £2, 14s., being the amount chargeable in respect of the discharge or renunciation of a security, and therefore order the sum of £51, 6s., being the excess of duty paid by the appellant, to be repaid to him by the said commissioners, together with the costs incurred by him in relation to the appeal: Remit," &c.

MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE.—Agents.

JOHN DAWSON AND OTHERS (Trustees of Adam Dawson secundus), First Parties.—Lord-Adv. Watson—M'Laren.

No. 92.

JOHN RAMAGE DAWSON (Trustee of Frances Dawson), Second Party.—
Balfour—Murray.

Feb. 24, 1877.*
Dawson, &c

JOHN RAMAGE DAWSON (Trustee of William Dawson), Third Party.—
Lorimer.

Succession—Liferent and Fee—Alimentary Provision.—A father in his settlement conveyed an estate to his eldest son under the real burden of £6000, 500 of which was declared should "belong in liferent to each of my daughters, F and M, viz., £3000 betwixt them, and to their children in fee, the interest at four per cent being payable to them respectively as alimentary provisions, . . . the principal sum in each case to be divided among the children of each, if more than one, in such proportions as the said F and M may respectively direct," and failing such direction, equally. The deed, after excluding the rights of any husband F or M might marry from the sums above provided, continued, "nor shall the same be affectable by the debts or deeds of his husband, but the said F and M shall have power to uplift and dispose of the whole subjects and sums of money hereby conveyed to them respectively, for their maintenance, rent, annualrents, and profits of the same, . . . in any manner not inconsistent with the provisions of this deed without the consent of any such husband." Held that the deed conferred on the daughters rights of liferent.

IN 1836 Adam Dawson of Bonnytown, Linlithgowshire, died leaving a 1ST DIVISION.
position and settlement dated 23d September 1820. By this deed he conveyed the estate of Bonnytown to his eldest son William, under the following declaration:—"Declaring always, as it is hereby expressly declared, that the said lands and others are hereby disposed with and under express and real burden of the sum of £6000 sterling, which shall be paid and be payable in manner following, viz., . . . Secundo, £600 shall, under the conditions and restrictions aftermentioned, belong in liferent to each of my daughters, Frances and Margaret, viz., £3000 betwixt them and to their children in fee, the interest at four per cent being payable to them respectively as alimentary provisions, from the 1st of Whitsunday or Martinmas immediately preceding my death, the

B.

No. 92.
 Feb. 24, 1877.
 Dawson, &c.

principal sum in each case to be divided among the children of each, more than one, in such proportions as the said Frances and Margaret Dawson may respectively direct by a writing under their hands; or in the event of their not executing such writing, the sum above provided to each shall be divided among their respective children equally, share and share alike: Providing always, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared that any husband whom the said Frances or Margaret Dawson may respectively marry shall in no event have any right, either of property, life interest, courtesy, or administration, or any other right or interest whatever, in and to the sums of money above provided to them respectively or in and to the lands and sums of money hereinafter provided to them or any part thereof, or the rents, annual rents, or profits of the same, in virtue of the jus mariti or otherwise, nor shall the same be affectable by the debts or deeds of such husband, but the said Frances and Margaret Dawson shall have power to uplift and dispose of the whole subjects and sums of money hereby conveyed to them respectively, and rent, annual rents, and profits of the same, in any manner not inconsistent with the provisions of this deed, without the consent of any such husband or husbands; and that every deed to be done by them or either of them, in relation to the premises, though without the consent of any husband or husbands either of them may have, shall be as valid and effectual as if they continued unmarried, or their husbands had consented thereto; as also that in case the said Frances or Margaret Dawson, or either of them, shall have occasion to lend out any sums to which they shall succeed in virtue of these presents, or to purchase therewith any lands, or other subjects whatever, the conveyances or securities to be taken by them, or either of them, shall contain an express exclusion of the jus mariti of either: That £250 to each of my sons, Adam and John Dawson: Fourth, £500, be the remainder of the said £6000, shall belong to my said sons, Adam and John, recommending to them to settle the interest thereof upon my son Patrick as an alimentary provision to him, if they can do so without touching the same, or any part thereof, available to his creditors, or if they shall see it possible to pay the principal of said sum to my son Patrick without going into the hands of his creditors, they are hereby authorized to demand payment thereof from my said son William five years after my decease, upon a notice of six months, or at any term of Whitsunday at the expiry of the said five years, upon a similar notice of six months, to pay the same to my son Patrick accordingly."

William Dawson, on the death of his father in 1836, entered upon possession of the estate of Bonnytown, and afterwards sold it to his brother Adam Dawson secundus.

Frances Dawson died unmarried in 1867 leaving a trust-disposition containing a general conveyance of all her estate. Her trustees, proceeding on the disposition and settlement of Adam Dawson primus, and on their own trust-deed, expedite a notarial instrument in their own favour of the real burden of £1500, and took infeftment.

William Dawson died in 1872 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement containing a conveyance of his whole estate to trustees.

Adam Dawson secundus died in 1873 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed the estate of Bonnytown to trustees.

This special case was brought to try the questions whether the fund provided to Frances and her children was carried by her settlement upon Adam Dawson secundus as proprietor of the estate, or whether it had been disburdened by the lapse of the legacy, or whether it had been carried in William Dawson, the original donee of the estate.

The first parties to the case were John Dawson and others, trustees am Dawson secundus, and the third party was John Ramage Dawson, sole surviving and accepting trustee of William Dawson under his trust-disposition and settlement. The second party was John Ramage Dawson, sole surviving trustee under the trust-disposition of Frances Dawson. No. 92.

Feb. 24, 1877.
Dawson, &c.

The following were the questions of law :—“ 1. Whether, under the said position and settlement and codicil of the said Adam Dawson primus, fee or capital of the £1500 thereby provided for the said Frances Dawson vested in her, and was transmitted to the party hereto of the second part by her trust-disposition and settlement above mentioned? In the event of the preceding question being answered in the negative, whether is the said principal sum of £1500, so provided for the said Frances Dawson, with interest since her death, the property of the parties to of the first part, or of the party hereto of the third part?”

The Court refused to consider the second question, on the ground that residuary legatees of Adam Dawson primus were not parties to the trial case.

The first parties and the third party argued ;—Nothing was given by deed of Adam primus but a bare liferent to Frances. There were two cases where the liferenter was fiar—(1) Where he had a power spousal ; and (2) where the fiars were not in existence. An alimentary was unknown. The case of Douglas v. Sharp was an authority that an alimentary “ had the same effect as “ allenarly.” There was no trust created, but the intention of the testator was apparent, because (1) there was a declaration of the mode of division among children, indicating two equal interests in the parents and children ; (2) the annual income of the fund was given to the daughters ; (3) there was a power of appointment on the part of the daughters. The power to uplift, and the position of the husband’s interest, had reference only to the fiduciary fee.¹ The second party, the trustee of Frances Dawson, argued ;—The daughter had large powers of investment. When the granter intended only to provide alimentary provisions he knew how to do so, as was shewn by other provisions in the deed. The clause here was in similar terms to the clause in the case of Frog’s Creditors. The word “ alimentary ” was not taxative.² It was only advising,—

THE PRESIDENT.—(After reading the clauses of the settlement)—The question is whether the provision in favour of Margaret and Frances is of the nature of a liferent interest merely or a fee, and it appears to me that the words used under the second head of the settlement are sufficient for the determination of that question.

The liferent of each of the daughters is to be alimentary, and it is carefully provided that the provision is not only to be protected against the jus mariti of the husband, but also against the diligence of creditors. It occurs to me that such an alimentary provision would be a very futile

¹ Bell’s Com. (M’Laren’s ed.) 55 ; Seton v. Seton’s Crs., March 6, 1793, M. Ramsay v. Beveridge, March 3, 1854, 16 D. 764, 26 Scot. Jur. 329 ; Mein v. Hume, June 8, 1827, 5 S. 779, N. E. 727, Feb. 23, 1830, 4 W. and S. 22. ² Ogilvie’s Crs., Nov. 25, 1735, M. 4262 ; Cumstie v. Cumstie’s Trs., June 30, 1779, ante, vol. iii. p. 921 ; Porterfield v. Graham, June 23, 1779, M. 4277, 1 Bell’s 5th ed. 57, M. Bell’s Conveyancing, 782 ; Kennedy v. Allan, Feb. 19, 1812, Shaw, 554, N. E. 383 ; Douglas v. Sharp, March 9, 1811, Hume, 173 ; v. M’Kilston, June 14, 1781, M. 4402 ; Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, Feb. 1, 1812, F. C. ; Ferguson’s Trs. v. Hamilton, July 13, 1860, 22 D. 1442, 1 Scot. Jur. 654 ; Hutton’s Trs. v. Hutton, Feb. 11, 1847, 9 D. 639, 19 Scot. Jur. 4 ; Maule, June 14, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 831.

No. 92.
 Feb. 24, 1877.
 Dawson, &c.

and inexpedient way of settling a fund of this kind if a declaration that it was to be alimentary and not subject to the diligence of creditors were to be followed by a vesting of the fee, which would of course operate so as to open the fund to the diligence of creditors. Yet that is what is contended for here by the representative of Frances Dawson. The result of the fee vesting in Frances Dawson would be that she could have done what she liked with it. What could it be the good of the protection against the jus mariti and diligence of creditors? If the fund vested in Frances Dawson it could be attached by the diligence of creditors, and the alimentary provision would perish with the fee which produced it. There is an absolute inconsistency in declaring the life interest to be alimentary and at the same time so framing the deed that the fee of the fund should vest in the beneficiary.

If, however, any other light were necessary it is to be found in the scope of the other clauses of the deed. It is not necessary to go into them all of them which bear on this point leave no doubt in my mind that there was no intention that the fee should vest in the daughters, and there is nothing in the terms of the deed to prevent us arriving at that conclusion. The daughters are certainly to have powers as to the reinvestment of the money, but those powers are all introduced for the purpose of excluding the rights of husband. I am therefore prepared to answer the question in the negative, and to hold that the £1500 was not carried by the trust-disposition of Frances Dawson.

LORD DEAR.—The first question is of a very special kind depending on the words of the deed. And the decision which we are to pronounce, that can never apply to another deed unless the words are similar. One consideration is that the provision is alimentary, and that depends not only on the clause containing the provision but on the construction of the deed taken together. I have no doubt that the opinion given by your Lordship on that is right, and I concur in the views expressed.

LORD MURE.—The question here raised depends upon the meaning of the second clause of the directions in the settlement, by which a right is given to the daughters; and I think that there is sufficient in that clause to limit the right to a life interest. The phraseology used, viz., that the provisions were "alimentary provisions," and that the principal sum in each case was to be divided among the children of each, makes this just as clear, in my opinion, as if the word "allienary" or "only" had been used. It was, I think, substantially so decided in the case of Douglas, 9th March 1811, Hume's Decisions, p. 100, and this was assumed to be settled law by Lord Wood, than whom there can be no better authority on such a question, in the case of Ramsay v. Ramsay, in which his Lordship said,—“There is no decision to support the proposition that it is solely by the taxative words ‘allienary’ or ‘only,’ or for the use of alimentary, or some equivalent words inserted in the dispositive part of the deed, or by the regular appointment of trustees and the formal constitution of a trust, that the case can be taken out of the principle fixed in that of Douglas. The words “for life interest use alimentary” are thus expressly laid down, and apparently with the concurrence of the majority of the Court, as of equal weight with the words “allienary” or “only,” to take a case out of the rule laid down in the case of Frog's Creditors, M. 4262, and the provisions we are here to construe appear to be fully as strong in this respect as the words “for life interest use alimentary.”

The provision in a subsequent part of this clause giving power to the daughter to uplift and invest the funds may be calculated at first sight to raise some difficulty. But then this power is qualified by the words "in any manner not consistent with the provisions of this deed," and cannot therefore, I think, be held to do away with the effect of the leading provision by which the right is restricted to a liferent.

No. 92.
Feb. 24, 1877.
Dawson, &c.

THE COURT, on 10th November 1876, pronounced this interlocutor : — "Find and declare, in answer to the first question, that the fee or capital of the £1500 provided by the disposition and settlement of Adam Dawson primus in favour of his daughter Frances Dawson did not vest in the said Frances Dawson, and was not transmitted by her settlement to the party of the second part, and decern : And in respect the residuary disponees of the said Adam Dawson are not parties to this special case refuse to make any answer to the second question."

WOTHERSPOON & MACK, S.S.C.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—
DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

THOMAS WATT, Pursuer.—Fraser—Rhind.
M'PHERSON AND ANOTHER (John M'Pherson's Trustees), Defenders, —M'Laren—Mitchell.
AND
M'PHERSON AND ANOTHER (John M'Pherson's Trustees), Pursuers.
—M'Laren—Mitchell.
THOMAS WATT AND JOHN WATT JUNIOR, Defenders.—Fraser—Rhind.

No. 93.
Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

Agent and Client—Sale—Purchase by Agent—Reduction.—W, a law-agent, agent for his brother, Dr W, four dwelling-houses from two ladies, the Misses M as trustees of their late father. The missives of sale were signed for the trustees by H M, their brother. In answer to an action for implement brought by W, the trustees brought an action of reduction of the missives, on the ground W, though acting for the purchaser, was also the trustees' agent in and for sale, and that while ostensibly buying for Dr W he was in reality, unknown to them, buying in fact for himself.

The proof established that about four years previous to the sale the agency of the trust had been removed from the original agent for the trust; that a new agent had been regularly appointed; but that W had transacted with the trustees some incidental matters connected with the trust; that H M, who was a manufacturer, managed the ordinary affairs of the trust for the trustees in the way of collecting rents and interests, &c.; that W was the agent of the Misses M as individuals, and of H M and also of some of the beneficiaries under the trust; that, prior to the sale, in the course of a conversation between W and H M in regard to matters not connected with the trust, W told H M that he thought he could find a purchaser for the houses; that shortly after he offered to purchase for his brother Dr W; that thereupon a price was fixed between W and H M, and an offer was written by W, "as authorised by his brother Dr W," which, after being submitted to the Misses M as accepted by H M as "authorised" by them; that before the offer was made, W had arranged with his brother Dr W without the knowledge of either of the Misses M that he was to take over from him two of the houses on payment of one-half of the price; and that W resold his two houses within a few days at an enhanced price.

It is, in the circumstances (rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill, diss. Lord James), that the Misses M had failed to prove either (1) that W occupied the position of general law-agent for the trust, or (2) that he was specially consti-

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.

Watt v.

M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

1st Division.

Jd. Curriehill.

M.

tuted the agent of the trustees for the sale of the particular property in question, and that, on the contrary, their brother H M must be held to have acted as the sole agent in the sale.

An action was raised at the instance of Dr Thomas Watt of Darlington against Misses Ann and Jessie M'Pherson, as trustees of the late John M'Pherson, manufacturer, Aberdeen, for declarator and implement of a contract of sale of four houses Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 Ann Place, Aberdeen, entered into by the pursuer as purchaser through his brother, John Watt junior, advocate, Aberdeen, and the defenders as sellers, through their brother, Hugh James M'Pherson, comb manufacturer, Aberdeen.

The missives constituting the alleged contract of sale were—(1) a letter written and addressed by John Watt junior, upon the 9th November 1875, to Hugh James M'Pherson, in the following terms:—"Aberdeen, 9th November 1875.—Dear Sir,—I am authorised by my brother Dr Watt, Darlington, to offer the trustees of your late father the sum of £1900 for the four half houses at Ann Place belonging to them, on the understanding that he shall bear the whole expense of transfers. The entry to the purchaser to be at Whitsunday next, when the price will be paid to the sellers, who will receive the Whitsunday rents, the rents falling due at Martinmas 1876 being payable to the purchaser. I shall feel obliged by your submitting the offer to the trustees, and letting me hear from you if it be accepted,—Yours truly," &c.; (2) another letter of the same date by John Watt junior to H. J. M'Pherson, in the following terms:—"Aberdeen, 9th November 1875.—Dear Sir,—The offer for the houses at Ann Place is made on the understanding that the feu-duty of the whole is £20 sterling per annum, and that the subjects are liable to duplicate in feu-duty every nineteen years, the first duplicand being payable in 1877,—Yours truly, &c. P.S.—I shall send to Mr Edmond for a look of the charter;" and (3) a letter by the said Hugh J. M'Pherson to John Watt junior, also dated 9th November 1875, in the following terms, viz.:—"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your two letters of this date and having duly submitted the offers for the 4 (four half) houses at Ann Place to my sisters, surviving trustees of my late father, they have authorised me to accept of the same on the conditions named—viz, £1900 cash, the purchaser paying all expenses connected with the transfer, yearly duty of £20, with a duplicand every nineteen years, first duplicand 1877. Purchase-money payable and entry given at Whitsunday next, 4th June, for entry, the rents up to then being payable to the sellers," &c.

The trustees refused to implement the contract of sale, and resisted the action, on the ground that "the purchase of the said four houses at Ann Place, Aberdeen, by Mr John Watt junior, although made ostensibly for and on behalf of his brother, the pursuer, was really made for his own account (or, at least, was made to the extent of two of the said houses, Nos. 3 and 4 Ann Place, for his own account), the name of the pursuer being used to conceal from the defenders the fact that they were dealing with the law-agent and adviser. The defenders, if they had known that Mr John Watt junior was purchasing for his own account, would not have sold the property to him, or at least would not have sold to him without the intervention of a neutral solicitor. The price stipulated was not a fair price."

The defenders farther stated;—(Stat. 2) "Until the year 1871 the late James Edmond, advocate in Aberdeen, acted as the agent of the defenders. Since that year they, as trustees foresaid, have been in use to employ Mr John Watt junior, advocate in Aberdeen, as their legal adviser and agent."

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

connection with the management of the affairs of the trust-estate. No general meeting of the trustees has been held since 1871, but, acting as agent, Mr John Watt junior has negotiated for them the investment of the funds of the trust, and in all such transactions they have been guided by his advice. Mr Watt has also acted as their agent and adviser in their own private and personal business matters. Mr Watt was also the law-agent of the trustees and also the law-agent of the trustees acting under the deed of settlement of the deceased Mrs Ann Thomson or M'Pherson, widow of the said John M'Pherson, and one of the trustees, and the law-agent of the trustees under the marriage-contract trust of Mrs Jane Black or Black, a daughter of the said John M'Pherson, both of whose trust-estates have an interest in the said property in Ann Place. Communications on all such business matters between the defenders and Mr Watt have frequently passed through the defender's brother, Mr Hugh James M'Pherson, for whom Mr Watt also acted as law-agent and adviser." (Stat. 3) "In the course of the year 1875 Mr John Watt mentioned to Mr Hugh James M'Pherson that he had money bearing to a client on hand for investment in house property, and had difficulty in finding suitable subjects to purchase. In reply, Mr Hugh James M'Pherson mentioned that the Ann Place houses would have to be sold in 1877, and said that he had been thinking of recommending that they should be advertised for sale. Mr Watt asked that advertisement should be delayed till he ascertained whether any of his clients would take them. In consequence of this, and acting upon the advice of Mr John Watt junior, and being guided by his calculations as to the price and other circumstances of the transaction, the defenders were induced to decide to sell the houses, and to do so at the price of £1900. Thereupon the letters bearing date September 9, 1875 (quoted supra, p. 602), passed between the said John Watt junior, and the said Mr Hugh James M'Pherson as representing the defenders. In this transaction Mr M'Pherson and the defenders understood that Mr John Watt junior was acting as agent for the sellers as well as the purchaser, as he was in fact acting.

The pursuer denied that his brother was agent for the trustees, but in answer to art. 2 "admitted that the late James Edmond, advocate, acted as agent of the defenders, and that Mr John Watt junior has occasionally acted for them in their individual capacity. Admitted that he was the law-agent of the trustees acting under Mrs M'Pherson's deed of settlement, and was law-agent in her trust. Admitted that she was John M'Pherson's widow.

Admitted that the said John Watt junior is one of the trustees under Mrs Black's marriage-contract, and is law-agent in the marriage-contract trust. Admitted that Mrs Black is a daughter of the said John Watt senior."

It was admitted that on 30th November 1875 John Watt junior received two houses purchased by him at the price of £1125, being a sum of these two of £175.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer not being the true purchaser, his name having been used in the letters constituting the alleged contract of sale merely for the purpose of concealing the fact that the defender was the law-agent and adviser, Mr John Watt junior, advocate, Aberdeen, the purchaser, in whole or in part, and at an inadequate price, of the property thereby proposed to be sold, the pursuer is not entitled to require the defenders to implement the said alleged contract of sale, and the defenders are entitled to absolver. (2) The pursuer not being the purchaser, and his name having been used in the letters constituting the alleged contract of sale merely for the purpose of concealing the fact that the defenders' said law-agent and adviser was the purchaser of two

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

of the four houses, being houses Nos. 3 and 4 Ann Place, Aberdeen thereby proposed to be sold, and that at an inadequate price, the pursuer is not entitled to require the defenders to implement the said alleged contract of sale, in so far as relates to the said two houses, and in respect thereto the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The said John Watt junior being the law-agent and adviser of the defenders, and being a trustee under the trust-deed of settlement of the deceased Mrs. Thomson or M'Pherson, and a trustee under the marriage-contract of Mrs Jane M'Pherson or Black, and as such interested in the trust of the said John M'Pherson, was under a personal disqualification, enabling him from purchasing the trust-estate of which the defenders are the trustees, or at least he could not legally purchase from the defenders while the defenders were ignorant that he was interested in the contract, and while the relation of agent and client subsisted between the pursuer and the sellers. (4) In the circumstances, and even assuming that the pursuer was interested as purchaser of two of the four houses, the defenders are entitled to be relieved of the contract in its entirety, in respect of concealment and constructive trust.

A reduction of the missive of sale at the instance of the defenders against Dr Watt and John Watt junior was held as repeated, and a before answer was allowed, the trustees to lead in the proof.

The import of the proof was thus stated by the Lord Ordinary:—

"1. The late John M'Pherson, combmaker in Aberdeen, died in 1841, survived by his widow and a family of seven children by her, as well as by a family of several children by a former marriage. He left a trust-deed, under which the defenders Ann and Jessie M'Pherson, two daughters by the first marriage, are the sole surviving trustees.

"4. During the lifetime of John M'Pherson, his law-agent was Mr James Edmond, advocate, Aberdeen, who, and his subsequent firm Messrs Edmond and A. Edmond, continued to be the law-agents of the trustees until 1871, in which year the trustees closed their accounts with Messrs Edmond, and received up the trust papers. John Watt junior appears at the time, and until the present questions arose, to have been the law-agent and adviser of several members of the family of John M'Pherson, and particularly of his daughter, Mrs Black, and of his son, H. J. M'Pherson, Jessie M'Pherson and Ann M'Pherson, the defenders.

"5. After 1871 comparatively little law-agency was required in connection with the trust. H. J. M'Pherson, who had, along with his father, Ann and Jessie M'Pherson (the trustees), succeeded his father in business as combmaker, seems to have managed the trust-property, letting the houses, levying the rents, and drawing the interest of the trust. When the services of a law-agent, however, were required, John Watt junior was the person employed, and, in particular, about the year 1872, some railway stock to the amount of between £2000 and £3000, having been sold, the said John Watt junior, on the employment of the trustees, invested the proceeds in bonds heritably secured over the property of other two clients of his own, named respectively 'Shearman & M'Gregor.' The instructions to procure the investment were given by H. J. M'Pherson to John Watt junior, who, although acting as agent for the borrowers in the transaction, yet acted equally as agent for the trustees of M'Pherson's trustees.

"6. In the year 1874 John Watt junior became tenant of one of the four houses in Ann Place (No. 4), which he has continued to occupy ever since, at all events until Whitsunday last, 1876.

"7. Under the settlement of John M'Pherson the whole of his erty was directed to be sold at or prior to Whitsunday 1877. The er part was sold in and before 1871, and by a family agreement made at year it was arranged that the unsold houses in Ann Place should eld by the trustees for behoof of the truster's second family, two of n are H. J. M'Pherson and his sister Mrs Black.

In the end of October 1875 H. J. M'Pherson had a meeting with Watt junior as his law-agent in reference to the investment of belonging to the trustees under his own marriage-contract, in the e of which Watt stated that good investments were not easily got as property was rising in value, whereupon H. J. M'Pherson said that as thinking of advertising the Ann Place trust property for sale.
 r the accounts of the interview given by Watt and by M'Pherson do materially differ; but they do materially differ in other respects.

Watt junior says * that not only at this meeting, but long before its M'Pherson had urged him (Watt) to buy the houses, as he was now t of one of them, and that he declined to do so, whereupon M'Pherson sked him if he knew any one likely to buy to tell them about the
 s. This story of Watt is not, in my opinion, a very probable one; having seen and heard both of the witnesses, I am inclined to adopt sion of the transaction given by M'Pherson,† who says that Watt

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.

Watt v.

M'Pherson's

Trustees,

et c contra.

the following is the evidence of John Watt junior :—" I first communicated brother, Dr Watt, the pursuer, as to the Ann Street property, after Mr rson had urged me to purchase it myself. I think that was about the October or beginning of November 1875. Mr M'Pherson had previously me to purchase it myself on more than one occasion. On the 9th October ed me if I would purchase the property. He told me first of all that he ed to raise the rents to £40, and said that I ought to buy the property.
 that I was not inclined to purchase at that time, and he then said that if l of any one wanting such a property I might let them know. That con-on took place about the end of October or beginning of November. I rote to my brother and told him about the property, stating that I thought d be a very fair investment. . . . Prior to that my brother in Darlington had ed me to buy some property at Yeat's Lane, Aberdeen. He wanted some investment, and it occurred to me then to write him on the subject. I ny brother accordingly. (Q.) When you first wrote to your brother pro-that he should purchase the block had it occurred to yourself to take the houses? (A.) I had never thought of that at all; if I had thought would have offered for the property myself. (Q.) Was it after your had agreed to buy the houses for the £1900 that it occurred to you?
 es; that I might get him to pass two of the houses to me, so that it alter my house to suit myself, by putting up an additional bed-the following is the evidence of Hugh James M'Pherson :—" (Q.) In the of 1875 was there a sum of £2000 of your marriage-contract funds to be d? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did you speak to Mr Watt about finding an investment (A.) Yes. (Q.) In the course of conversation on that subject was there any-id about selling the property in Ann Place? (A.) Nothing whatever. (Q.)

 id you first come to speak to Mr Watt about the sale of that property? (A.) id not find an investment for the £2000; he said that investments were were indeed, and that he had a lot of money lying in his hands to invest ats, but could not get properties over which to lend it, as they were going high in the market. He just casually mentioned that. As things were o high, and as we had to sell the Ann Street property in 1877, I said I think of advertising it for sale. (Q.) Did you do so? (A.) I did not;
 d me not to do so, as he thought he would be able to find a purchaser.
 out what time would this be? (A.) About the end of October, so far collect. (Q.) When did you next hear from him on the subject? (A.)

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

requested him not to advertise, because he thought he could find a chaser. Both witnesses, however, concur in saying that M'Pherson requested Watt to look out for a purchaser, and M'Pherson expressly said — 'I commissioned him to find a purchaser.' It is thus, as I think, proved that John Watt junior was employed or instructed on behalf of the trustees by H. J. M'Pherson, a beneficiary in the trust, and himself a client of Watt, to sell, or at least to procure a purchaser for the property.

"9. A day or two after this Watt called for M'Pherson and asked what price the houses would be sold. M'Pherson said that he thought each block of two houses should fetch from £1100 to £1200, but that he would take £2000 for the whole four. Watt objected to that price as excessive, but said that £1900 would be a fair price; and Watt then said that he had communicated on the subject with his brother, who had money to invest on heritable property, and would be prepared to give the price. M'Pherson then said to Watt if he would give a written offer on behalf of his brother he would advise the trustees to accept, and the offer and acceptance of 9th November 1875 were accordingly written out and exchanged.

"10. It happened that just as M'Pherson had received the offer the sisters (the defenders) called upon him at his place of business and shewed them the offer, and they, before authorising their brother to do anything of it, asked him whether the offer was truly for Dr Watt (the purchaser) and not for John Watt junior, saying if it was John Watt junior who was buying for himself they must have the advice of a neutral person. M'Pherson, who believed that the offer was truly for Dr Watt, advised the sisters the required assurance, and the offer as made was then by their authority accepted.

"11. Although the correspondence which passed between John Watt junior, in Aberdeen, and his brother, Dr Thomas Watt, in Darlington, in reference to the purchase, has all been destroyed, with the exception of a fragment in one letter, being the second which John Watt junior wrote to his brother on the subject, it is clearly proved by that fragment and by the admission both of Dr Watt and John Watt junior in the evidence, that before the offer of 9th November was written and signed by M'Pherson it had been proposed by John Watt junior, and agreed

Very soon afterwards. (Q.) Where was this? (A.) In my place of business. (Q.) Did he call upon you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What did he say? (A.) He said that he wanted for the houses, and I said I thought each double tenement would bring £1000 or £1200, but that I did not know the real value of the property. I then said I would take £2000. (Q.) What did he say? (A.) He would not hear of it; he told me that property of that description ought to return 7½ per cent, and he made a calculation shewing me that even if we got 10 per cent we would be a great deal better off. (Q.) Did he give you to understand he had a purchaser in view? (A.) He told me that he had his brother Dr Watt in view. What did he say about his brother? (A.) He said that his brother had money to invest, and wanted an investment in heritable property. He had told that before, and that his brother had told him to look out for an investment, but he did not say to what amount. He said he would buy the property for his brother. (Q.) Was that at £1900? (A.) There was no price mentioned. (Q.) At the time you had this conversation with him when you said you would take £2000, and he said he would not hear of it, but that £1900 might be given, did he say that he had communicated with his brother? (A.) Yes, he seemed to be able to close with the transaction. I said that if he would give me a written offer on behalf of his brother at that sum I would recommend the trustees to accept it."

pursuer, that two of the houses should be passed on by the pursuer to his brother at the price of £950, being half of £1900, the price of the whole four houses. The offer, therefore, for the whole houses which was made by John Watt junior, as in name of his brother, was truly, so far as regards two of the houses, an offer for behoof of himself, John Watt junior. This fact was concealed from, or at least was not communicated to, M'Pherson, or to the defenders, until some time after the acceptance.

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.

Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

12. The pursuer, Dr Watt, intended to purchase and retain two of the houses as an investment, but within a day or two of receiving the acceptance from M'Pherson, John Watt junior began to negotiate with other parties for a re-sale of the two houses, which were to be passed on to his brother, and the result was that, before the end of November, he had sold the houses to a person of the name of Robson, for the price of £1125, being an advance of £175 upon the price which he himself was to pay. Robson, again, within a day or two, sold one of the houses to Buickshank, the tenant thereof, for £600, being a further advance of £100. The price of £950, therefore, for half of the subjects, or £1900 for the whole, was plainly greatly below the true value of the property.

13. These circumstances were communicated by John Watt junior to M'Pherson, about or shortly after 19th November, and by M'Pherson (or some attempts at compromise) to his sisters, the defenders, and through M'Pherson, who seems to have been in ignorance as to the law of the case, was disposed at first to advise his sisters to submit to what undoubtedly was a bad bargain, these ladies themselves, on becoming aware of the facts, insisted upon the bargain being given up altogether, and at all events, upon the difference in price obtained by John Watt junior being paid to them. Both proposals were declined."

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th July 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:— "the reduction at the instance of the defenders, M'Pherson's trustees, and Thomas Watt, the pursuer of the original action of declarator, impleader, and damages, and against John Watt junior, advocate in Aberdeen, which has been held as repeated in this process, reduces, decerns, and decrees in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and in the said original action assoilzies the defenders, M'Pherson's trustees, from the said conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the said Thomas Watt and John Watt junior liable in expenses in both actions," &c.*

NOTE.—(After stating the result of the evidence as quoted supra, p. 604, et seq.—Such being the state of the facts proved, the question is whether the purchase was sustained to any, and, if so, to what extent? Now, although it was made in the name of Thomas Watt, it was truly, to the extent of one-half, made by his brother, John Watt jun., who was not only the law-agent of the trustees and beneficiaries as individuals, but was, on his own suggestion, engaged, as law-agent of the trustees, with the duty of finding a purchaser for the property. But the important fact that Watt was thus buying for himself was, as we have said, not communicated to the sellers. It may be conceded to the pursuer that a purchase by an agent is not illegal in the sense in which a purchase of trust property by a trustee is illegal. But it is a transaction which the law regards, and rightly regards, with jealousy, and, in order to justify such a case when challenged, an agent who has bought the property of his client—events, when he has been employed to sell that property—must come into the case with clean hands, and must shew that his client was acting with full information upon every material matter, and that the price was adequate. The rule was very clearly stated by Lord Eldon in the House of Lords in the leading case of Cane v. Allen (2 Dow's App. 289)—"If one not employed before an attorney was employed for the sale of an estate, and advised his employer to buy it to himself (the attorney), the Courts of Equity would say, "The

No. 93. Dr Thomas Watt and John Watt junior reclaimed.¹
At advising,—

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of Dr Thomas Watt against nature of your employment was such as rendered it incumbent on you to give the best advice to your employer ;" and unless he withdrew from that connection, or put himself completely at arm's length, he must shew, in case the contract be questioned, that he had given the same disinterested advice that is naturally would have given if the contract had been made with another party. Now, it is clear that John Watt jun., the true purchaser of at least half of the property, has failed to shew that the transaction comes within the rule laid down by Lord Eldon. He did not close the confidential relation between him and his clients, or hold his clients at arm's length, and he did not give them disinterested advice. On the contrary, he dissuaded them from advertising the property for sale by public auction, thereby preventing fair and open competition for the property. He suggested that he himself should look out for a purchaser, at a price considerably lower than that which his clients thought should be asked ; and he moreover, concealed from them the important fact that he was the real, though his brother was the ostensible purchaser. By means of this concealment he threw his clients off their guard, and induced them to believe that he was protecting their interests as their agent ; and it is certain that if they had known the fact which Watt thus concealed they would have called in the services of a neutral agent. And further, the price is greatly less than the true value. In any case, if within a week or two of the contract, Watt, without trouble, and without delay, without much desiring to resell, disposed of the property privately at a profit of upwards of 20 per cent, the presumption is that, at a public sale by trustees, a still larger price would have been realised. It is in vain to say, the pursuer does, that the property was valued in 1871 at £1860 ; that a purchaser could not be found for it in that year at £1900 ; and that a solicitor or conveyancer from Aberdeen is of opinion that £1900 is the fair price now. The onus of proving adequacy of price at the date of sale rests with the pursuer, and he has not discharged that onus. The valuation of 1871 forms no safe test of the value in 1876, and the profit made by John Watt jun. in this transaction is real evidence that the price at which he purchased was inadequate. I think that the presumption is very strong that, had the defenders known that he was the purchaser, and employed, as they would then have done, a neutral agent to attend to their interest, a very much larger price would have been obtained. The sale therefore—at all events, in so far as John Watt jun. was personally interested therein—cannot be sustained. But apart from these considerations I think that the mere concealment of the fact that J. Watt was himself a purchaser is of itself sufficient to vitiate and annul the sale at all events, in so far as regards the houses purchased for himself. This doctrine is implied, if not expressed, in the opinions of the Judges in Gourlay's Trustees v. Kerr (6th June 1857, 19 D. 789), and it has repeatedly been made manifest by decisions in England—see Woodhouse v. Meredith (1st March 1820, 1 Jacob & Walker, 204). Charter v. Trevelyan (5th September 1844, 11 Cl. & F. 714)—where such concealment was held sufficient to set aside a purchase by an agent after the lapse of thirty-seven years ; and in Lewis v. Hillman (2nd March 1852, 3 Clark, 607), when the Lord Chancellor (St Leonards) said—

¹ Edwards v. Meyrick, 1842, 2 Hare's Chan. Rep. 60 ; Woodhouse v. Meredith, 1820, 1 Jacob and Walker, 204 ; Charter v. Trevelyan, 1844, 11 Cl. & F. 714 ; Cane v. Allen, May 16, 1814, 2 Dow's App. 289 ; Cunningham v. Lee, Nov. 13, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 83 ; Grieve v. Cunningham, Dec. 17, 1878 Macph. 317, 42 Scot. Jur. 140 ; Harris v. Robertson, Feb. 16, 1864, 2 Macph. 664, 36 Scot. Jur. 333 ; Gourlay's Trustees v. Kerr, Dec. 6, 1856, 19 D. 789, 29 Scot. Jur. 64 ; Blaikie Brothers v. Aberdeen Rail. Co., Nov. 19, 1854, 17 D. 66, 24 Scot. Jur. 49, rev. July 20, 1854, 17 D. (H. of L.) 20, 1 Macph. 26 Scot. Jur. 622.

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

the trustees of the late John M'Pherson, manufacturer in Aberdeen, for the purpose of enforcing a contract of sale of four houses in Ann Place, Aberdeen, belonging to the trust-estate, alleged to have been concluded by Hugh James Watt junior, the pursuer, on behalf of the trustees, the sellers, and John Watt junior, the pursuer's brother, on behalf of the pursuer, as the buyer. The defence against this action is, that the contract founded on was in reality a contract under which, the pursuer alone, but his brother, John Watt junior, also was the purchaser; that his brother being at the time the agent of the sellers, and the fact of being himself the purchaser to the extent of one-half of the subjects being concealed from his clients, the contract is invalid. To give effect to this defence a motion of reduction of the missives of sale was raised by M'Pherson's trustees, and held as repeated.

As to the law applicable to such a case, there is very little doubt. It is not lawful for a law-agent to purchase from a client. But he must do so openly without disguise, and even then he is under the necessity of shewing that the bargain was fair, the price adequate, and all the conditions of the transaction such as a law-agent would have advised his client to agree to in the ordinary course of business. If he fails in this he is liable to have the transaction set aside. There is another rule equally well established. If a law-agent puts should lay it down as a rule, my Lords, that ought never to be departed from, if an attorney or agent can shew he is entitled to purchase, yet, if instead of openly purchasing, he purchases in the name of a trustee or agent without disclosing the fact, no such purchase as that can stand for a single moment. In a transaction, to stand, must be open and fair, and free from all objection. If a man purchases, as these appellants purchased, by putting forward a name of his own, not as a clerk, not as an agent, but as an actual bona fide purchaser upon an absolute and independent contract, he does that which, the law as it is stated, renders the deed powerless for the purpose for which it was made and executed, and the Court will hold the parties responsible for everything that results from it. If, therefore, a bill had been filed, and this contract had been attempted to be set up, and it had come before your Lordships, I can assure you that you would have rescinded that contract, and thrown the costs of the proceedings upon the parties who had entered into it.

Such being the rule of law applicable to cases like the present, it is clear the decree must be reduced—at all events, so far as regards the houses purchased for John Watt junior, and that, to that extent, the pursuer, Thomas Watt, cannot demand implement of the contract. The question remains whether the pursuer can stand as regards the two houses retained by himself, or can be enforced to that extent. That question is not free from difficulty, but I have felt myself constrained to hold that the contract cannot be enforced to any extent. The offer which was accepted was an offer by, or rather in name of, Dr Thomas Watt for the purchase of four houses at a lump sum. It was accepted by the pursuer on the footing that he, and he alone, was the purchaser. But as the fact turns out to be vitiated in an important respect by the concealment of which the pursuer himself was aware before the offer was written and signed, and which he ought to have inserted, or caused to be inserted, in the deed he must take the consequences of his own want of care. He must be responsible for the improper concealment on the part of his brother, especially as it cannot be doubted that if, on the 9th November 1875, the defenders had ever stated that John Watt junior was personally interested in the purchase the contract would not have been accepted. The result of the whole case, therefore, is that the reduction which the defenders have been allowed to repeat in this case, decree setting aside the missives must be pronounced; and in the obligation of declarator and implement, the defenders, M'Pherson's trustees, are absolved, with expenses."

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

forward some person to buy for him then the sale is bad, without proving any inadequacy of the price or other objectionable condition. It is a piece of deception which an agent is not entitled to practise, and which is in the eye of the law a fraud.

If the present case belongs to either, it belongs to the latter category. For the allegation of M'Pherson's trustees is, that the original contract was completed on the assumption that Dr Watt was the sole purchaser, while in truth he was only such to the extent of one-half, while his brother, the defenders' agent, was purchaser on his own account to the extent of the other half. The case, therefore, turns entirely on the question of fact, whether John Watt junior was or was not the agent of the sellers.

Now, the statement that John Watt junior was the sellers' law-agent may have a double meaning. It may mean that he was the general law-agent of M'Pherson's trustees, or that he was their law-agent constituted for this particular transaction. Proof that he occupied either of these positions would be sufficient to let in the legal rule which I have already stated.

Now, was he the ordinary law-agent of the trustees? I apprehend that the question must be answered in the negative. He never was the regularly constituted agent of the trustees. On two occasions in regard to some small incidental matters he does indeed appear to have acted for the trust. In 1871 there was an entry in his books, by which John M'Pherson's trustees are debited with the cost of drawing a discharge by Mr Black's marriage-contract trustees to the trust. In that matter it is clear that he was acting as law-agent of the trust. Again in 1872, there is another small piece of business transacted by him. The trustees were about to lend a sum of money on heritable security, and the borrowers were clients of Mr Watt. The trustees paid the sum to be lent into the hands of John Watt, and he paid it over to the borrowers, and from that time he continued to pay to the trustees the interest accruing on the money so lent. Now, no doubt in this transaction, up to a certain point, he was acting as agent for the trustees—the lending of the money was an act of the trustees performed by the hand of John Watt. But that was the whole amount of what he did as agent for the trustees. In the subsequent payment of interest he was acting as agent for the borrowers. These are the only occasions on which Mr Watt ever acted as agent for the trustees. It was indeed represented that he was the law-agent of many of the beneficiaries, but that did not make him the agent of the trust, or put him at all in an equivalent position. No doubt some of the beneficiaries under the trust were entitled to expect his assistance and rely on his advice in the conduct of their own affairs. But to make him agent for the sellers it must be shown that he was in the position of adviser of the trustees,—that he was the agent to whom they were in the habit of recurring for advice, and on whom they were to rely for guidance in their dealings in the trust affairs and estate.

The next question is, whether Mr Watt was specially constituted the law-agent in this particular transaction;—whether he was employed by the trustees to sell this property, or took upon himself the duty of so doing? The allegation on this subject made by the defenders, M'Pherson's trustees, in the third article of their statement of facts is very important—(Reads third article of defenders' statement of facts). The case of the defenders, therefore, is, that the position of John Watt junior here was that of agent for both parties, and that he acted for both parties in making a personal contract of sale, not in carrying through a piece of conveyancing, or doing anything requiring any special legal knowledge.

ige. I confess I have considerable difficulty in understanding how one No. 93. can be agent for two parties in a matter of that kind. When two parties are about to enter into a contract of sale, what they have to fix Mar. 2, 1877.
 the price, and, except in particular circumstances, nothing else. There Watt v.
 may be some conditions necessary to be stipulated. But in ordinary cases the M'Pherson's personal contract of sale means nothing more than this, that the purchaser agrees Trustees, to give, and the seller to take, a certain price for a certain subject. How any et c contra.
 man can act as the agent for both parties in adjusting the price I fail to understand. I can conceive a man adjusting the price between an intending purchaser and seller in the capacity of arbiter, but not of agent. It is quite a different thing if an agent undertakes to do the conveyancing work for both lender and purchaser, or to prepare the deeds of security in the case of a loan amply secured. I can quite well understand one man acting as agent for lender and lender in a loan transaction, for there the personal contract is made beforehand, the parties having agreed to borrow and to lend. The common agent's duty to the one is to examine the security, and to draw the bond; to the other, to revise the bond when drawn. If he acts with due care and attention he can quite well do his duty by both. But how a man can be brought into the field at an earlier period as common agent for both parties I do not see.

But on looking into the circumstances it is plain that not only is the position of common agent for both parties in the personal contract of sale a legal impossibility, but that no such duty was ever intended to be imposed on Mr Watt in the present case. Mr M'Pherson was in the active management of the whole of the affairs; the trustees having no personal interest in the trust-estate, left the management of it very much in Mr M'Pherson's hands. He goes to his friend Watt, and in the course of conversation he mentions that the houses are for sale. What is the rejoinder of Mr Watt? "Don't advertise them, for some of mine will very probably purchase them." The matter stands over for a few days, and then Mr Watt produces a purchaser in the person of his brother.

 Now, two, M'Pherson and Watt, then set about adjusting the price. Now, when men set to work to fix the price of a subject which is being sold it cannot be said that one is the agent of the other. M'Pherson asks £2000; Watt thinks too much, and proceeds to lay before M'Pherson calculations to shew that £1000 is a fair offer. He offers that sum, and it is accepted. Now, that is what is making a bargain. There must be two parties to a bargain, and here we have two—Mr M'Pherson and Mr Watt—and the one cannot be the agent of the other in making the bargain. Missives of sale were afterwards exchanged.
 How do they stand? The offer is made by Watt professedly on behalf of his brother, and accepted by M'Pherson on behalf of, and after consultation with the trustees. How, in these circumstances, it can be said that Watt was acting as agent of the trustees I confess myself quite unable to understand. In truth, both parties to the sale were represented by agents, and by them the transaction was completed. It turns out that Mr Watt was buying in part for himself, but there is nothing wrong in that, unless he was or professed to be agent for the trustees. It was perfectly indifferent to the seller who was the purchaser, provided he paid the price for which he stipulated. Unless they can make out that Watt was acting as their agent the defence is at an end, and I confess that I have without difficulty to the conclusion that the character of agency is in no way established. The result will be, that we recall the Lord Ordinary's inter-

No. 93. locutor, decern in favour of the pursuer in the original action, and assolvie in the reduction.

Mar. 2, 1877.

Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c. contra.

LORD DEAS.—I confess when I first read the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor a note I was somewhat carried away by his reasoning in favour of the judgment. But after a careful consideration of the argument and proof I have become satisfied that the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived is the correct one.

A law-agent stands in a peculiar position. He is not disqualified from purchasing the property of his client, but if he does so he is subject to a certain presumption which he must overcome by shewing that the transaction was a bona fide one, and that no advantage was taken by him of his confidential position. In order to raise that presumption it is, in the first instance, necessary to shew that the position of the purchaser was truly that of law-agent for the seller or sellers. Now, I am of opinion that there is no evidence that, up to or at the time of this transaction, Mr Watt was in the position of law-agent for the seller or Mr M'Pherson's trustees.

The trusters died in 1867. The only surviving and acting trustees are the two unmarried daughters of the truster, who now pursue this action. I have a brother, Mr Hugh James M'Pherson, a manufacturer carrying on a large business in Aberdeen, manages for them the affairs of the trust, and attends to their individual interests. The late Mr Edmond, a well-known advocate in Aberdeen, acted as law-agent for the trust as long as a law-agent was required. In October 1871 Mr Edmond's accounts were demanded and settled by Mr Hugh James M'Pherson, to whom Mr Edmond delivered up the trust papers, which were not said ever to have been placed in the hands of any other law-agent. Hugh James M'Pherson was well acquainted with everything connected with the trust from the outset, and quite capable of attending to whatever required to be attended to after the agency was taken from Mr Edmond. It appears to me that, from the time the papers were given up by Mr Edmond, there was no actual law-agent for the trust at all. One or two incidental matters were done for the trustees, as your Lordship has noticed, by John Watt junior, but these certainly did not amount to regular agency on behalf of the trustees, and I am clearly of opinion that unless Mr Watt was employed as agent for the trust in the particular transaction now in dispute there is nothing like the evidence which the law requires to establish agency on the part of Mr Watt at all.

The question therefore comes to be, Whether Mr Watt was employed as agent for the trust in this particular transaction? Now, that depends entirely on the evidence of Mr M'Pherson and Mr Watt. I confess that, in looking carefully at the proof, I am not able to say that I have greater confidence in the statements of Mr M'Pherson than in those of Mr Watt. It is in evidence that, prior to the transaction altogether, Mr M'Pherson had offered to sell the property directly to Mr Watt. This Mr M'Pherson denies, but I think it is satisfactorily proved against him. It may be that he has forgotten the circumstance, but the improbability of that does not increase one's confidence in the rest of his evidence. I entirely agree with your Lordship, that Mr M'Pherson's acquiescence in Mr Watt's suggestion, that he might find a purchaser among his own clients, does not establish the employment of Mr Watt as agent for the trustees to sell the property. Mr M'Pherson was of opinion that a sale was essential, and he was quite competent to judge of the value of the property. On the question of value, indeed, there was really not much difference of opinion between them. M'Pherson ady to sell at £2000, and Watt to buy at £1900. This difference as to the ice was in noways remarkable, and M'Pherson, with his eyes open, deliberately cepted Watt's offer. No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

If, then, Mr Watt was neither general agent for the trust, nor special agent employed to sell that property, he was just in the position of an ordinary independent third party. What, then, did the law lay upon him? I do not say it a man in that position may not make himself liable to have such a transaction set aside. But that would require the case to be brought up to a case of fraud. If the Lord Ordinary had thought that was the sort of case, he would no doubt have sent it to a jury. That was obviously not done only because the case was represented to him at the bar as involving an important question of agency.

I am disposed to think there is no such question in the case.

Laying aside that question there remained certainly some things in Mr Watt's conduct not quite satisfactory. He did not explain to Mr M'Pherson that he had himself take two of the houses off his brother's hands. But that seems to be quite inadequate in the circumstances as proof of fraud against a person standing in the position of a mere friend or ordinary third party, even where he had helped to find the desired purchaser.

For what, on the other hand, was the position of Mr M'Pherson in relation to the trustees and the trust property? I think the case is really to be viewed as if M'Pherson had been selling his own property. Everything was entrusted to him by his sisters. Though they were the trustees, they devolved the whole trust management upon him. They allowed him to sell the trust property at his pleasure, without applying to either of them for instructions. He did not know, and never inquired, who was law-agent under the trust, or whether there was a law-agent at all. They signed whatever papers M'Pherson presented before them, without reading them. In short, they made him virtually trustee, and whatever he did for the trust is just, I think, as binding as if it had been done for himself. Now, if Mr M'Pherson had been selling his own property could he have said that Watt had practised on him a successful fraud, only because Watt had not told him that he was purchasing in part for himself? I cannot think so. No doubt Watt afterwards resold his half of the houses at a profit. But there is equally little doubt that when he bought he had no intention of reselling. He was tempted to sell only by an unlooked-for increase of a profit. He made no concealment about that offer nor about his intention to resell in consequence of it. What he did was at once to tell M'Pherson about it. M'Pherson advised him not to take the offer, and why? Not because he thought the original transaction objectionable or invalid, but because he anticipated some reflection from his sisters as to the price he had got for the houses if they should hear of a resale at a higher price. Then there came a proposal by M'Pherson of a loan over the houses of part of his marriage-act funds to be made to the purchaser on the footing that the purchase was to be effected. The negotiation on that subject went on—M'Pherson insisting the loan being carried out, and ultimately exacting a penalty from the purchaser for letting him off. Success in this exaction seems to have suggested to him that he might in like manner exact a penalty from Mr Watt by impeaching the sale as illegal. A considerable period, however, elapsed before this suggestion of illegality was made. M'Pherson now tells us that his sisters complained to him of the unfairness of the transaction, and that hence arose the

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

present challenge. But it is quite clear that it was M'Pherson himself who suggested the challenge, and that he did so in precisely the same state of knowledge he had been in all along. It was not because he had been advised that the sale was illegal, for he had taken no advice on the subject. It was because he thought he might get Watt to buy off the objection, which, as Watt's brother observed in one of his letters, could not have been done without a sacrifice of professional character.

Looking to all M'Pherson's means of knowledge, I think that if this case had been tried as a case of fraud at common law the challenge could not have succeeded, and for the reasons I have stated I do not think it involves the element of professional agency.

LORD MURE.—The main if not the only question here raised is one of fact, viz, whether Mr Watt was the law-agent for the defenders, M'Pherson's trustees, at the time this purchase was made; either as being general agent for the trustees, or as being employed to act for the trustees in this particular transaction. If he was, the sale, in so far as made to himself, would not be a valid sale; because he does not appear to have informed the defenders, before the sale was made, that two of the four houses would be acquired by himself. But I think it right to add that even in that event there would, in my opinion, be no grounds sufficient at law, at least there are none set forth in this record, in respect of which Dr Watt could be called upon to give up the two houses bought on his own account.

Now, as regards the agency of Mr Watt, I am of opinion, upon the evidence that he was not at the time of the sale, and never had been, general agent for the trust, although he may have occasionally been employed to do what was trust business, when Mr Edmond was agent for the trustees. But when Mr Edmond ceased to act as agent for the trust Mr Watt was not appointed agent and the trust business, which seems to have consisted chiefly of looking after and drawing the rents of the houses in question, was managed by the brother of the defenders. Neither do I think that there is evidence to shew that Mr Watt was employed to act for the defenders in the sale of these houses. In the third statement of facts, referred to by your Lordship in the chair, that is what is alleged. It is, on the contrary, there stated that the correspondence relative to the sale passed between him and "Mr Hugh M'Pherson as representing the defenders;" while all that is alleged is that the defenders understood Mr Watt as acting as agent for the sellers as well as the purchaser—that is, as agent for both parties. Now, as regards this alleged acting for both parties, I agree with the observations made by your Lordship in the chair. An agent may, and doubt does frequently, act for both parties in the preparation of the deeds relative to a loan of money, or even to a sale. But with reference to the fixing of the price at which a property is to be sold, I confess I do not very well see how the same agent can act for both seller and purchaser, except as referee. Even as acting for the seller it is his duty to get as high a price as he can, while acting for the buyer it is his duty to keep down the price. Now, in this action Mr Watt was admittedly acting as agent for the pursuer, Dr Watt; and was thus in an antagonistic position to Mr M'Pherson, who is not only stated in the record, but appears from his own account of what passed relative to the price at which the properties were to be acquired, to have in that matter represented the defenders. This is made pretty clear, I think, from Mr M'Pherson's account of what took place at the meeting after Dr Watt had authorized other to purchase the property. At that meeting an agreement was ultimately made as to the price which was to be paid for the houses, which was at £1900, and as to which Mr M'Pherson says,—“ I said that if he would give me a written offer on behalf of his brother at that sum I would recommend the trustees to accept it.” This was accordingly done, and the written offer and acceptance set forth on the record, and which are dated on the day after that meeting, bear expressly, the one to be made by Mr Watt as acting for his brother, while the acceptance is by Mr M'Pherson as acting for the defenders. In these circumstances I have been unable to come to the conclusion that Mr Watt was employed to act for the defenders in the sale of the properties in question.

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion, differing from your Lordships, that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that John Watt junior cannot take benefit by the tract of 9th November 1875, made in name of his brother with M'Pherson's trustees.

I think with the Lord Ordinary that it has been proved that in procuring a purchaser and effecting a sale of the houses in question Watt professed to act, and did act, as agent for the defenders; and that on this ground, apart from his position as a trustee under the deeds, which I shall immediately notice, he is precluded from taking the benefit of a contract which, though entered into in his brother's name, was to a material extent for his own behoof. The proofs show that an intimate business relation subsisted between Watt and the various members of the family who had the beneficial interest in the houses. Watt was law-agent for every member of this family personally, and his relation to them individually is, I think, of importance in ascertaining his relation to the trust under which they were either trustees or beneficiaries, and which materially enters into the question as to the position he assumed when Mr M'Pherson first spoke to him with reference to the sale of these properties. He was law-agent for the two ladies who, as trustees, are the defenders here, in their personal business. In his evidence he explains that he was consulted in connection with Mrs M'Pherson's executry; that he acted for Miss M'Pherson in arranging the transfer in her favour of two small properties, one at Woodside, the other in James Street, Aberdeen, and that he continued to draw the rents of these properties for her. So recently as the spring of 1875,—a few months before the transaction here challenged,—on the employment of the two ladies, given through their brother, he carried through a service in their favour as agents of their brother George, and had them also decerned as executrices to the family estate. He acted for Mrs Black, another sister, in preparing her marriage-contract. He was Mr Hugh James M'Pherson's ordinary and only law-agent, and advised him as to his contract of copartnership and contract of marriage. From the second statement of facts for the defenders, and the answer, it further appears that Mr Watt was (1) a trustee under Mrs M'Pherson's trust-deed, and law-agent for that trust; and (2) was also trustee and law-agent under Mrs Black's marriage-contract. Mrs Black is one of the beneficiaries who has, under her father's deed of settlement, a direct interest in these properties; and from the statement and answer just referred to it appears that M'Pherson's trust has also an interest in the property. Mr M'Pherson's deed of settlement has not been printed, nor has it been made clear what the nature of the interest of these beneficiaries is; but it may well be (as seems to

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

be pointed at in the third plea in law for the defenders) that the transaction might be successfully challenged on the ground that it was Mr Watt's duty, trustee for certain of the beneficiaries, to see that the largest possible price was got for the property, while in becoming the purchaser his interest was to take it at the lowest price for which he could obtain it. In the absence of direct information as to the interest which these trust-estates had in the property I cannot say more on this point than that it appears to me it might of itself be really decisive of the case. But at all events, Mr Watt's confidential relation to the various parties interested here is, in my opinion, an important consideration in determining his position, and as throwing light on the relation in which he stood in this particular transaction, having regard to the ground on which the case was decided by the Lord Ordinary.

In regard to this particular trust, it appears that in 1871 Mr Edmond's agency for the trust ceased, and such trust business as required an agent's intervention—which was admittedly little—was transacted through Mr Watt. He prepared the discharge in favour of the trust by Mrs Black, and arranged and completed the securities in favour of the trust for a sum of £2250 in 1871, and I think Mr Watt had substantially superseded Mr Edmond as law-agent of the trust, and would in that character, for example, have carried through the conveyances of the houses in question, if no dispute had arisen about them.

That being the relation of Mr Watt to the parties, what position did M'Pherson occupy or assume in this matter? I confess I am unable to assist you with your Lordships in thinking that he held any position like that of a law-agent, or such as to suggest that he was not, as occasion required, to take the benefit of the advice of a law-agent. His business was that of a comb-maker, and his own account appears to me a natural one, when he says in one part of his evidence, that in attending to business matters for his sisters he was simply acting as one of the family, and not as an agent, and in another, that he acted as their mouthpiece as a rule. I take it that his position was one common enough in everyday life—that of a brother aiding his sisters in business matters, and, amongst others, acting for them in communicating with their agent on their behalf.

How, then, was the transaction in question entered into? Mr M'Pherson having called on Mr Watt with reference to legal business connected with his own marriage-trust, the subject of this house property, which Mr Watt knew belonged to his sisters as trustees, came up in conversation. Mr M'Pherson said that as the houses had to be realised before 1877 he was thinking of advertising them for sale. Mr Watt replied,—“Don't do that, for I think I can find you a purchaser.” The account of the two parties, Mr Watt and M'Pherson, as to what took place between them does not materially differ, that seems to be the gist of it. Now, that is not the case of a friend or independent third party in a casual way saying,—“Don't advertise the property, for I think I can find you a purchaser.” It is not even the case of a law-agent saying “I think I can find you a purchaser among my clients.” In view of the relation in which Mr Watt stood to Mr M'Pherson personally, and to the other members of the family, Mr M'Pherson was, I think, entitled to assume, as I think he did assume, that Watt, as agent of the trust, and in view as undertaking to act for the parties interested, was to endeavour to find a purchaser for the property, and that, in disposing of it, M'Pherson would take the benefit of Mr Watt's experience and of his disinterested advice. If ht in this, it appears to me to follow that Mr Watt, after what subsequently No. 93.

k place, cannot take benefit by the transaction in question.

As to the law on the subject there is no difficulty. The Lord Ordinary states Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.
quite correctly when he says,—“It may be conceded to the pursuer that a chase by an agent is not illegal in the sense in which a purchase of trust perty by a trustee is illegal. But it is a transaction which the law regards, rightly regards, with jealousy, and, in order to justify such a purchase when lleged, an agent who has bought the property of his client—at all events n he has been employed to sell that property—must come into Court with n hands, and must shew that his client was acting with full information n every material matter, and that the price was adequate.” He must shew he has “given the same disinterested advice that he naturally would have n if the contract had been made with another party.” That is so when the it is openly and avowedly transacting for himself. If, however, an agent eals the fact that he is himself the purchaser, and purchases in the name of her, the purchase is illegal and bad.

hat being the law, and Mr M'Pherson and Mr Watt having separated on footing I have above stated, what happened next? Mr Watt came to Mr herson at his place of business a few days afterwards, and said, “I have d you a purchaser.” Had Mr Watt said, “I propose purchasing myself,” t would have been the result? Mr M'Pherson would naturally and most ably have said, “If that is the case, I shall take time for consideration, and ably put the matter into the hands of another agent;” and his sisters say would certainly have consulted another legal adviser. It would have been proper that Mr Watt should have suggested to M'Pherson to do so. And if he had declined, and Mr Watt had made a bargain avowedly on his own ant, it would have been necessary for him to shew, if the transaction were enged, that he gave “full information” and fair and “disinterested advice” r M'Pherson. But nothing like this was done. All that Watt said was, ave found a purchaser for you in the person of my brother.” Suppose, after had taken place at the previous meeting, Watt had simply got a friend or t of his own to give him his name in the purchase, or suppose Watt had hased for a client at the reduced price of £1900, on condition of getting for elf, as a bonus on the transaction, the additional £100 of price which Mr herson wanted, I cannot think he could have retained benefits so obtained.
ld he, then, in the cases supposed, have been in any different position from resent? I think not. When Watt came to M'Pherson to resume nego-ns about the sale, M'Pherson, having regard to the relation which subsisted een them, and to what had occurred at the previous meeting, was, I think, led to assume, and did assume, that Watt would give him full information lisinterested advice in the matter.

ind no difficulty in realising the position of an agent acting for both buyer eller in a contract of sale. It is a thing, I apprehend, of daily occurrence.
rings seller and purchaser together; he assists in adjusting the price by telling hat he thinks he should take, and the other what he thinks he should give. doing he does not act or profess to act as an arbiter, but as an agent giving nation and disinterested advice to each party. After the personal contract le is made the agent in such circumstances acts for both parties in com-ig the transference by preparing the necessary deeds. Where the subject s not a large or important one, and the title simple, this is a very common

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1877.
Watt v.
M'Pherson's
Trustees,
et c contra.

occurrence, and both parties are entitled to get their common agent's disinterested advice and assistance in the transaction. There is no substantial difference that I can see between the case of seller and purchaser, and borrower and lender, where one agent often acts for both parties in arranging the terms of the loan and the security to be given. In neither case is the mere examination of documents and making up of titles the whole duty devolving on the agent of either party.

I have no difficulty, then, in conceiving of one man acting as common agent for both seller and purchaser. But the agent who holds that position occupies a position of considerable delicacy. He is not an arbiter bound to decide between the parties, but an agent who is bound by his employment to give disinterested advice and assistance to both, and in the whole transaction he must be perfectly straightforward, and shew perfect candour.

What, then, did Mr Watt, who was occupying that position, do? He bowed down for his brother, and concealed the fact that he himself was purchaser to the extent of one-half. What was his object in so acting? No object has been suggested in the argument, or occurs to me, except that of concealment with a view to obtaining a personal benefit, which otherwise he might not have gained. He concealed the fact that he was himself purchaser to the extent of half of the property, because he feared that if he disclosed this it would likely result in the transaction, or, at least, result in transferring the agency for the sale to some independent party, which would, in all probability, lead the sellers to insist on a price above that at which he wished to purchase. He had clearly a motive for excluding the interference of any independent party. It is true he did not apparently then mean to sell the two houses he was to acquire. But he had already, in writing to his brother, recorded his opinion that M'Pherson should sell the houses separately, and not as one property, in order to get their full value. When he himself came, within a month, to resell his two houses, he pressed the same view on the proposing purchaser, reminding him of the advantage to be got by advertising the houses separately for sale. The correctness of this opinion was amply demonstrated by the increased prices of £215 which the houses brought within a very short time. That was an opinion the advantage of which the sellers were entitled to get from Mr Watt had he acted as I think he was bound to do.

It is said that Mr Watt, at the meeting between himself and M'Pherson at which the sale was arranged, took up an antagonistic position. As acting for another client, he told M'Pherson that the price he was asking was too high and that he could not give more than £1900, and so far, it is true, his position was to a certain extent antagonistic. But if he was not truly acting for a client in the whole transaction why did he say he was? It was quite reasonable, as acting for another client as purchaser, he should tell M'Pherson that £1900 was all he could offer, and advise M'Pherson that it was an offer he should refuse if that was his real opinion. M'Pherson would act in the belief that he had the benefit of the disinterested advice of an agent acting for both parties. But it was not permissible that Watt should assume this position when he was himself truly the purchaser of half the property, and concealing that fact.

I adopt, then, the statement in article 3 for the defenders as proved, that in this transaction Mr M'Pherson and the defenders understood that Mr John M'Pherson junior was acting as agent for the sellers as well as the purchaser, as he was facto acting." And holding that view, I am of opinion that as Mr Watt was facto purchasing for himself the sale is in law invalid.

here are one or two minor points which I shall now shortly notice, as they No. 93.
 been founded on as conflicting with the view I have expressed.

here is, first, the form of the missives of sale which are addressed to and ed by Mr Watt and Mr M'Pherson, and are expressed in terms not incon-nt with the latter being agent for the trustees, and which are said to be irre-ileable with the view of Mr Watt being agent for both seller and purchaser.

Mar. 2, 1877.
 Watt v.
 M'Pherson's
 Trustees,
et c contra.

not think that that criticism is sound. It was necessary that there should igned missives, and in signing on the one side Mr Watt acted as he would done for an absent purchaser. Mr M'Pherson, on the other hand, being ent, signed as seller, or on behalf of the sellers, as he would have done if he been himself the seller acting on Mr Watt's advice. It was just as if the es M'Pherson had themselves signed the missives at Mr Watt's table.

ere are next the actings of the parties after the sale, and particularly Mr erson's conduct as affecting his credibility. It is said that, had there been dishonest purpose on the part of Mr Watt, he would not have so soon dis-d the fact that he was himself the purchaser. But Mr Watt had either to ose the fact immediately, or run the risk of some one else disclosing it for

For, as the properties which Watt bought were very soon the subject of tations for a resale, and were resold, he could not have kept it concealed.
 , as to Mr M'Pherson's negotiating as to making a loan on the security of roperty out of funds belonging to his marriage-contract trustees, I think he accounts for this. The position he took up, quite consistently, was this, he always thought the transaction unfair from the time he learnt Watt's connection with it, but was not aware until some time had elapsed that was any legal remedy. In the meantime he acted as he naturally would do, ured to make the best of what seemed to him a bad business. I think, fore, that his conduct in this respect is quite explained ; but I may further t appears to me to have no real bearing on the case, and that if any question rise as to credibility I should accept the view expressed by the Lord Ord-who had the advantage of seeing the witnesses.

the remaining point of the case, as to whether or not the sale should be ide as against Dr Watt as well as against his brother, John Watt junior, I ain great doubt as to there being sufficient ground for setting aside the transaction. It is not proved that Dr Watt was aware either that his er was agent for the trustees, who were the sellers, or that he was conceal-om them that he was himself in part the purchaser. Dr Watt was ignorant th these facts, and, therefore, I think that there is not the same ground for g aside the sale as against him. But though the transaction with him may lid, I think the trustees are entitled to recover any benefit their agent stipu-for, and was to receive, and are therefore entitled to recover the two houses h Dr Watt purchased really as a trustee for his brother.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Recall the said interlocutor of 4th July 1876 : Repel the reasons of reduction : Assoilzie the defenders, Thomas Watt and John Watt junior, from the conclusions of the summons of reduction, and decern. In the declarator, find, declare, and decern against the defenders, Ann M'Pherson and Jessie or Janet M'Pherson, as trustees, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons : Find the pursuer and defenders, Thomas Watt and John Watt junior, entitled to expenses in both actions hitherto incurred ; allow accounts thereof to be given in," &c.

No. 94.

MRS JESSIE THOMSON TOD OR CHRISTIE, Petitioner.—*Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.*Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Christie's
Trustees.JAMES REID AND OTHERS (Christie's Trustees), Respondents.—Mackie

Trust—Powers of Trustees—Allowance for Children's education.—A husband who was bound by his marriage-contract to entertain, clothe, and educate children suitably to their station till their majority, when certain provisions came payable, in his settlement provided an annuity and certain liferents to his widow, declaring that these provisions were intended for the behoof of herself and the children of the marriage, it being his wish that the children should remain in the family with their mother, "and be maintained and educated out of the said annuity." The truster directed that on the death of his widow the whole estate should be held for behoof of his children and their issue, and that during the widow's life the surplus income, after providing for the annuity, should "be held and applied by my trustees for behoof of my said child or children, and the survivors or survivor of them, and the issue of the deceasers as aforesaid; it being hereby declared that my trustees shall have power, as they are hereby authorised and empowered, either to accumulate said surplus from year to year with and add it along with the interest accruing thereon in the capital of the trust-funds," "or in the option of my trustees, and if they, in the exercise of their discretion, shall see fit, to apply the said surplus, or any part thereof, to the outfit or establishment of such of them as shall be sons in business or professions, and such of them as shall be daughters in marriage, but of the expediency as well as the manner of exercising this discretionary power my trustees shall be the proper and exclusive judges."

Held that, during the widow's life, the trustees were entitled, out of said income, to make such advances as they might think desirable either for the education of any of the children, or for such change of residence as might be considered necessary for the health of any member of the family.

2D DIVISION.
R.

MR JOHN CHRISTIE, brick and tile maker, Stirling, died on 30th January 1876, survived by his widow and seven children. At the time of his death Mr Christie was possessed of means and estate amounting to the value of about £50,000, and yielding an annual return of about £2,000. Mr Christie's succession was regulated by the following deeds:—(1) nuptial contract of marriage between Mrs Christie and himself, dated September 5, 1861; (2) trust-disposition and settlement, dated February 18, 1867; (3) codicil thereto, dated March 31, 1871; and (4) codicil dated May 26, 1875. In the marriage-contract there was provided that Mrs Christie, should she survive her husband, a free annuity of £100, and a liferent use of household plenishing. Mr Christie bound himself to entertain, clothe, and educate the children of the marriage suitably to their station in life. There was also a provision of £2000 in the event of the death of both parties, payable to the children at majority, or at majority or marriage in the case of daughters, at which dates the share of each child was to vest. It was provided that the income from this sum of £2000 should be payable during the suspended vesting of the shares in the children for their education and maintenance.

By the third purpose of the settlement of 8th February 1867 the truster provided that his widow should receive, in addition to the annuity under the marriage-contract, an annual sum from the revenue of the estate sufficient to raise the annuity to £300. "And whereas, by my marriage-contract of marriage, I bound and obliged myself to aliment, entertain, clothe, and educate the child or children of the marriage suitably to their station in life, until the term of payment of the provisions to them then written, or until they should be otherwise provided for, I hereby declare the liferent provisions hereinbefore conceived in favour of my said wife in the event foresaid are intended for the behoof of herself and my sole surviving children, it being my wish and intention that my said children shall remain in family with their said mother so long as she continues unmarried, and be maintained and educated out of the said annuity."

No. 94.

Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Christie's
Trustees.

The fifth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement was in the following terms, viz. :—" On the decease of my said wife, in the event of surviving me as aforesaid, the whole trust-funds and estate then in possession of my trustees, or in or to which they shall have right in use of these presents, shall be held and applied by them (subject to the directions and conditions aftermentioned) for behoof of my surviving children, and the lawful issue of the bodies of such of them as have deceased per stirpes, that is to say, such issue taking the shares, original and accreting, that would have fallen to their respective parts if they had been alive, and that in such shares and proportions in case of there being more than one child) and under such conditions and restrictions as I, by any writing under my hand, and failing such appointment by me, then as my said wife in the event of her survivance foresaid, by any writing under her hand, may appoint, and failing any appointment, then equally among the said children and the successors of them and the issue of predecessors per stirpes as aforesaid in fee : declaring that the share of each child shall be payable to him or her at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring after the decease of me and my said wife in the event of her survivance as aforesaid, after such child, being a son, shall have attained majority, or, being a daughter, shall have attained majority or be married, until which term of payment the share of each child shall not vest in him or her : But declaring that in the event of my said wife surviving me as aforesaid, the free annual proceeds of the said trust-funds and estate hereinbefore provided to be liferented by her, shall, in the first place, be imputed towards payment and satisfaction of the annuity hereinabove provided by me in favour ; and if the free annual proceeds of the said trust-funds and estate shall exceed the amount of the said annuity (or restricted annuity), the surplus shall be held and applied by my trustees for behoof of said child or children, and the survivors or survivor of them, and the issue of the deceasers as aforesaid : It being hereby declared that my trustees shall have power, as they are hereby authorised and empowered, not to accumulate said surplus from year to year with and merge it together with the interest accruing thereon in the capital of the trust-funds, but to pay the same to my said child or children and their foresaids in equal shares or proportions, and subject to the same conditions and directions, and at the same terms of payment as the rest of the trust-funds, or in the option of my trustees, and if they, in the exercise of their discretion, shall see fit, to apply the said surplus, or any part thereof, to the outfit or establishment of such of them as shall be sons in business or professions, and such of them as shall be daughters in marriage, but of the discretion as well as time and manner of exercising this discretionary power my trustees shall be the sole and exclusive judges : Declaring that the sum or sums to be applied or advanced for behoof of any child shall be held or imputed as a payment to account of his or her share in the trust-funds and estate ; and failing any surviving issue of my said wife, then the said surplus shall be held and applied for behoof of my heirs and assignees, to whom my trustees may in that event, after paying in their hands such a portion of the said trust-funds as may be

No. 94.

Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Christie's
Trustees.

sufficient to yield an annual income equal to the said annuity, pay over the balance."

By the codicil of March 31, 1871, Mr Christie bequeathed to his wife, in case she should survive him, a further life rent annuity of £100, expressing it as his wish and intention that, under the marriage-contract trust-disposition, and this codicil, his widow should be entitled to "an aggregate life rent annuity of £400," besides the life rent use of his household furniture, "and also the life rent use, during her widowhood, of my dwelling-house of Forthbank, with the offices attached thereto, which I hereby grant her." The codicil then proceeded as follows:—"Thinking subject to the foregoing direction, I appoint my trustees to hold and receive the whole trust-estate vested in them by the foregoing trust-disposition and settlement until the youngest surviving child of my said marriage shall attain the years of majority; but each of my said children, after attaining majority, shall be entitled to receive an equal share or proportion of the free revenue of my trust-estate, or such lesser annual sum as my trustees shall see fit to allow, after retaining a sufficient sum to meet all obligations and expenses connected with the trust, including the before-mentioned aggregate annuity of £400, so far as not secured by my said properties of Forthbank and Goosecroft. Fourthly, on my death and the decease or second marriage of my said wife, and the majority of the youngest surviving child of my said marriage, I direct and appoint my trustees to divide the capital of my said trust-estate between and among my said children, in terms of the instructions contained in the foregoing trust-disposition and settlement."

By the codicil of May 26, 1875, the truster directed his trustees to pay to his widow "an additional sum of £100 for the upbringing" of his family.

After the truster's death in April 1876 his widow continued to occupy the house of Forthbank, and to maintain the seven children of the marriage, and educate them.

On 9th January 1877 Mrs Christie presented a petition to the Court in which she set forth that she found "that the provision made by her husband for the maintenance and education of the children is altogether inadequate to enable her to continue to occupy the said house, and maintain the children, and educate them in accordance with the liberal views on the subject of education which were entertained by the truster, or even to enable the petitioner to maintain and educate the children according to their station in life, and she has therefore felt it to be her duty to petition the children to make the present application to your Lordships for an increased allowance for their maintenance and education."

It appeared, from the statement in this petition that the children of the marriage were the following:—(1) Jessie, aged fourteen; (2) Ann, aged thirteen; (3) George, aged eleven; (4) John, aged ten; (5) Robert, aged eight; (6) William, aged seven; and (7) Margaret, aged three. They all resided in family with their mother except George, who was at a boarding school, to which his father had sent him. Mrs Christie averred that the whole means she had under her husband's various dispositions upon which to maintain and educate the children was the annuity of £500, and a sum of £80, being the interest arising from the £2000 provided to children under the marriage-contract. She also stated that the education of the eldest son cost her £100 per annum, and the education of the other children, by a resident governess (at a salary of £100) £120 per annum. The second daughter had been ordered by a consulting physician to be taken at once to the south of England on account of her health. It was accordingly submitted that, in the circumstances, the tees should allow the petitioner so much additional yearly out of No. 94.

plus income as would raise her annual income to £1000.

The trustees lodged answers to this petition, in which they admitted value of the estate as stated by the petitioner, and the necessity of Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Trustees.
ing the second daughter to the south of England. They, however, did that the education of the family cost Mrs Christie so much as she red, and by including a sum of £100 a-year, which they alleged Mrs istie possessed of her own, and estimating the yearly value of Forth- k and the furniture in it at £140, they brought out Mrs Christie's ual income to be £820, which, they contended, was adequate for the sent requirements of the family.

argued for Mrs Christie ;—As the estate really belonged to the children, there was a large annual surplus over which the trustees had absolute er, a portion of the surplus should be devoted to maintaining and ating the children in their proper sphere in life, a thing which could be done upon the present income. The exceptional circumstances aving to remove the family to the south of England for the health of of the girls, who was too young to be sent away alone, was a good and for making an increased allowance. There was authority for such plication being granted.¹

rgued for the trustees ;—If Mrs Christie found that she could not l the condition upon which her annuity was granted her proper course to betake herself to her legal rights, and leave it to the trustees to ide suitably for the children. The estate here had not vested in the ren, and in a similar case such an application as this had been re- l²

t advising,—

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—(After stating the object of the application)—It us that Mr Christie, by success in business, considerably raised his position e, and ultimately realised an estate of more than £50,000, which he left to uestees, and of which the annual income is at least £1700. There are seven ren, the eldest of them fourteen years of age, who are now living with the w, and for the support of herself and them in a suitable home all that she es from the trustees and otherwise is £820 a-year. She says that with that he cannot possibly support them in the position of life in which their father hem. There are two boys who have reached an age at which they might rly be sent to a school suitable for their social position, and the health of cond daughter has rendered necessary a residence at Bournemouth. The on accordingly asks us to find that the trustees are entitled to pay an addi- allowance to the widow for the maintenance and education of her children. e terms of the trust-deed are peculiar. The truster provides his widow an annuity which I do not say is illiberal in the circumstances, but he on her the burden, or at least expresses the wish or intention that the r should remain with her “so long as she continues unmarried, and be ained and educated out of the said annuity.” This idea, that the children l live with their mother, also runs through the codicils which followed. with regard to the provisions for the children, the settlement provides— clause giving estate and surplus annual proceeds to children]. That is a clause, because the whole surplus belongs to the children. Then occurs

Baird v. Baird's Trustees, Feb. 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 482, 44 Scot. Jur. 299.
Fendell, Jan. 24, 1862, 24 D. 327, 34 Scot. Jur. 142.

No. 94.

Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Christie's
Trustees.

the declaration relative to the application of the surplus proceeds—[re Now, with regard to the first declaration which I read from the settlement, I am of opinion that it must be taken in a restricted sense; it appears intended to apply only when the children are of comparatively tender years, for no man of common sense could suppose that the truster intended that his widow should be obliged to keep her family at home any longer than was proper for their educational and other interests. But, apart from that, the truster undertook in his marriage contract to entertain, alimēt, and educate his children in a suitable manner. The children have therefore a right to alimēt apart from the settlement, and the time has come when it is inconvenient to carry out the truster's wish that they should reside with their mother. Now, as regards the power of the trustees (who are bound by the marriage-contract) to deal with the surplus income, they are entrusted with a large discretionary power; but it is said that two alternative applications are specified—accumulations and advances for outfit—and that these exhaust the power of the trustees. Now, as the testator's estate, principal as well as interest, is vested in the trustees for behoof of the children, I think that these are only illustrations of what the trustees may do. The trustees are quite entitled to meet an emergency such as has now occurred, and to provide for the suitable education of the children. I do not think this should take the form of an increased allowance to the widow, but the trustees may in the exercise of their discretion grant an additional allowance for the education and alimēt of the children.

LORD ORMDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—The difficulty in this case arises from the terms of the disposition and settlement and codicils of the late Mr John Christie, the testator's husband.

It was contended on the part of Mr Christie's trustees (the argument was stated in the discharge of their duty, and in order fully to bring the case before the Court) that according to the sound reading and construction of the deed and codicils the testator's intention was that the sum of £500 sterling annuum provided to Mrs Christie by her husband was, and indeed it is expressed to be provided by him to be, the full allowance for behoof both of the testator herself and of the whole surviving children, the deed bearing, "it being the wish and intention that my said children shall remain in family with their mother so long as she continues unmarried, and be maintained and educated out of the said annuity." The trustees farther contended that they are expressly ordered to retain any surplus of the free annual income of the trust-estate to accumulate it, and that the only two purposes to which such surplus can be applied are, in the discretion of the trustees, first, for the establishment of sons in business or professions, or second, in payment to daughters on their marriage; and the trustees further urge that these purposes are made the more emphatic as the vesting is expressly suspended, and as whatever vests in any of the children, at least until after the death of the testator, and until majority.

I am fully sensible of the weight and importance of the argument urged on behalf of the trustees, and it is not without considerable difficulty that I can give it full effect. There are no doubt strong indications in the deed and codicil that the testator contemplated, at least in the first instance, the allowed to his widow should include the maintenance and education of No. 94.

 children, it being kept in view that the rent or yearly value of the house, Mar. 6, 1877.
 Forthbank, the proceeds of the widow's separate estate, and the income Christie v.
 marriage-contract fund, raises the total income of the widow to about Trustees.

while always disposed to give the greatest possible weight to the explicit intentions of a testator, even in cases where I might think that his were unreasonably narrow or limited, I am of opinion that in the present case the trustees are not absolutely debarred from applying any part of the annual surplus in their hands (a surplus the annual amount of which is or £900), so as to provide for the greater advantage of the children of marriage, or of such of them as may be found to require additional allowance; and that even during the survivance of the widow, and before anything absolutely vested in any of the children.

I think that the testator in fixing the allowance of £500 a-year contemplated that the children should reside in family with their mother, and should be kept at home, and the £500 was intended, with the addition of the other referred to, as the expense of one establishment, for the maintenance and education of the whole family. But if it becomes necessary or expedient (and stated in the petition that this expediency has arisen) that some of the children should be placed at boarding schools or at public schools, I do not think it was or can be held to have been the intention of the testator that the expense of this—an expense which may be very considerable—should be paid by the widow out of her small allowance of £500. In like manner, if any unforeseen contingency should arise, such as the necessity of a foreign journey on account of the health of the family or any of them, or in the event of a similar emergency, I think the trustees have power to make a further use out of the free surplus income in their hands to meet such contingencies and extra expenses.

I do not read the two special modes in which the trustees are authorised to use the free surplus income as excluding every other application of that income. On the contrary, I think the general direction of the trust-deed overrules and controls the two special instances or powers which the trustor has given. The general declaration is that the free surplus income "shall be applied by my trustees for behoof of my said child or children and survivors or survivor of them, and the issue of the deceasers as aforesaid," and only by way of explanation or example that the trustor then proceeds to state that the trustees shall have power to accumulate the surplus and add it to the general capital of the trust-funds, or to apply it in the outfit of a business, or the establishment of daughters in marriage. The deed does not say that the surplus is to be applied only in these two ways; but the provision is that it shall be held and applied for behoof of the children, and the special enumeration of these two applications does not, I think, apply to the exclusion of a liberal interpretation, derogate from the general power.

On the whole, therefore, and while admitting that the case is one of some legal difficulty, I think we may authorise the trustees to advance from the income in their hands such sums as may be necessary to meet the expenses of the education of such of the family as are educated out of their family and in separate establishments, and also such special expense as

No. 94. may be occasioned by the state of the health of any of the children, and advances being always made under the declarations contained in the trust-deed.

Mar. 6, 1877.
Christie v.
Christie's
Trustees.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the trustees under the trust-settlement of the late John Christie are entitled out of the surplus income of the trust-estate to make such advances as they may think desirable either for the education of any of the children at a distance from home, or for such change of residence as may be considered necessary for the health of any member of the family, and decern: Find the expenses incurred in connection with this application payable out of the trust-estate, and remit the Auditor to tax the same, and to report."

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 95. THE CLYDESDALE BANKING COMPANY, Pursuers.—Guthrie Smith—Real.
DANIEL PAUL AND HIS TRUSTEE, Defenders.—Burnet—Alison.

Mar. 8, 1877.
Clydesdale
Bank v. Paul.

Fraud—Principal and Agent.—A stockbroker's clerk, who had authority to represent his principal on the Exchange, entered into speculative transactions for his own behoof in his principal's name, without his knowledge, but for which the principal was bound. In order to meet a balance due to the principal, resulting from the clerk's speculations, on settling day the clerk cashed a forged cheque at a bank, and applied the proceeds for that purpose. Held, that the principal was bound to repay the amount to the bank, in respect (1) that the money had been obtained by the fraud of his representative (though that was not have been sufficient of itself), and (2) that the principal had been bound by the fraud to that amount.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that a person cannot retain a benefit obtained by the fraud of another, even though himself innocent of fraud, unless a valuable consideration has been given, and that this rule is not limited to cases in which the relation of principal and agent subsisted between the person benefited and the wrongdoer, but is of general application.

1st Division.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

SEQUEL of case reported, ante, vol. iii. p. 586.

The following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's dicta. "Mr Paul carried on business in Glasgow as a stockbroker, and was a member of the Stock Exchange. It is proved that no person can transact business on the Exchange except a member, or a person representing a member. The brokers deal with each other as principals.

"For some years Mr Paul had in his employment a clerk named Martin. In consequence of age and infirmity Mr Paul became unable to conduct his business personally, and from April 1875 Martin was allowed to represent him on the Stock Exchange. He entered into transactions which his employer had not authorised. Though they were regularly entered in what is called the exchange-book, they were not carried to the contract-book in which the names of the customers or of the broker appear. The reason was that they were speculative transactions carried on by Martin, for which he had no order. It is enough that Mr Paul had no knowledge of these irregular transactions, though at one time he had suspicions of Martin's fidelity, and might have ascertained the truth by examining his exchange-book.

"At the settling-day, on 30th November 1875, the balance due to Mr Paul on all the transactions made in his name was upwards of £2000. But, apart from the irregular transactions, the balance was only £1000 more than £2000. The money was payable at one o'clock, and Mr Paul provided his clerks with a sum sufficient or nearly sufficient to meet the smaller balance resulting from the clerk's speculations.

"In order to enable him to meet the actual sum which was due on all transactions, Martin passed a forged cheque on the Clydesdale Bank, bore to be a cheque drawn by Dixon Brothers in favour of Paul, and forsores by the latter. Both signatures were forged. Being a crossed cheque, it was presented to the Royal Bank, who were the bankers of it. It was cashed, and the money, along with that which Paul had himself furnished, was handed to the secretary of the Stock Exchange to discharge the debt appearing on Paul's fortnightly balance-sheet. The Royal Bank, in settling with the pursuers, received credit for the contents of the cheque." No. 95.
Mar. 8, 1877.
Clydesdale
Bank v. Paul.

The forgery was discovered on the 9th or 10th of December. Martin absconded, and has not since been heard of."

The Clydesdale Bank raised this action against the Royal Bank and Paul, and the trustee on his sequestrated estate, for payment of £4800 (being the amount of the forged cheque). The Court having assailed the Royal Bank on 11th March 1876 a proof was led.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against defender Paul, in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The liability was alleged to arise either on agency or the benefit received by Paul. But an agent does not bind his principal by an act of fraud, which was not within his date, express or implied. As to benefit, there was authority that if a wrongful act was done in a man's interest and he got the benefit of it he was liable to that extent, but when a person committed a wrong in his own interest, and a third party happened to benefit by it, he did not incur responsibility.

The pursuers argued for the pursuers;—Paul having been bound to pay the money, and incurring severe penalties, and having got the benefit of the cheque, was liable for it to the bank.¹

NOTE.—(After the foregoing narrative)—The pursuers maintain, in the first place, that as the cheque was paid on the request of Martin, who held a substantial place in Paul's employment, Paul is liable to repay them. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this plea is not well founded.

But they urge, in the second place, that as Paul received the benefit of the cheque, inasmuch as the money was applied in discharging his liabilities, they are entitled to recover from him.

The answer of the defenders is this—They admit that Paul was liable for the debt arising on all the transactions; but they say that in a question between Paul and Martin the latter was the true debtor on the balance arising on the irregular transactions, that he discharged that debt, and that they have no concern with the source from which the money came, or the means by which it was obtained. They urge that they are in the same position as if Martin had borrowed the money and applied it in payment of his own debt.

In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary the pursuers are entitled to decree. The objection was raised by Martin as the representative of Paul. It is true that this was without his authority; and still more that he did not authorise the means which were employed. But the advance was not the less an advance on his behalf, and if he receives benefit from it he must, it is thought, be dealt with as if he had given previous authority to obtain it. The Lord Ordinary therefore thinks the pursuers are entitled to decree."

Authorities quoted.—Scholesfield v. Templer, March 9, 1859, 28 L. J., Ch. 652; De Gex and Jones, 429; Eyre v. Burmester, June 25, 1863, 33 L. J., Ch. 652, 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, 435; Barwick v. English Joint Bank, May 18, 1867, L. R., 2 Exch. 259; Traill v. Smith's Trustee, June 6, ante, vol. iii. p. 770.

No. 95. At advising,—

Mar. 8, 1877.
Clydesdale
Bank v. Paul.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is sound. Paul carried on business as a stockbroker and member of the Stock Exchange in Glasgow. He was an old man, and required to do his business by deputy. The person chiefly in his confidence was a man named Martin. There is no doubt that Martin transacted almost the whole of Paul's business. He did so by the authority of Paul, and he was entitled, by the authority given him, to buy and sell shares, and to bind Paul personally for fulfilment of his bargains to the other members of the Stock Exchange.

The question whether a part of the bargains which Martin made was authorised by Paul would be of no consequence in the question of Paul's liability, because he had given general credentials to Martin, as his representative on the Stock Exchange, to transact with the other members. There is no doubt, therefore, that on 30th November 1875, when there stood against Paul in the Stock Exchange a balance of upwards of £7000, he was liable to make that good, though at that point of fact a great deal of it consisted of unauthorised and fraudulent transactions of his clerk Martin, entered into as a private speculation. Accordingly Paul, under the rules of the Stock Exchange, fenced by somewhat severe penalties, was obliged to make that balance good before one o'clock on the 30th of November. On the other hand, Martin also found himself in an embarrassed position, not knowing how to meet this large balance. If he had gone to Paul his frauds would have been discovered. This induced him to forge the cheque, which was cashed by the Royal Bank, and ultimately by the Clydesdale Bank. He forged the name of the drawers, Dixon Brothers, who were customers of the Clydesdale Bank, and also Paul's name, who was a customer of the Royal Bank. The Clydesdale Bank sue Paul and his trustee, on the ground that the money was obtained from them by the tortious proceedings of Paul's agent and representative Martin, and that the money so obtained was applied exclusively for the benefit of Paul. On the combination of these two facts the liability of Paul and his trustee is perfectly clear. No doubt an agent will not be held to be authorised to commit forgery or any other wrong; but if, in the course of doing his business of an agent, he does commit a wrong or a crime, and if the principal is benefited, then the principal is liable to the extent to which he is benefited. That is the plain and simple ground on which this case falls to be decided. It is a plain case in the law of principal and agent, and the doctrine which I have stated has been laid down long ago in Carey's work on Principal and Agent and other authorities, and has been recently illustrated in two instructive cases, one in Scotland and one in England—the cases of Traill and Barwick.

LORD DEAS proposed a declinature, as a shareholder of the Royal Bank, which was repelled. His Lordship then concurred.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. The principle by which I apprehend the case must be determined is thus expressed by Lord Chancellor Campbell in the approbation of Lords Justices Knight Bruce and Turner in the case of Scholefield:—"I consider it to be an established principle that a person who il himself of what has been obtained by the fraud of another, unless he is only innocent of the fraud, but has given some valuable consideration." No. 95.

This principle is not, in my opinion, limited to the case of employer and clerk, principal and agent. In many of the cases, including that of Barwick in Eng- Mar. 8, 1877.
Clydesdale
Bank v. Paul.

land and the recent case of Traill in this country, such relations have existed. The rule is not, however, limited to cases of that kind, but is of general application. A familiar illustration will be found in the reduction of settlements. Settlements are frequently set aside in toto which have been procured by the deed of a single individual but which confer large benefits on other parties. A guilty person may have no relation to the beneficiaries principally interested, the settlement is set aside entirely on the broad ground that it was procured by fraud, and that the persons benefited had given no valuable consideration. The case of Scholefield was not a case of principal and agent or master and servant, but is an illustration of the application of the general principle on which I desire to express my opinion. The same law was applied in the case of Eyre v. Burroughs, and determined the decision of that case; and the general principle involved was the subject of much discussion in a very important case, Gibbs v. British Linen Company, decided by me in the Outer-House in July 1875, which has not been reported.*

I think it is proved that Paul got the direct benefit of the fraud that was here committed. The forgery produced a sum which went directly through Paul's hands to the secretary of the Stock Exchange, and wiped out his liability to the effect of £4800, and saved him from being dealt with as a defaulter on the Stock Exchange. It is also clear that he was innocent of the fraud; and the question remains whether he gave any valuable consideration. I am of opinion he did not. The money procured from the bank by the forgery was paid into his account in the Stock Exchange, and no consideration was given in the argument for Paul's trustee it was sought to bring up the case to one in which no valuable consideration was given. The argument was presented on the facts and the law. One is stated in the Lord Ordinary's note, where he states that the Lord Ordinary "say that in a question between Paul and Martin the latter was the true debtor on the balance arising on the irregular transactions, that he discharged that debt and that they have no concern with the source from which the money came." I am of opinion that this view is unsound. I do not think it was the true state of facts that Martin was the debtor in the sums which appear on the Stock Exchange statement for the week. That statement was prepared for the purpose of shewing Paul's obligations, and did shew them, and though it may be true that Martin was bound to relieve Paul of the £7242 there brought out, to the effect of £4800, the fact remains that the payment to the secretary of the Stock Exchange was in no proper sense Martin's debt, but Paul's. It was farther from the truth that it now appears by investigation that Martin had embezzled upwards of £1000 of Paul's funds, and it was said that Martin having paid £4000 to Paul's trustee it was so far discharging his debt to Paul. The answer is that this could not be the reality of the transaction. Paul did not even know that he was Martin's trustee, and there was no transaction between him and Martin on that footing—no admission or recognition of a debt due by Martin to Paul, and no discharge by Paul of part of that debt in respect of a payment to account of £4800.

* Reported infra, p. 630, as a footnote to this case.

No. 95. If that had been the true state of the facts it might have made all the difference in the result in this case, but a great deal would have depended on the special circumstances, the particular terms of the conversations between the parties, the special form and result of the transaction. There is no room for such a question here, and as no valuable consideration was given the pursuers are entitled to succeed.

THE COURT adhered.

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 95/1.

RICHARD GIBBS, Pursuer.—Asher.

THE BRITISH LINEN COMPANY, Defenders.—Balfour.

June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

Security—Principal and Agent—Fraud.—A debtor to a bank transferred certain shares in a joint stock company to the bank absolutely, but retained security of a portion of his debt. He afterwards sold the shares and paid the price to the bank, who executed a transference to the purchaser, and granted a discharge pro tanto of the debt. In an action by the purchaser against the bank concluding for rescission of the contract of sale and for repayment of the price, on the footing that the bank were the true owners, and on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the seller, held by Lord Shand that although the debtor had induced the sale by fraud the bank were not liable to the fraudulent representations; (2) that the debtor being entitled to the shares did not do so as the agent for the bank, although they received the price; (3) that though the bank could not have retained the benefit of the seller's fraud gratuitously, yet as they gave onerous consideration by releasing their debt and discharging the debt pro tanto, they were not liable to make restitution of the price of the shares.

Outer-House.
Lord Shand.

This action was raised at the instance of one of a number of purchasers of shares to the amount in all of between £90,000 and £100,000, of the Phospho-Guano Company (Limited), to try the liability of the defenders, the British Linen Company, to take over the shares, and repay the price, which it was not due to the company had received.

The facts relating to the purchase and disposal of the price, and the transfer of the shares, are stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, after a preliminary statement of the legal principles involved are also there fully stated it is unnecessary to make any preliminary statement.

LORD SHAND.—The pursuer of this action, Mr Richard Gibbs, of St Andrew's House, Cornhill, London, in April 1872 purchased, through Mr Watson acting as broker for Messrs Peter Lawson and Son, 250 fully paid British Linen Company shares at £10 each of the Phospho-Guano Company, Limited, at par, making a total price of £2500. In the same month the purchase was completed by payment of the price and delivery of a transfer of the requisite number of shares, and by William Spence and William Paterson, bankers in Edinburgh, in which the pursuer was registered as a shareholder of the company, and of the usual certificate of ownership of the shares. In July 1872 a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent was declared and paid by the company, and the pursuer received the amount corresponding to his shares. He avers that in February 1873 he became aware that certain representations which had been made by Messrs Lawson, and which had induced him to make his purchase, were fraudulent, and also that the shares at the time of the sale had belonged to the defenders, the British Linen Company, bankers in Edinburgh, for whom Messrs Lawson had acted as agents in the sale. Accordingly, by letter of the 6th February 1873, addressed to the defenders, he called on them to refund him the price he had paid, and to take back the shares, but this demand was declined by letter from the defenders' law-agents on the following day.

The object of this action is to enforce the demand thus made. The pursuer seeks to rescind the transaction on the footing of its having been entered into tween him and the defenders, and he asks for decree for the price paid by him for the shares and stamp duty of transfer, amounting to £2512, 12s. 6d., the interest from the date of his purchase, and at the same time offers restitution of the shares, the market value of which is now about £1, 10s. per share, and repayment of the dividend received by him in July 1872.

No. 95/1.
June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

It appears from the evidence that the shares purchased by the pursuer were a part of a quantity of 10,000 B shares of the company, almost the whole of which were disposed of through Mr Westgarth, apparently on the same representations by the Messrs Lawson which induced the pursuer to make his purchase; that these shares had been all held in the names of Messrs Spence anderson, two of the officers in the defenders' service, on behalf of the defenders, whom transfers were executed in favour of the various purchasers; and that the price of the shares sold, which amounted to between £90,000 and £100,000, was received by the defenders from Messrs Lawson and Son in the same way as in the case of the pursuer's purchase. Certain of the purchasers of these other shares appear to have contributed to the expense of trying the present action, and it is evident that besides important legal questions which have been raised for decision the pecuniary amount at stake, so far at least as the defenders are concerned, is very considerable.

The legal grounds on which the pursuer rests his claim are—(1) That he was induced to purchase the shares acquired by him by false and fraudulent representations made by the Messrs Lawson, and that although they appeared in the transaction as sellers, they were merely agents for the defenders, the principals in the transaction, who were the parties truly interested in the shares, and who willingly granted the transfer through their officials, in whose names the shares were held for their behoof, and received the price; and (2) that even if the pursuer has failed to shew that the Messrs Lawson acted as the defenders' agents in the transaction, yet the purchase having been procured through fraud, the defenders, who received the price, are not, in the circumstances disclosed in evidence, entitled to retain the benefit so gained.

The defenders, in answer to these grounds of action, deny that the Messrs Lawson acted as their agents in the transaction. It has been proved, and they admit, that the money received as the price of the shares was paid over to them by the Messrs Lawson; but they deny that this payment was the result of a transaction in which Messrs Lawson acted in any way as their agents, and explain that Messrs Lawson and Son having sold the shares, which were their own property, paid the price received towards the partial extinction of a large debt by them to the defenders. They explain farther, that the shares had been transferred to the names of two of the bank's officials as a security for payment of Messrs Lawson and Son's debt, and that this security was released, and a transfer of the shares executed in reliance on Messrs Lawson and Son applying the price received towards reduction of their debt. In answer to the second ground of the pursuer's claim, it is maintained that even assuming Messrs Lawson and Son to have been guilty of fraud, which is not admitted, the defenders cannot be required to repay the money received by them in ignorance of any fraud, because the payment was received for valuable consideration given in the release of the security which they held over the shares, and in the discharge of Messrs Lawsons' debt to them, to the extent of the sum received.

The estates of Messrs Lawson and Son were sequestrated in February 1873, and have yielded a dividend of 3s. or 3s. 6d. per pound.

The first question to be determined is, whether the pursuer was induced to enter into the purchase by false and fraudulent representations made to him by Messrs Lawson, who were the parties with whom he treated. The pursuer denies any communication of any kind with the defenders, and believed that he was transacting entirely with the Messrs Lawson through their broker, Mr Westgarth.

He had no personal communication with the Messrs Lawson, and the representations complained of were contained in certain documents which were obtained from them, and which, it is clear, were laid before him in the knowledge and with the authority of the Messrs Lawson for the purpose of inducing his purchase. Mr Westgarth, in his evidence, explains that he had communica-

No. 95/1.
June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

tions with two of the younger partners of the firm of Peter Lawson and Son, viz., Mr Henry Lawson and Mr George Lawson, both of whom resided in London, and conducted the business of the firm there, and also acted as managers of the Phospho-Guano Company, Limited. He states that when these gentlemen asked him to undertake the sale of the shares for their firm he explained it would be necessary to have a statement prepared to be laid before intending purchasers, and it was then arranged with them that documents should be prepared to be used in that way in order to effect sales. Accordingly, from the information which had been given to him verbally by Messrs Lawson, he prepared the draft of a letter from them to himself and relative memorandum, which he submitted to them for their revision and signature, and these documents having been revised and signed, were given to him with copies of the original prospectus of the company, and the reports by the directors to meetings of the company, and relative balance-sheets of June and December 1871, that he might use them in endeavouring to effect sales of the shares, which at that time do not appear to have been in demand by the public. These documents were in the way submitted to the pursuer, and there appears to be no doubt their contents were the inducing cause of his purchase.

The representations of which the pursuer now complains are contained partly in the original prospectus of the company, and partly in the reports and balance-sheets, and also in Messrs Lawsons' letter, which is dated 13th March 1872, and relative memorandum.

[His Lordship then reviewed the evidence relied on as shewing that the representations complained of were false and fraudulent, and concluded on this branch of the case as follows :—] It is possible to suppose that the Messrs Lawson might have been able to offer explanations to shew that they believed the truth of the reports and balance-sheets ; but they were not examined. The inference to be drawn from the fact that the defenders did not call them as witnesses is, that such explanation could be given ; for of course if the defenders could have satisfactorily disproved this part of the case they would have succeeded on that ground, and any inquiry into their transactions with Messrs Lawson or the relations subsisting between them would have been excluded. No explanation occurs to me, or has been suggested, which could lead to the inference that Messrs Lawson could have believed that the company had realised the profits represented ; and it is a very strong circumstance against the idea that they entertained that belief that in January 1873, as appears from Messrs Lawson's letter to Mr Syme of the 17th, they proposed again to pay dividends out of profits, knowing that these profits had not been earned,—a proposal which was at once rejected by the directors and Mr Guild, as appears from Mr Guild's letters at the time. The Messrs Lawson may have believed, and I think there is evidence in their letters to shew they did believe, that the company was in possession of a business which was sound, and which, under proper management, would succeed ; and they probably deluded themselves into the belief that great success would attend their future operations as would in a short time place the company in as favourable a position as the reports represented. But the evidence leads, I think, to the necessary conclusion that they knew that the reports and balance-sheets did not shew the actual state of the company, and that, to a most material extent, the profits represented as realised had not been earned ; and it is clear, therefore, that the representations on which the pursuer proceeded in making his purchase must, in the present question, be taken to have been false and fraudulent.

[His Lordship then dealt with the averment of knowledge on the defence part of the false nature of the statements contained in the reports and balance-sheets, and that the defenders were aware that these documents were to be used in order to induce parties to purchase the shares, and having stated the grounds on which he held that these averments were not proved, he proceeded :—The case must therefore be taken on the footing that the representations complained of, made by the Messrs Lawson, were not false to the knowledge of the defenders, and that, on the contrary, those in the management of the bank believed the Phospho-Guano Company to have been and to be then a sound sperous, and that the dividends had been paid to the shareholders out of the profits actually earned. Even on this assumption, however, the pursuer maintains that the representations made by the Messrs Lawson affect the defenders and render them liable for his present claim. The Messrs Lawson, he alleges, are simply the defenders' agents in the sale. He pleads that the defenders, as principals in the transaction, cannot retain a benefit gained by the fraudulent representations of their agents.

It is said the defenders were principals in the transaction because they were the owners of the shares, the price of which they received in that character; alternatively, that they held the shares in security, knowing their debtors to be hopelessly insolvent, and that the Messrs Lawson having been put forward as allowed to realise the shares with their authority and consent, and only on condition that the prices should at once be paid over to them, must be regarded as their agents in the sale.

His Lordship then went very fully into the evidence, which had occupied several days, and stated the grounds on which he came to the conclusion (1) that the Messrs Lawson and not the bank were the owners of the shares sold, that the bank held the shares in the names of certain of their officials in security only of a debt of large amount due to them by Messrs Lawson, and (2) that the Messrs Lawson were not agents of the bank in selling the shares. He proceeded:—This being the nature of the transaction, the Messrs Lawson are not in any sense the agents of the defenders in effecting the sales of the shares which took place. The transactions of sale were entirely between the pursuer and other purchasers, and Messrs Lawson and Son, the owners of the bank. There was no privity of contract between the pursuer and defenders, no legal relation was created or subsisted between them in the transaction. In fact that the defenders granted the transfer by which Messrs Lawson and completed their transaction with the pursuer is of no materiality, for it is a veryday occurrence that a sale of shares by one person is implemented by a transfer granted by another. This is so common that the ordinary printed forms of transfer contain a note in which attention is drawn to the circumstance that in the case of a sub-sale the full price that has been paid between the parties must regulate the stamp-duty. The transfer may come from a party other than the seller, either because the seller has acquired his right to the shares by an intermediate transaction, or, as in the present case, because the shares, though the property of the seller, have in the meantime been held by a third party in security, but on an absolute title. The real and only transaction in which the defenders were parties was an agreement with Messrs Lawson and to discharge their security for payment of the price to be received for the shares, which should be applied in discharge pro tanto of the debt due to them. It is having been the state of the facts and the nature of the relations between the parties, I am of opinion that the pursuer has no legal claim against the defenders on the ground of agency on the part of Messrs Lawson. According to the invariable practice, securities granted over heritable property contain a clause of sale. If the debt be not paid the creditor after due intimation may sell the property, and if he be guilty of fraudulent misrepresentations in the sale he will be responsible for the consequences; or if he sell the property through an agent who is guilty of fraud he cannot retain the benefit of the contract.

But if, in place of selling the property himself, he allows his debtor, the proprietor, to effect the sale, the legal relations and consequences are entirely different. The contract of sale is then made between the purchaser and the debtor; and the only agreement to which the creditor, as holder of the debt, is a party, is a contract between him and his debtor to release the debtor for payment of his debt. It appears to me to make no difference in principle that the debt is so large as to absorb the whole price to be received for the subject of the security. Neither in the case in which the creditor stipulates that he shall receive the whole, nor in that in which he stipulates for only a portion of the price as a condition of releasing the security, is the debtor his agent in transacting the sale. It would be a remarkable result that if the debtor had received and paid one-half of the sum realised to the security-holder and the

No. 95/1.

June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

No. 95/1. other half to another unsecured creditor, the security-holder would be liable to claim of repetition on the ground of agency in the sale, while the unsecured creditor was liable to no such claim; nor can the true nature of the transaction or the relation between the parties, be affected by such considerations as the probable ultimate consequences to the debtor in depriving him of a greater or less part of his property. There is no principle for making a distinction on such ground. The difference, in fact, is clear and well defined between the case made by a creditor himself of the subject of his security, in which case he is the contracting party in the contract of sale, and a sale by the owner, in which case he is the contracting party, the contract with the creditor being one for the lease of his security only. In this view, therefore, and as the sale was made by Messrs Lawson and Son, the owners of the shares, I am of opinion that the pursuer fails in his argument on this part of the case.

June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

The remaining ground on which the pursuer maintains the action is, assuming the Messrs Lawson were not in any sense the defenders' agents, the defenders cannot take the benefit of the fraud committed on him by raising the price of the shares. This ground of action involves the right of the pursuer to follow the money which he paid to Messrs Lawson and Son, which was paid by them to the defenders, but which, so far as the pursuer concerned, might have been paid by Messrs Lawson to any of their creditors. The argument was supported by reference to the cases of Wardlaw v. Mackenzie, 21 D., 940; Bridgeman v. Green, 2 Vesey senior, 626; Huguenin v. Bas, 14 Vesey junior, 273; and Scholefield v. Templer, 1859, Johnson's Reports, 155, and Law Journal, vol. xxviii. (Chancery), 452. The circumstances of the decision in this last case was appealed was not noticed at the discussion; the decision was affirmed with a variation, and is reported in vol. iv. Deane and Jones' Reports, p. 429. The principle established by these authorities appears to me plainly to fall short of what is required to support the pursuer's argument. It is a recognised principle both in the law of this country and that of England that a gratuitous benefit conferred or obtained by one person and gained through the fraud of another cannot be retained by the person benefited, even though innocent of the fraud. The most familiar application of this principle is the case of legatees or beneficiaries taking under a settlement which has been procured by fraud, to which they were no parties, and of which they were entirely ignorant. They cannot retain a benefit so gained. But this principle is throughout the authorities limited to the case of benefits conferred or received gratuitously, and does not apply where a valuable consideration has been given. The rule with its limitations is stated by the Lord Chancellor affirming the decision in the case of Scholefield v. Templer thus—"I consider to be an established principle that a person cannot avail himself of what has been obtained by the fraud of another, unless he not only is innocent of the fraud but has given some valuable consideration." If the person resisting the claim of restitution is not only innocent of the fraud alleged, but has given some valuable consideration in the transaction, the person defrauded has no remedy against him.

The position of the defenders in the present case is that of parties not innocent of the fraud which was committed, but who gave valuable consideration for the money they received; for they granted not only a release of the security but also a discharge pro tanto of the debt due to them. If the shares which formed the security had not been so released, they might have been to advantage by the defenders through their own broker, and no question would have been raised by the purchaser; and the defenders could not be restored to the position in which they were in April 1872 in a question with Messrs Lawson and Son, their debtors, by debiting them again with the amount of the pursuer's claim when it was intimated to them nearly a year after, in February 1873.

The cases of Eyre v. Burmester and others, April 1862, 10 House of Lords Cases, p. 90, and Eyre v. Burmester, April and June 1863, 33 Law Journal (Chancery), 652, and 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, p. 435, may be usefully read with reference to the various points urged for the pursuer. I had no

neft of any argument on these cases (which were not cited in the discussion), No. 95/1. I have no doubt the judgments in the House of Lords have an important aring as authorities in the present case. The first of these cases, which was appeal against a decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, illustrates the rule at a gratuitous benefit, obtained through the fraud of a third party, could not retained even by one innocent of the fraud. A banking company agreed to id a considerable sum on the security of estates in Ireland, already mortgaged, ignorance of the existence of the mortgage. Before the whole of the money as advanced they became aware of the existence of the mortgage, but made e full advance on their debtor promising to procure a release of it. John dleir, the debtor, afterwards induced the mortgagee to release his security in change for substituted securities consisting of railway shares, and other docu- nts, which were all forged and worthless. It was held, reversing the decision the Court of Chancery in Ireland, that the mortgagee's right subsisted in a estion with the bank, because it appeared that the bank had really not given y valuable consideration after the release of the mortgage and in reliance of it, they having advanced the money before the release was granted, and not on : faith of the release actually executed. Lord Cranworth puts the case thus : f indeed the release to Sadleir had preceded the advance of the money, and if t advance had been made on the faith of the title which the release gave or eared to give to John Sadleir, the case would have been different. The k would then have altered its relation with John Sadleir, relying on what : in fact the representation by the appellant under his hand and seal that so as related to his security the title of John Sadleir was clear, and it would e been no answer to the bank by the appellant to say that his execution of deed had been obtained by means of a gross fraud practised on him'—(Rep., 110) ; and Lord Chelmsford, p. 115, referring to the bank, says : "They did advance the money upon the release itself, but upon the faith and expecta- n that a release would be executed. They relied upon John Sadleir and not n any agreement with Eyre."

June 23, 1875.
Gibbs v.
British Linen
Co.

n the succeeding case, which is perhaps of most importance in the present stion, some of the same facts occurred, but with reference to a different pro- ty which was included in the two mortgages already noticed. It appeared t the banking company who made the large advance already referred to,— ng still in ignorance of the fraud which Sadleir had committed in the trans- on for the release of the security of the prior mortgagee,—on the application Sadleir concurred for their interest in a farther mortgage of certain of the es held by them in security granted to other parties for a sum of £90,000, hich £36,000 was presently advanced, on the arrangement that in return their concurrence in this new mortgage they should receive £35,000 of the ance in payment pro tanto of the money due to them, which sum they ally received, while Sadleir obtained the balance of £1000. The estate was rwards sold by the last mortgagees, who applied the balance of the purchase- ey in payment of their own debt. Thereupon the mortgagee who had been eed to release his security on receiving the substituted securities, consisting rged and valueless documents, sought to recover from the bank the £35,000 ch they had received in cash when they concurred in the subsequent mort- e under which the estate was sold. The Master of the Rolls, regarding the : as having been substantially decided by the decision in the first case, ted decree giving the relief asked. His opinion is reported at length in the r Journal. He seems to have regarded the mortgage for £90,000, though ted by Sadleir, the owner of the estate, with the concurrence of the bank their interest as security-holders under their mortgage, as being in substance de by the bank, the purchase-money having been really received by them, ith the exception of £1000 which the bank allowed John Sadleir to retain." s decision was, however, also reversed by the Lord Chancellor (Lord West- f) on appeal ; and not only the judgment, but many of his Lordship's rrvations, apply directly to such a case as the present. After referring to view stated by the Master of the Rolls that the case was decided in principle the former case, his Lordship proceeded—"No such consequence follows

No. 95/1. from the decision of the House of Lords, or the principles on which it was founded. The House had not to consider the effect of any dealing subsequently to and on the faith of the release between John Sadleir and a purchaser of valuable consideration without notice." And after referring to the view taken of the transaction, as if it were a sale by the bank, who got the benefit of the advance, he goes on—"That, however, as I have also said, is not the nature or effect of the deed of December 1855. The deed, a copy of which I have before me, is a simple mortgage by John Sadleir to the Messrs Backhouse, in which the bank joins merely for the purpose of postponing its own security to the security of the Messrs Backhouse. The deed proceeds upon a contract of borrowing by John Sadleir of the Messrs Backhouse, and upon an agreement by the bank to assist John Sadleir in that transaction by postponing its own security to the extent of the property comprised in the security given by this deed to the Messrs Backhouse.

"The money, therefore is simply money received by John Sadleir and given over by him to the bank, his creditor, bona fide so far as the bank was concerned. The bank had no knowledge of the fraud which had been practised in obtaining the release at the time when the mortgage to the Messrs Backhouse was made, and at the time when the £35,000 was received.

"It was ingeniously put in argument by Mr James that the money obtained by the use of a fraudulent instrument, and that the person who suffered by that use of the fraud which had been practised upon him had a right to pursue that which was obtained by means of that fraud. That might have been perfectly right if the money had been still in the hands of the Messrs Backhouse, or in the Incumbered Estates Court. The plaintiff might then have had a right to say that he was still the prior incumbrancer; and although he could not have recovered against the Messrs Backhouse, as purchasers for valuable consideration on the faith of his release, anything to the prejudice of the security, yet he might have pursued, subject to that right, the whole of the property that was comprised in the release and also in the mortgage to the Messrs Backhouse.

"But that is not the transaction. The plaintiff admits that he cannot follow the estate. He admits that he has no claim against the Messrs Backhouse, and he seeks to have repaid to him money which was bona fide received by the bank from its debtor John Sadleir. The plaintiff might just as well have asserted a right to reclaim from any other creditor of Sadleir, his wine-merchant or his tailor, money that had been paid by John Sadleir to such creditor. The money was borrowed by John Sadleir from the Messrs Backhouse, and the money was bona fide, so far as the bank was concerned, paid by John Sadleir to the bank, and there is no possible relation in which the bank stands to the plaintiff which entitle the latter to recover any portion of that money, . . . and when the question of the fraudulent dealing is imported into the case, the answer to it is, that, at the time when the money was received, the bank, who received it being bona fide creditors of John Sadleir, knew nothing at all with regard to the fraud of Sadleir or the fraudulent use made of it by him."

These observations appear to me to apply almost in terms to the present case, in which, as I have said, the defenders, being bona fide creditors of the Messrs Lawson, and knowing nothing of the fraudulent representations which induced the pursuer to make his purchase, received the price which he paid, from the debtors, for the valuable consideration of a release of their security and discharge pro tanto of the debt due to them.

As the result, I shall find by judgment that the pursuer has failed to establish facts inferring liability on the part of the defenders for any of the claims set out in the conclusions of the summons, and therefore assolvie the defenders from these conclusions, and find them entitled to expenses.

HILL & FERGUSSON, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents

HENRY SHAW, Pursuer.—Mair.
DAVID MORISON, Defender.—R. V. Campbell.

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1877.

Shaw v.
Morison.

Statute—Act Abolishing Imprisonment for Civil Debts of Small Amount, 1835 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70), sec. 1—Interest.—A person who had borrowed £10, of which 15s. was deducted by the lender as interest in advance, granted a promissory-note for the £10, and by a separate writing bound himself to repay that in weekly instalments of 10s., and in the event of failing for two successive weeks to pay these instalments then to pay to the lender “an additional sum of for each pound, or part of a pound, of the total amount of said bill, and that for every week’s failure, till such time as” the lender proceeded to recover as otherwise provided for. Held that these additional payments were to be regarded as interest in the sense of the “Act abolishing, in Scotland, imprisonment for civil debts of small amount,” 1835, which enacts, “that it shall not be lawful to impose on any person or persons on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d. sterling, exclusive of interest and expenses thereon.”

THIS was an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment at the instance of Henry Shaw, coachman, Edinburgh, against David Morison, manager of the “Edinburgh Liberal Loan Company,” 77 West Port, Edinburgh. 2^d DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
I.

The pursuer along with three other persons had granted a promissory-note in these terms:—“£10.—Edinburgh, 31st March 1873.—One day after date we promise to pay Mr John Elder, treasurer of the Edinburgh Liberal Loan Company, at the office No. 77 West Port, Edinburgh, the sum of ten pounds sterling for value received.”

For the £10 for which this promissory-note was granted £9, 5s. only was paid over, the remaining 15s. being retained as forehand interest.

On the same date the following additional letter of obligation was signed by the parties to the promissory-note:—“Mr John Elder, 77 West Port.—Sir,—We have this day accepted a bill drawn by you upon us for £10, payment of which you have agreed to receive in weekly instalments of 10s., commencing on 7th April 1873, and continuing till the whole be paid up. But, in the event of our failing for two successive weeks, or for three weeks altogether, to call upon you and pay said instalments, you are to be entitled to recover from us, at any time thereafter, the whole sum, or balance, due on the said bill, with the expenses thereof, and the same were now payable in full. And we have also agreed to do, in the event of such failure, an additional sum of 2d. for each pound, or part of a pound, of the total amount of said bill, and that for every week’s failure, till such time as you proceed to recover from us as aforesaid; and which additional sum you may either retain from the first instalments afterwards placed by us in your hands, or may debit us with at any other time.”

As the instalments not being duly paid a small-debt summons was, on 1st March 1876, served on the pursuer at the instance of the defender, and had succeeded John Elder in the management of the Edinburgh Liberal Loan Company, having annexed the following account:—
Mr Henry Shaw, coachman, Gilmour Park,

“To David Morison, 77 West Port, Edinburgh.

To amount of bill, dated 31st March 1873, drawn by me on and accepted by you, and payable one day after date,

Less paid to account,

£10 0 0
1 14 0

Carry forward, £8 6 0

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1877.
Shaw v.
Morison.

Brought forward, £8 6 0
 "To sum due for 100 weeks since last payment, at the rate of 2d. per pound on amount of said bill, in consequence of your failure to pay same regularly by weekly instalments, all in terms of your back-letter to me, dated 31st March 1873.—Restricted to twelve weeks, 1 0

£9 6

On this summons decree in absence was pronounced against pursuer on 5th April 1876, on which decree he was subsequently incarcerated.

The pursuer, founding on 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70,* pleaded, inter alia—The pursuer's imprisonment having been for less than £8, 6s. 8d. principal the same was illegal.

The defender pleaded;—The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, insufficient to support the conclusions of the action.

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th December 1876, pronounced this interdict:—"Finds (1) that the sum of £1, covered by the decree upon which pursuer was imprisoned, and which is set forth in the account decreed as 'sum due for 100 weeks since last payment, at the rate of 2d. per pound on amount of said bill, in consequence of your failure to pay same regularly by weekly instalments, all in terms of your back-letter to me, dated March 1873, restricted to twelve weeks,' is interest, in the sense of first section of 5th and 6th Will. IV. cap. 70; and (2) that the said sum of £1 being deducted from the £9, 6s., the amount of the debt contained in the said decree, there remains a sum less than that for the recovery of which, according to the provisions of said statute, execution by imprisonment may lawfully be employed: Therefore repels the first plea in law for the defender, and appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The 2d. a week charge was a consequence of failure to pay the instalments when due was not interest but penalty.¹ (2) If not so, then the 2d. a week was a pure contract accruing to the principal, but arising out of a separate condition of contract. While it was exacted the creditor in the obligation could sue for the principal, and though it was exacted, interest might be charged as well.²

Argued for the pursuer;—This so-called penalty of 2d. a week was interest in the sense of the usury laws. It was money paid for "forbearance" to exact or sue for the principal sum.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised in this case is an important one for this company and for loan companies of a like nature, and still more so for the class which are induced to deal with such companies. It depends entirely on the construction of the Act of 1835.

* 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70, "An Act for abolishing, in Scotland, imprisonment for civil debts of small amount," 1835, enacts, sec. 1, "that from after the 1st day of January 1836 it shall not be lawful to imprison any person or persons on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d. sterling, exclusive of interest and expenses thereon."

¹ Craig v. M'Beath, July 3, 1863, 1 Macph. 1020, 35 Scot. Jur. 587.

² Borthwick v. Lord Advocate, Dec. 5, 1862, 1 Macph. 94, 35 Scot. Jur.

³ Hume's Com. i. 501.

on whether or not this sum of £1 is or is not of the nature of interest. Now, No. 96. take it that interest is what has been described in the usury laws as the sum per cent per annum taken for the "forbearance" to exact or recover a sum lent, Mar. 9, 1877. that is, a payment for the use of money lent. I do not know that a better Shaw v. definition could be given of it. The question is whether this payment of 2d. a Morison. week falls under it.

I do not comment on the nature of the transaction out of which this question arises. It was legal no doubt. For the usury laws being repealed it is open to lenders to make any conditions they please as to the repayment of a loan of money. It is impossible not to observe what the character of the transaction really is.

Four persons unite to grant this bill, admittedly for the benefit of one of them. Then they grant what is called a back-letter, but what is really an additional obligation bearing reference to the bill. It is in these terms—(Reads as quoted, supra, p. 637).

What, then, is the effect of that document? Now, the first thing we are told is that the whole sum of £10 was never advanced. That the whole amount of advance was £9, 5s., fifteen shillings being deducted as interest for the stipulated period. Then there is the provision that while the whole sum of £10 is to be repaid by instalments of 10s. weekly, if failure is made in payment of any of the instalments 2d. a week per £1 is to be paid in addition on the whole £10. It is the same as saying that a sum equivalent to £7, 10s. per cent per annum be taken off in the first place, and then if there is any failure in the repayment of instalments a sum at the rate of forty-three per cent per annum more is added during the period of the failure. I can quite understand that loan companies, who deal with persons having no visible means, are obliged to insist on a wide margin of profit, and to adopt very stringent terms in their transactions to secure themselves against loss. But still, however they may put it, the real question is, whether such sum stipulated to be paid in the event of failure is interest or not—is money to be paid to them for forbearance to sue for or recover money lent. I am unable to see what else it can be called. It is not a duty: that is clear. It is something to be paid, if the use of the money lent is continued over a certain period. I doubt very much whether they could avoid interest over and above on the instalments not paid. Had this been the case under the usury laws there would have been no doubt whatever that the transaction would have been void under their provisions. It would have been one of the most palpable devices to get over the statute of Queen Elizabeth.

That being the case, this sum of £1 contained in the decree is interest, and the remainder of the sum decreed for is of such amount that recovery by interpleader is incompetent under the statute of 5 and 6 Will. IV. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to, and the case remitted to him for further procedure.

LORD ORMDALE.—This case resolves into the question whether the sum of £1 is or is not, to be dealt with as interest and nothing else. The best way of settling this question is by putting another. If it is not interest, what is it? According to any view I can take of the document, which has been somewhat inaccurately called a back-letter, nothing in the way of interest can be claimed if not the £1. Neither has the defender attempted to claim any other sum, and I do not think he could do so successfully. If, therefore, the sum

No. 96.

Mar. 9, 1877.
Shaw v.
Morison.

referred to is not to be held as being interest the result would be that the defender neither made, or could make, any claim for interest at all. It is not expenses. It is not a penalty. And it is not damages, except in so far as interest, may be held to be of the nature of damages.

Mr Campbell for the defender referred to two cases as authorities for the view that the £1 was a penalty. But they are not, I think, in point. In both of them the contract was ad factum prestandum, and there was a penalty for non-performance. But the analogy does not hold when the contract is one of loan, and the debtor's obligation is to repay money. What is the £1 I again ask? It is just interest payable by the one party for the use he has had of money belonging to the other, and in respect of the forbearance of that other to enforce payment of money owing to him. The loan company practically said, we were under no obligation to abstain from enforcing our debt, but so long as we don't get it payment of 2d. per pound per week must be made. What, then, is that 2d. per pound per week but just interest according to the universally accepted definition of what that is.

The result is, therefore, that after interest is deducted the debt, for payment of which the pursuer was incarcerated, is reduced below £8, 6s. 8d. of principal, and consequently the incarceration was illegal.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. The question is a very general one, and I treat it as such, and have looked at the principle on which it rests carefully as I can. The Act of William IV. says,—“It shall not be lawful to imprison any person or persons on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d. sterling, exclusive of interest and expenses thereon.” It is admitted that exclusive of the sum of £1, charged against the pursuer in terms of the letter of obligation relative to the bill, the debt on which the pursuer was imprisoned was less than £8, 6s. 8d.; and the question is whether this sum of £1 is, in the sense of the statute, interest, or whether it is itself a civil debt, which is not interest, and to recover which, if it had been above £8, 6s. 8d., imprisonment would be competent.

It is very seldom that questions like the present now arise, but such questions did arise very frequently under the old usury laws. Very often the question under the old laws relative to usury was, whether a sum or penalty stipulated for by the creditor was or was not interest, for if it was interest or a cover for interest or a device to levy interest under some other name, then, and in these cases, the exaction was struck at by the usury laws. Now, the case now drives us back to the principles which ruled the decisions under these laws. The question is not, as it would have been when these laws were in force, is the sum due? but, is it interest or not? For though interest may now be stipulated to any amount, it is not legal to imprison for it by adding it to make up the sum in a civil debt—that is, it is not legal to add interest to the principal to make the sum due above £8, 6s. 8d. Now, looking at the reality of the transaction in the present case I have come to the conclusion that this sum of £1 is not of the nature of interest, and I think it would certainly have been held to have been interest if the question had arisen under the old law prohibiting usury. Interest is defined to be a sum paid for forbearance to exact the principal. I think this £1 is really paid for forbearance to exact the principal sum in the bill. No doubt the terms used in the letter above referred to are “till such time as you proceed to recover from us as aforesaid.” But a forbearance proceed to recover" is just a forbearance to sue or to exact. I cannot take the intimation that this is not a sum paid for forbearance, but a penalty for failure in paying the weekly instalments. The substance and real meaning of the transaction is to be looked at, and the substance is really this—"If you fail in any of the weekly instalments we are entitled to recover, and so long as we choose to forbear to recover you are to pay us 2d. per pound per week for the forbearance." The spirit of the enactment of Will. IV. is just the spirit of the old laws, and the principles on which they were interpreted are applicable. A creditor, therefore, is not entitled to increase by any device his principal debt so as to avail himself of the very stringent weapon of imprisonment in order to recover.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

D. HOWARD SMITH, L.A.—ALEXANDER WYLIE, W.S.—Agents.

WATT, PHILP, AND COMPANY, Petitioners.—Alison.

No. 97.

Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 67—Error in appointing Meeting—New Meeting ordered.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Watt, Philp,
and Co.

The estates of Watt, Philp, and Company were sequestrated by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on their petition, with concurrence of a creditor. The 67th section of the Bankruptcy Act provides that "the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, by the deliverance which awards the sequestration, appoint a meeting of the creditors to be held at a specified hour on a specified day, being not earlier than six nor later than twelve days from the date of the Gazette notice of sequestration having been awarded," for the purpose of electing a trustee.

1st DIVISION.
B.

In the deliverance awarding sequestration, the Sheriff, per incuriam, intimated the meeting to be held on 6th March, being only four days notice could be given in the Gazette, the first publication of which was on 2d March.

The petition of the bankrupts and of the concurring creditor the Court appointed another day of meeting, and appointed intimation thereof in the intimation.

WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER MUIR MACKENZIE, Bart., Pursuer.—M'Laren—Keir.

No. 98.

JOHN ORD MACKENZIE, W.S. (Matthew Sharpe's Trustee), Defender.—Fraser—Gloag.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

FRANCIS GORDON AND ANOTHER (William Sharpe's Trustees), Defenders.—Kinnear—G. R. Gillespie.

SIR THOMAS KIRKPATRICK, Bart., Defender.—Balfour—Low.

WILLIAM KIRKPATRICK RILAND BEDFORD, Defender.—Trayner.

Session—Destination—Partial Revocation of Conveyance.—An heir of entail in possession having in 1835 obtained a judgment declaring that the entail was null and void to prevent gratuitous alienation, died in 1845, leaving (1) a mortis causa heir, whereby he disposed of the estates to his brother A in liferent allanarly, Authorities quoted.—Gray v. Cockburn, Feb. 2, 1844, 6 D. 569, 16 Scot. Jur. 515; Love v. Anderson, July 17, 1844, 6 D. 686, 16 Scot. Jur. 324; Foubister, petitioner, Oct. 20, 1869, 8 D. 1016, 18 Scot. Jur. 522; Kellock v. Anderson, Dec. 14, 1875, ante, vol. iii. 239.

No 98. and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to his brother B in life; allanarly, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing, to the heirs of the body of his deceased sister, whom failing, to his sister D and the heirs of her body; whom failing, to his "nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever;" and (2) a deed of restriction of subsequent date, whereby he revoked, cancelled, and annulled "the said destination and order of succession in so far as regards the person called and appointed to succeed after my brothers therein named;" declaring to be his intention "that the destination and order of succession in the said trust-disposition and settlement shall not take effect beyond my said brothers and the heirs of their bodies, and that the person or persons further called to the succession shall have no claim to the same, but shall be entirely excluded therefrom, and are hereby excluded accordingly." He reserved a right to name a new series of heirs, and declared that his trust-settlement, in so far as it was restricted, should remain in full force and effect.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

After the death of A and B, who survived the trustor but left no issue, it came in a question between the next heir called under the destination in the deed and the disponees of the last brother B, who had served as heir in general to the trustor, (1) that the terms of the deed of restriction did not revoke the destination in the trust-settlement to the trustor's "heirs and assignees whomsoever;" and (2) that B's right as heir whomsoever was not prejudiced by the fact that a life interest allanarly had been conferred upon him by the same deed.

Opinions, that if the deed of restriction had had the effect of revoking the destination to the grantor's heirs and assignees whomsoever, the trust-settlement failing (in consequence of the death of A and B without issue) to convert the fee would have passed on the trustor's death under the unvacated destination in the entail to the next heir of investiture, and through him to B and his disponees.

2d Division.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
R.

ON 13th June 1876 Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie of Delvine, B. raised an action of declarator against Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, Bart., the Rev. Mr Bedford, to have it found that the pursuer alone had right to the lands of Hoddum, &c., and on 14th August 1876 he raised a similar action against Mr Ord Mackenzie, sole surviving trustee of General Mackenzie Sharpe, and William Sharpe's trustees.

Defences were lodged for all the parties, and the actions were joined.

General Sharpe held the estate of Hoddum under imperfect entail executed by Matthew Sharpe the elder in 1768, and Richard Mackenzie the judicial factor on his estate in 1823, and it was found, by decree of declarator dated 12th June 1835,* that he possessed the right of granting alienation. He died in February 1845, leaving a trust-settlement dated 25th December 1841, by which he conveyed the lands of Hoddum for purposes therein stated. The eighth direction of the trust-deed is expressed:—"So soon as my said trustees shall have paid my debts, and the whole legacies bequeathed by me, and sufficiently secured the annuities owing or bequeathed by me, they shall immediately demit the lands and others hereby conveyed, and of the whole trust-funds and

* This interlocutor applying the judgment of the House of Lords (1 S. M'L. 594) contained, inter alia, the following finding:—"That the pursuer has full and undoubted right and power gratuitously to alienate and dispose of the foresaid lands . . . in any manner he may think proper, and to grant and execute all dispositions, conveyances, deeds, and writings whatsoever, which may be requisite or necessary for effectually conveying the whole or any part of the said lands and others to any person or persons whatsoever, and in any manner that he may think proper; and that the defenders, or any of them, have no claim or demand of any description against the pursuer, or against his heirs and representatives in the event of his death, for or in respect of such alienation or disposal of the said lands and others, or dispositions or other writings which may be granted or executed by the pursuer."

ch may be vested in them, and convey the same omni habili modo, but ect to the liferent of Hallguards and others in favour of the said Wil-Sharpe, to and in favour of the said Alexander Renton Sharpe, in life-for his liferent use allenarly, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in whom failing, to the said William Sharpe in liferent, for his liferent use arly, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee; whom failing, to heirs whomsoever of the body of my deceased sister Dame Jane pe or Kirkpatrick, wife of the said Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick; whom ag, to my sister Mrs Grace Campbell Sharpe or Bedford, wife of the end William Riland Bedford, rector of Sutton-Coldfield, in the ty of Warwick, and the heirs whomsoever of her body; whom ag, to my nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irre-rably, the eldest heir female secluding heirs-portioners, and succeedlways without division throughout the whole course of succession."

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
 Mackenzie v.
 Sharpe's
 Trustees, et al.

William Sharpe and Alexander R. Sharpe were brothers of the truster.
 16th September 1843 General Sharpe executed a deed of restric-

It was in these terms:—"I, General Matthew Sharpe of Hoddom, dering that in December 1841, or about that time, I executed a -disposition and settlement regulating the succession of my heritable es, and being now resolved to restrict the destination and order of ssion therein contained, I do hereby revoke, cancel, and annul the destination and order of succession, in so far as regards the persons l and appointed to succeed after my brothers therein named, and the of their bodies; declaring it to be my will and intention that the nation and order of succession in the said trust-disposition and ment shall not take effect beyond my said brothers and the heirs of bodies, and that the person or persons further called to the succes-shall have no right or claim to the same, but shall be entirely ex-d therefrom, and are hereby excluded accordingly; reserving to lf full power to call and appoint (or name) a new series of heirs to id estates after my said brothers, and the heirs of their bodies, by riting under my hand, which shall have the same force and effect as tained in the said trust-disposition and settlement; and I hereby re that the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement, in so far as not y restricted, shall remain in full force and effect."

the death of General Sharpe the trustees made up a title to the conveyed by the trust-deed, partly under the direct conveyance ined in the settlement itself, and partly under a conveyance which obtained from Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, the immediate younger er of the truster (in which he reserved any right he might have), at their request, served himself heir of entail and provision. At the of the action the estate was held by Mr John Ord Mackenzie as the rrviving trustee.

General Sharpe was survived by three brothers, Charles Kirkpatrick e, Alexander Renton Sharpe, and William Sharpe. They were the sive heirs of provision under the investiture upon which the estate eld, and they all died without issue. William was the last sur-

He died on 18th December 1875. On his death the succession estate of Hoddom, assuming the investiture to remain unaltered, have opened to the pursuer, who accordingly raised the present s to have it declared that he had right to that estate, and that the es of General Sharpe were bound to convey it to him.

ides the trustee of General Sharpe, the defenders were—William e's trustees; Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick and the Reverend W. K. R.
 rd, the heirs-portioners of General Sharpe as at the present time.
 uestees of William Sharpe claimed the estate under a trust-deed and

No. 98.
—
Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

settlement executed by him on 11th May 1870, and the other defenders were willing to allow that claim. But they at the same time pleaded such rights as they individually possessed for the purpose of excluding the claim of the pursuer.

Before his death William Sharpe had made up titles in his personal heir of entail and provision under the investiture under which General Sharpe had held the estate. Thereafter he conveyed the lands to trustees for purposes to which it is unnecessary to refer.

William Sharpe had also served as heir in general to General Sharpe. The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The destination contained in the testamentary deeds of Matthew Sharpe the younger having received full effect regards the liferents thereby constituted, and being now exhausted, the succession to the said lands and estate is now regulated by the deed of entail executed by Matthew Sharpe the elder, and Richard Mackenzie, 1768 and 1823 respectively, so far as the destination therein prescribed is unexhausted. (2) In respect that the pursuer, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, is nearest heir of tailzie and provision under the said deeds of 1768 and 1823, the pursuer is, by survivorship of William Sharpe, vested in the personal fee of the said estates, and is entitled to demand and receive from the defender, the said John Ord Mackenzie, as trustee of General Sharpe, a conveyance thereof, as concluded for in the summa. (3) The destination in the trust-disposition of General Matthew Sharpe having been revoked by deed of restriction in so far as regards the persons called after his brothers and the heirs of their bodies, the defenders, the said Henry Gordon and John Gillespie, as trustees of William Sharpe, have no right or title to the said lands. (4) On the assumption that the beneficial fee of, or radical right to, the estate remained in the hereditas jacens of General Matthew Sharpe, the right thereto devolved on the heirs of provision under the entail in their order.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the deed of restriction executed by Matthew Sharpe on 6th September 1843, the destination in the trust-disposition of 25th December 1841 was revoked in so far as regards the persons called after his brothers, and the heirs of their bodies. (2) No heirs of the bodies of the brothers of Matthew Sharpe having come into existence, the destination contained in his testamentary deeds was ineffectual, except in so far as regards the liferents thereby constituted; and the beneficial fee of or radical right to the lands in question remained in his hereditas jacens. (3) The fee of the said lands and estate having been validly taken up by William Sharpe by the services condescended on, and effectually conveyed by his trust-disposition and settlement, the defenders, as his trustees, are entitled to be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary, on 9th November 1876, pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defenders.*

* "NOTE.—(After narrating the facts as above)—In this state of matters the question is, whether the succession to the estate is regulated by the former investiture, or whether that investiture has been evacuated either by the deed of General Sharpe or by the deed of William Sharpe? The pursuer contends that the deed of restriction revoked the whole destination contained in General Sharpe's trust-deed, including the destination to his own nearest heirs and assigns; that William Sharpe's right was limited to a bare liferent; and that consequently General Sharpe's trust-deed had not the effect of evacuating the tailed investiture, and that William Sharpe, as a liferenter merely, could dispose of the estate. The success of the pursuer depends on his being able to establish two propositions, viz.:—1st, that the destination in General Sharpe's trust-deed to his own nearest heirs and assignees was recalled; and 2nd, that

Sir A. M. Mackenzie reclaimed, and argued ;—General Sharpe's deed No. 98. restriction had the effect of cutting out of his trust-deed the whole ination (including that to heirs and assignees whomsoever) after the ination to his brother William in liferent and the heirs of his body in

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

This was apparent from the following considerations:—(1) The usion of heirs-portioners in the trust-deed made the destination eirs whomsoever also a sort of successio prædilecta. (2) The expres-in the trust-deed "throughout the whole course of succession" obviy applied to the destination to heirs whomsoever as well as to the r parts of the destination, and the expression the "said destination order of succession" in the deed of restriction should therefore be as applying to the same thing. (3) The fair meaning of the words son or persons" in the deed of restriction made them applicable to whole destination in the trust-deed, for heirs whomsoever secluding am Sharpe was effectually excluded from the succession as nearest heir of and provision. For if the destination to heirs remains effectual the pur-is necessarily excluded ; and if William Sharpe was entitled to take up the as heir of tailzie and provision, it is not disputed that he has effectually dis-of the estate to his trustees.

On the first of these questions the Lord Ordinary has found considerable ity in forming an opinion. He inclines, however, to think that the des-on to General Sharpe's nearest heirs has not been recalled. He reads the of revocation as applicable to the successio prædilecta, of which the des-on to heirs whatsoever does not form a part. For, in giving his estate to sirs whomsoever, the truster cannot be understood as selecting any class of but merely as declaring that the estate shall descend as the law directs, and difficult to hold that he intended to exclude the succession of his own st heirs.

But if it be assumed that General Sharpe revoked the destination in favour own heirs his trust-deed did not dispose of the fee of the estate. It is hat in certain events, which did not occur, it would have disposed of the out as it happened, it did no more than confer a successive liferent on nder Renton Sharpe and William Sharpe. If the fee is not disposed of, it, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, descend to the heirs under the investiture ich it was held. Their rights could not be excluded except by a convey-o others. It seems to the Lord Ordinary to be immaterial that during the e of William Sharpe it was uncertain whether or not the fee was disposed be fact remains, though now only ascertained, that there was no effectual ance of the fee of the estate, and hence, in the opinion of the Lord Ordi-the rights of the heirs of investiture were unaffected.

he pursuer argued that the trust-deed had the effect of recalling or eding the destination, so far as William Sharpe was concerned. But it s to the Lord Ordinary that the right of an heir, whether an heir at law eir of provision, can only be defeated by a conveyance to another. This ed as regards an heir-at-law, and the Lord Ordinary sees no difference be-the case of legal succession and succession under a destination. Both must take effect, unless the estate of the ancestor has been otherwise conveyed.

William Sharpe made up his titles as heir of entail and provision. Had st-deed contained an effectual conveyance of the fee this title would have f no avail. But as it turned out that the fee was undisposed of, the title o the Lord Ordinary to be unexceptionable. As the purposes of the trust-except as regards the liferent given to Alexander and William Sharpe, together, the case as regards the fee is the same as if the trust-deed had ed no purposes, or if it had never been executed. It was therefore open heirs of the investiture to make up their title in ordinary form. But ch as William Sharpe survived the Conveyancing Act of 1874 it seems of sequence whether his title was complete or not, for by the 9th section of t a personal right vested in him which enabled him to transmit the estate."

No. 98. heirs-portioners were as much persons as heirs-male nascituri of a s. Besides there was only one person called nominatim to the success. Mar. 10, 1877. The effect, then, of General Sharpe's trust-deed as limited by the restriction was (as events had turned out) to cut his brother Ch. Mackenzie v. Sharpe's Trustees, et al. Kirkpatrick out of the succession, to restrict Alexander Renton William to a liferent, and then to let in the heirs of entail. It argued that this was equivalent to saying that mere words of disinherence could exclude from succession. That was not a sound criticism. There was an absolute conveyance of the fee by General Sharpe to trustees, who held the fee, first, for the issue of Alexander or William they had issue, and if they had not, for the heirs of entail, passing Charles, Alexander, and William. These persons were not disinherited but the estates were absolutely conveyed away from them. If this argument was sound it could not be disputed that Sir Alexander Mackenzie was the heir of entail entitled to succeed.

Argued for William Sharpe's trustees;—Even if the deed of restriction revoked the ultimate destination to heirs whomsoever, General Sharpe's trust was conditional upon there being issue of his brothers. If there was no issue (which event happened) the trust was abortive. In a case the truster was not divested of the radical right or benefit which remained in his hereditas jacens.¹ In that view the persons entitled to the estates on the failure of issue of William Sharpe were the heir of entail—but the heir of entail not as at William Sharpe's death, as at General Sharpe's death, or the first heir of entail thereafter took up the right by service.² If the ultimate destination in General Sharpe's trust-deed was not revoked the heir whomsoever must be looked for as at the General's death. In either view, William was not ally in right of the fee of the estate, for he had expedite service in the possible character. But it was said that William being restricted to a liferent allienarily could never have any private interest in the estate; it was settled law that nothing except an actual and effectual conveyance to some one else could exclude an heir-at-law. So, if the ultimate destination in General Sharpe's deed did not stand, William was not excluded, for he then took as heir-at-law. The same principle applied if the ultimate destination stood. The liferent allienarily under General Sharpe's deed could not prevent William taking as heir of entail; the deed proved abortive.³

Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick and the Rev. Mr Bedford, while they submitted that the argument for William Sharpe's trustees was sound, maintained alternative pleas in the event of its not being effectual.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The different actions which are now before us

¹ Eddlestone's Creditors, Jan. 14, 1801, M. App. voce Adjudication, N. M'Millan v. Campbell, March 4, 1831, 9 Sh. 551, aff. Aug. 14, 1834, 7 Sh. 441; Gilmour v. Gilmour's Trustees, July 3, 1873, 11 Macph. 853, 4 Jur. 521; Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees, June 30, 1876, ante, vol. iii. 9.

² Souter v. Macgregor, Jan. 22, 1801, M. App. voce Implied Will. Balderston v. Fulton, Jan. 23, 1857, 19 D. 293, 29 Scot. Jur. 143; Colvin, Dec. 7, 1860, 23 D. 111, 33 Scot. Jur. 55, and July 15, 1865, 31 D. 1083, 37 Scot. Jur. 568; Storie's Trustees v. Gray, May 29, 1874, ante, vol. iii. 10.

³ Balderston v. Fulton, and Lord v. Colvin, supra, note 2; Stodart v. son, Feb. 5, 1734, Elchies, voce Succession, No. 1; Blackwood v. Dyke, Feb. 1833, 11 Sh. 443, 5 Scot. Jur. 269; Maxwell v. Wylie, May 25, 1834, 12 Sh. 1005, 9 Scot. Jur. 460; Sinclair v. Traill, Feb. 27, 1840, 2 D. 6, 1 Scot. Jur. 384.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

balance the same question. They relate to the right to succeed to the estate of Hoddum, and involve the consideration of the true import and effect of several deeds of settlement and conveyance relative to that estate. The parties to the dispute, although nominally four, are substantially only two—the trustees William Sharpe, who died in 1874, and Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, who claims the estate as heir of the old investiture under which it was held,—and the question is, Whether the estate of Hoddum was validly conveyed by William Sharpe to his trustees, or whether at his death it devolved on Sir A. Muir Mackenzie?

The old investiture under which Sir A. Muir Mackenzie, whom I shall call the pursuer, claims, is an entail executed in 1768 by Matthew Sharpe, who was at the time the proprietor of the estate. By the terms of that instrument, which was intended to be a strict entail, the entailor called to the succession, failing heirs of his body, Charles Kirkpatrick and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, an entire series of substitutes, of whom it is not disputed that the pursuer is now the nearest, and the succession terminates with the granter's nearest heirs and assigns whatsoever. The entailor died without issue, and Charles Kirkpatrick, afterwards Charles Sharpe, made up titles to the estate, and died leaving four sons, of whom General Matthew Sharpe was the eldest. He succeeded his father in 1813, and also completed his title to the lands under the entail, and possessed them until his death in 1845.

In 1832 General Sharpe brought an action in this Court for the purpose of having it declared that he was entitled to alienate, burden, or convey the lands which he were a fee-simple proprietor. The alleged defect in the entail on which he founded was an error in the syntax of the irritant clause, probably occurring in the inscription, by which it was said to be left doubtful what nominative was the true part of the clause. The Court held that the error was only a clerical one, and the sense not doubtful. But this was altered in the House of Lords, and by the usage of their judgment the Court, on applying it, found “that the disposition and deed of entail is not sufficient to prevent the said appellant from selling or otherwise disposing or burthening with debt the said entailed estate, or from gratuitously alienating or disposing of the same.” The words in this decision are unusually broad, but it is not unimportant to remark that they cover only alienation and burdening. The destination in the entail still remained fenced by a prohibitory clause, which this judgment did not touch; and as the law then was understood, it was, to say the least of it, doubtful whether, as long as this investiture remained, it would have been safe to have held a violation of the prohibition. It does not appear that General Sharpe had any intention of alienating the estate beyond that of carrying it to a different class of heirs; and the course he followed, probably under advice, was the execution of a deed of trust, which is dated in 1841, the import and legal effect of which is one of the most important elements in the decision of this case. The import of that trust-deed, in so far as it was to take direct effect, was the payment of debts and legacies, and the securing of certain annuities after the death of the granter. It was entirely a mortis causa conveyance. For these purposes the estate of Hoddum and others were conveyed by a formal title to the trustees named, of whom Mr Ord Mackenzie is the last survivor; but they were excluded, after these purposes were fulfilled, to denude of the trust, and to convey the estates thus vested in them to Alexander Renton Sharpe, the third son of Charles Sharpe, and brother of the granter, in liferent, for his life.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

rent use allenerly, and to the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee; who failing, to William Sharpe, who was the youngest of the brothers, in liferent, &c. his liferent use allenerly, and the heirs whomsoever of his body in fee; who failing, to the heirs whomsoever of his two sisters, Jane Sharpe and Grace Campbell Sharpe, and the heirs whomsoever of their bodies in fee; whom failing, his nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever.

It seems sufficiently certain that but for the ultimate destination to his heirs and assignees, this deed, as it stood, would simply have interposed successive rights of liferent and fee conferred by it between the granter and other substitutes called in the existing investitures of the estate. There is mention of the old investiture in the trust-deed, nor are there any other words from which it could be inferred that the granter had any intention of interfering with it beyond the interest of the persons thus favoured. But the conveyance to his own nearest heirs and assignees of course, if effectual, would entirely have extinguished the former investiture, and left the succession to the estate to depend on the conveyance which the trustees were thus directed to execute.

For reasons which do not appear, it seems that before his death General Sharpe had altered his intention with regard to the descendants of his sisters, and accordingly executed a deed or instrument, in which he recalls the instructions given to his trustees to include them in the conveyance which the trustees were directed to grant when the purposes of the trust were fulfilled, and cancels and revokes the destination and order of succession in "so far as regards the persons called and appointed to succeed after my brothers therein named and the heirs of their bodies." The peculiar phraseology of this deed of restriction is adverted to afterwards. But it may be assumed that the testator's primary object in executing it was to exclude these persons from the succession, and that he had no intention beyond this of reviving the old destination, or in any way impairing the validity or effect of the trust-deed itself, by which he certainly intended to supersede it. Whether this, however, be the true import of the words, remains to be considered.

General Sharpe died in 1845. The trustees made up a title, in so far as they thought they could effectually, to the lands conveyed. But it is important to mention a fact which has a considerable bearing on the questions now at issue, that the two brothers on whom these liferent rights were conferred were not of them the next heir of the old investiture. There was a third and younger brother, the well-known Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, who was the next heir entitled to succeed under the former destination, and who was entirely excluded by the conveyance directed by the trust-deed. In order to fortify their title to the lands, the trustees applied to Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe to obtain his assent, and he served as nearest heir of provision to his brother General Sharpe. Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe accordingly, in 1845, executed a disposition of the whole lands to the trustees, in which he reserves any right which he himself might have had regard to them, and conveys them to the trustees for the purposes of the trust, and makes them his procurators to have him served as nearest heir of line and provision to his brother. From the statement on the record on this subject we gather that this procuratory was only used as regarded some of the lands comprised in the deed having temporarily fallen aside, the account of it given in the deed is imperfect. It is, however, in my opinion, an important element in the case. It has now been recovered.

The trust, which has now lasted for thirty-three years, has not yet been wound up.

, and no conveyance has been granted by the trustees, not because they had power to hold after the debts and legacies had been paid and the annuities provided for, but from some practical considerations which are of no importance. Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe died in 1851. Alexander Renton Sharpe died up no title to the estate, and died in 1860 without issue. On his death William Sharpe expedite a service as nearest heir of provision to his brother Charles, who died last vest and seised in the estate, subject to the burden of the trust-right; and he also served to his brother General Sharpe as nearest heir of provision in the lands to which the service of Charles did not apply, and also served to the General as heir of line and conquest. While his title so stood, he executed a trust-conveyance of the estate of Hoddum to trustees, with directions to sell the estate and apply the proceeds in the manner directed by his testament. The question we have now to determine is, Whether these trustees, being the pursuer as the heir of investiture, are now entitled to the estate? If the destination in the trust-disposition of 1845 still subsists and is effectual there can be no question that the pursuer must fail, because the destination in the old investiture was truly extinguished. There can be no question that by his own nearest heirs and assigns whatsoever General Sharpe meant to call his estate-general, and not the heirs of investiture. But the pursuer contends that the words of the deed of restriction import not only a recall of the substitution in favour of the descendants of the grantor's sisters, but also a recall of the ultimate destination in favour of his own nearest heirs and assigns. The Lord Ordinary has repelled this plea, and in doing so he decides in conformity with the directions expressed (although no direct judgment was given) in a former litigation connected with this estate, by Lord Jerviswoode in the Outer-House and Lord Ardmillan in the First Division (not reported). I have come, with little hesitation, to think that the pursuer's construction is one which the words of the instrument will not admit of. I have already pointed out that the judgment of the House of Lords left the prohibition against altering the order of succession still in full force. It might have been made a serious question, on the principles established in the cases of Oliphant (June 7, 1816, F. C.) and Lindsay v. Earl of Boyle (H. of L. Sept. 5, 1844, 3 Bell's App. 254), whether the trust-disposition, as originally executed, was anything but an alteration of the order of succession, and so ineffectual inter hæredes, although no such question can arise, seeing that the title in the trustees derived from Charles Sharpe became complete in their persons by virtue of the Entail Act of 1848. But it cannot be denied that the truster, after having done what he could to extinguish and despite the old investiture, had any intention of reviving it. Neither can I suppose that he could recall the ultimate destination to his own heirs for the purpose of letting it pass to those of the entailor. But apart from these considerations, the phraseology of the instrument seems to indicate the intention of the maker of it beyond all reasonable doubt. It refers to persons "appointed and called" to the succession; it speaks of the "persons further called to the succession" having no right, but being "entirely excluded therefrom." The grantor reserves to himself "full power to call and appoint a new series of heirs" to his said estate, or my said brothers and the heirs of their bodies, by any writing under my hand, which shall have the same effect as if contained in the said disposition of the estate. These expressions seem to indicate quite clearly that his sole intention in executing this deed of restriction was to exclude the specific persons named and appointed and their heirs from the succession, and to call and ap-

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v.
Sharpe's
Trustees, et al.

point a new series in their place between his brothers and the heirs of their bodies and the ultimate destination. To cancel the ultimate destination merely to replace it would not have been to call or appoint a new series; nor is it reasonable to suppose that, whoever might compose the new series, the ultimate destination would not have been the same.

These expressions, moreover, are not appropriate to such a destination. "Heirs and assignees" are hardly "called and appointed." The law calls and appoints the first, and a new exercise of power the second. The destination to him whatsoever merely amounts to a declaration that the disposer has no personal direct selection to make, and wishes his property to descend as the law may direct.

I feel, therefore, no difficulty in holding that the ultimate destination directed by the trust-deed remained entirely in force.

Having formed a clear opinion on this point, it might be unnecessary to press to the second view, on which the Lord Ordinary has decided, but I shall add one or two remarks on this aspect of the question, as I think that the pursued case on this head is quite as hopeless as on the other.

If we are to suppose that the directions contained in the trust-deed enjoin the trustees to execute a conveyance only to these two brothers in succession, liferent for their liferent use alienably and the heirs of their bodies respectively in fee, it is manifest that the trust-deed contained no effectual disposition of the fee in the event of there being no heirs of the bodies of the two brothers, so that therefore the beneficial right to the fee must be looked for elsewhere. If there was no subsisting investiture that beneficial right was vested at once in the heir at law of the granter, and that from his death. If, on the other hand, there was a subsisting investiture, then it may be that the right of fee vested in the heir of that investiture. But this right was not suspended, as seemed to be the impression, until it should be seen whether the brothers had issue. If there was no fiduciary fee in the liferenters. The fee vested at once, and became operative right from the date of General Sharpe's death. It is now settled that where one who is the nearest lawful heir at the time serves to an ancestor, although there be a nearer heir in spe, his right in the case of fee-simple land of intestacy becomes absolute notwithstanding that a nearer heir may afterwards be born—as was held in the case of Grant v. Grant's Trustees, Dec. 2, 1859, 22 D. 53. Even where the succession is tailzied, it was held in the Carnock case (Stirling v. Nicolson, Dec. 2, 1859, 22 D. 72) that the remoter heir acquires an active right by his service, although he may be under obligation to denude in the event of a nearer heir coming into existence. Assuming, then, on this hypothesis, that the old investiture still subsisted, and that the trust was a mere burden on the right of fee, the heir in right of this fee under the old investiture was Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, who took up the right by a valid service, and disposed of the fee to the trustees for their trust purposes. By doing so it may be that he postponed his own right to the liferent of his brothers, and the fee in their possession. But meantime the radical fee was vested in him, and from him it was transmitted to William Sharpe, who made up his title by service to his brother. If, then, there was nothing to exclude Charles Sharpe's right to the fee, there was as little to exclude that of the heir of Charles Sharpe, in whom the fee was vested in fee-simple at his death, and from whom they descended to the pursuers. William Sharpe was therefore fully entitled to vest the estate in himself and to deal with it; and I cannot doubt that he has dealt with it effectually. In either view there is no room for the pursuer's claim. The fee, being of, vested at once in the nearest heir, whether at law or under the investiture, whatever may have been the obligations incumbent on him should a nearer heir have been born.

In this view it is plain that the restriction of William Sharpe's right to a contingent alienary under the trust-deed could not possibly deprive him of his share's succession, with which the trust-deed did not deal. The recent case of Macfie has no application. A conveyance to one for his life-tenant use alienary does not actually exclude him from the fee if it be given to some one else, and a destination to the heirs whatsoever of the life-tenant is a clear gift to some one, seeing that no man can be his own heir. But a destination to one in life-tenant alienary and the heirs of the granter in fee will not necessarily exclude the granter from the fee, should he ultimately come to be the heir.

LORD ORMDALE and LORD GIFFORD delivered opinions concurring with his Lordship on both points.

THE COURT adhered.

LINDSAY, HOWE, TYTLER, & CO., W.S.—MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—
GILLESPIE & PATERSON, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 98.

Mar. 10, 1877.
Mackenzie v. Sharpe's Trustees, et al.

THE BRITISH LINEN COMPANY, Appellants.—Kinnear—Mackintosh.
JOHN GOURLAY (Alexander and Baird's Trustee), Respondent.—
Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 99.

Mar. 13, 1877.
British Linen Co. v. Gourlay.

Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 65—Security—Bill of Lading.—A, a manufacturer, shipped a cargo of goods to a foreign port, and made the bills of lading in the name of B. He then handed the bills of lading and authorised him by letter to hypothecate the goods, with liability to meet for any surplus realised, and in return obtained an advance for which he presented bills. B discounted the bills with a bank, handing them the bills of lading and letter of authority. The bank sent the bills of lading to a merchant as part of delivery with instructions to realise the goods and remit the proceeds to them. When the goods were only partially realised, and the remainder insufficient to meet the claim of the bank, A became bankrupt, and B also became insolvent.

The bank having claimed to rank upon A's estate for the balance due on the bills of lading called upon them to value and deduct the security they held in the goods unrealised, as being part of the bankrupt's property. Held, on appeal, the bank was not bound to value and deduct the goods, as, in a question between the bank and the bankrupt, the goods must be held to be the property of B.

The trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander and Baird, handkerchief manufacturers, Glasgow, rejected a claim of the British Linen Company for £2558, "in respect that the claimants have failed to value and deduct certain securities held by them over the bankrupts' estates, or the proceeds thereof. The portions of the bankrupts' estates over which the claimants hold a security are certain goods belonging to the bankrupts, hypothecated for advances, and held by the claimants."

The claimants, who maintained that the goods did not belong to the bankrupt estate, appealed to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills.

The facts of the case as admitted or proved by the documents produced are as follows:—In December 1874 Alexander and Baird prepared a bill of lading for handkerchiefs for shipment to Rangoon. They obtained an advance of £2957 upon the goods from Galbraith, Reid, and Company of Glasgow, and by letter dated 21st December they sent the latter firm bills of lading, which they had previously made out in their name as shippers, the goods being consigned to Galbraith, Dalziel, and Company

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Adam.
M.

No. 99. of Rangoon.* The letter proceeded,—“Against this shipment we have to receive £2957, and we hereby give you liberty to hypothecate the same to your order, and to request your friends in Rangoon to remit the proceeds on realisation, likewise to your order, handing us any surplus shown in account-current, and claiming from us any deficiency which may arise, and which we hereby promise to pay.—Yours faithfully, ALEXANDER & BAIRD.

Mar. 13, 1877.
British Linen
Co. v. Gourlay.

Alexander and Baird accepted bills for the advance, which Galbraith, Reid, and Company, the drawers, discounted with the British Linen Company, handing the bank the bills of lading with the following letter dated 23d December :—“We beg to enclose the documents undernoted as collateral security for bills held or discounted, or to be held or discounted by you, bearing the names of Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and Alexander and Baird, and we request that you will forward the bills of lading to Messrs Galbraith, Dalziel, and Company, Rangoon, with instructions that they will receive and realise on your account the goods which the documents sent herewith represent, and remit the proceeds to you in first class bank paper, such remittances to be applied by you in payment of the above-mentioned bills.

“It is distinctly understood that you shall have full power to transfer the goods at any time from the said Messrs Galbraith, Dalziel, and Company to any other house you may think proper for realisation, and to bring this transaction to a close within twelve months from the date hereof.”

In acknowledging receipt the bank wrote,—“It is distinctly understood that we shall be entitled to exercise the rights of ownership over the goods, but that no responsibility whatever shall be attachable to us for the realisation thereof, or for any remittances connected therewith.”

The bank then forwarded the bills of lading to Galbraith, Dalziel, and Company of Rangoon, with instructions to realise the goods and remit the proceeds to them.

This was done to a certain extent, but before all the goods were realised Alexander and Baird became bankrupt, and Galbraith, Reid, and Company also became insolvent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—“Finds that the appellants are entitled to be ranked as creditors in terms of their claim, and ordains the trustee to rank them accordingly,” &c.†

* 16th December 1874.—“Shipped . . . by Galbraith, Reid and Company on board the steamship ‘Irrawaddy’ . . . unto Messrs Galbraith, Dalziel and Company.”

† “NOTE.— . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the deliverance of the trustee is wrong. He does not think that in a question with the bank the goods are to be considered as any part of the estates of Alexander and Baird, the partners of which they are bound to deduct in order to draw a dividend, in terms of the 65th section of the Bankruptcy Act. The bank did not transact in any way with Alexander and Baird, but with Galbraith, Reid, and Company, with whom, as holders of the bills of lading, and therefore as having a title to the goods, they were entitled to transact as owners. The bank are bound to account to Galbraith, Reid, and Company for the proceeds of the goods, and not to Alexander and Baird. Galbraith, Reid, and Company have stopped payment, and the bank maintain that they are bound to deduct the value of the goods in rank on their estate, and not on the estate of Alexander and Baird.

“Alexander and Baird received from Galbraith, Reid, and Company the proceeds of the bills, and, in respect thereof, transferred to them the goods in question. It would seem to be inequitable that Alexander and Baird, or their creditors, should thus receive the benefit not only of the proceeds of the bills, but also of the proceeds or value of the goods, while Galbraith, Reid, and Company, who advanced the money, are to be deprived of the benefit of the security which they had stipulated for and obtained.”

The trustee reclaimed, and argued ;—The real question was, who were the true owners of the goods ? The bankrupts granted their creditors full power to deal with the goods, but they never parted with the right of ownership. That appears distinctly from the letters which were handed to the bank, so that they knew that Galbraith, Reid, and Company were of the true owners. Indeed the true nature of the transaction was not denied. The bank, therefore, holding security over goods which were the property of the bankrupts, were bound to value and deduct it.

Argued for the British Linen Company ;—A creditor was not bound to value and deduct, unless the subject, but for the security, would have been available to the body of creditors. But this subject would not have been available. All the right that the trustee had against Galbraith, Reid, and Company was a claim to account in the event of there being a surplus. That right was not the right hypothecated to the bank. They got real security in the goods from Galbraith, Reid, and Company, who had an absolute right to hypothecate them. It was therefore in dealing with Galbraith, Reid, and Company that the bank must deduct the value of the goods at security.¹ Further, as the goods were not sufficient to meet Galbraith and Reid's claim, there was no estate of the bankrupt until that claim was satisfied. One firm had the absolute title and possession. The other had a mere security right. Both became bankrupt. The question was, to which estate the bank had to account for the goods.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The trustee in this sequestration has rejected a claim by the British Linen Company, “in respect that the claimants have failed to value and deduct certain securities held by them over the bankrupts' estates, or part thereof. The portions of the bankrupts' estates over which the claimants hold security are certain goods belonging to the bankrupts, hypothecated for advances, and held by the claimants.”

The question is whether the goods form any part of the bankrupt estate of Alexander and Baird.

That they originally did so admits of no dispute. The bankrupts were manufacturers of silk and cotton handkerchiefs at Glasgow. The goods were manufactured by them, and were intended for shipment to Rangoon. But as the manufacturers desired to obtain a pretty full advance upon the goods, they addressed themselves to the firm of Galbraith, Reid, and Company, which has also become insolvent, and obtained from them an advance of £2957. Of course the advance was not done without security, and the nature of the security is the point on which this case depends. On 21st December 1874 Alexander and Baird wrote to Galbraith, Reid, and Company as follows:—“We have handed you the goods for lading of”—then follows the description of the cases. “Against this advance we have to receive £2957, and we hereby give you liberty to hypothecate the same to your order, and to request your friends in Rangoon to remit proceeds on realisation, likewise to your order, handing us any surplus shewn on account-current, and claiming from us any deficiency which may arise, and which we hereby promise to pay.—Yours faithfully, ALEXANDER & BAIRD.”

Now, the bills of lading bore that the goods were shipped, not by Alexander Baird, but by Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and consigned to Galbraith, Reid, and Company, who were admittedly agents and correspondents of Gal-

No. 99.

Mar. 13, 1877.
British Linen
Co. v. Gourlay.

¹ Hamilton v. Western Bank, Dec. 13, 1856, 19 D. 152, 29 Scot. Jur. 77 ;
Elland v. Bank of Scotland, Feb. 27, 1857, 19 D. 574, 29 Scot. Jur. 269 ;
Royal Bank v. Forbes, Dec. 3, 1858, 21 D. 79, 31 Scot. Jur. 50.

No. 99. Braith, Reid, and Company. Ex facie of the bills, therefore, Alexander and Baird had no connection with the goods, and the bills must be taken to have been made by them for the purpose of creating a direct title in their creditors to deal with and realise them, they being under an obligation, but an obligation not appearing on the bills, to account.

Mar. 13, 1877.
British Linen
Co. v. Gourlay.

There was some argument as to whether under these documents there remained in the person of Alexander and Baird a radical right to the goods. That I admit of considerable doubt, because the obligations which Alexander and Baird were under to their creditors, apart from the title which they gave, was to allow them to realise the goods through their agents at Rangoon, and to be accountable merely for any surplus that might arise. Therefore the question whether anything was left to Alexander and Baird but a mere right of reversion may be doubtful.

I am, however, willing to assume that there might be a radical right. Still the security created in favour of Galbraith, Reid, and Company was in its nature a security which conferred a title of property ex facie. There can be no doubt that Galbraith, Dalziel, and Company, on receiving instructions from Galbraith, Reid, and Company, were entitled to sell the goods and remit the proceeds to Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and nobody, neither Alexander and Baird nor anybody else, could interfere to prevent them. The proceeds of the goods, when realised, were to come into the hands of Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and nobody else.

Now, the object for which this title was conferred by Alexander and Baird upon their creditors, Galbraith, Reid, and Company, was to enable the latter to transfer this security in the most effectual way to a bank, with whom they were about to discount the bills which they drew on Alexander and Baird, and the documents of title were transferred to the bank by Galbraith, Reid, and Company in letters which shew clearly that, following out this arrangement, the bank assumed the position of owners, and in that capacity dealt with the bank. It is perfectly clear from the terms of the letter of 24th December, giving the bank power to realise the goods to meet the bills. The bank accordingly added its own name to the foreign house, and gave them instructions to realise the goods on account of the bank. They were realised to a certain extent, and the proceeds were remitted to the bank. But when Alexander and Baird became bankrupt, and Galbraith, Reid, and Company stopped payment, a considerable balance was still due to the bank. Of course it is to be assumed that the proceeds of the remaining goods will be insufficient to meet this, otherwise there would be no interest in the contention. It is plain that the bank's debt will absorb the whole proceeds of these goods. The question is, whether, so far as not realised, they are to be dealt with under the 65th section of the statute as part of the estate of Alexander and Baird. The Lord Ordinary has expressed the law applicable to the case in a single sentence, which I entirely adopt:—"The bank did not transact in any way with Alexander and Baird, but with Galbraith, Reid, and Company, with whom, as holders of the bills of lading, and they as having a title to the goods, they were entitled to transact as owners. The bank are bound to account to Galbraith, Reid, and Company for the proceeds of the goods, and not to Alexander and Baird."

That is a very accurate statement of the law. Alexander and Baird, by their transactions with their creditors Galbraith, Reid, and Company, put themselves in a position to deal with the goods as owners. They did deal with the bank on that footing, and in the transaction with the bank Alexander and Baird had no cern at all. On that ground, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the tee has gone wrong, and that the goods must be dealt with, in a question with bank, as belonging to the insolvent estate of Galbraith, Reid, and Company.

No. 99.

Mar. 13, 1877.
British Linen
Co. v. Gourlay.

ORD DEAS.—There are two forms in which, by our law and practice, securities be granted whether over moveable or heritable estate,—one in the declared of a security merely ; the other an absolute title with an obligation to unt. The effect of each of these is quite different. There are a host of s in the books on this subject relating to heritable estate, which are just as h in point as those which have been cited, if it were necessary to quote them.
ference to many of them will be found in my opinion in the recent case of on v. Gordon, &c., 26th June 1874, 1 Rettie, 1093.

do not think it either necessary or safe to go to England for authority on particular point. Our law on this subject comprehends both heritable and eable rights. The English law is not the same.

he whole question comes to be whether, on the face of these documents, the of Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and consequently of the bank, was absolute.
I am clearly of opinion that it was so, and consequently that the obligation of bank was merely an obligation to account subject to deduction of the debt.
letter of 21st December must be read along with the bills of lading which sent with it. Ex facie of these documents, as framed by Alexander and d, the title of Galbraith, Reid, and Company was undoubtedly absolute, and it was so understood by the parties is clear from the documents which fold, particularly the letter of 23d December.

he valuation and deduction are admittedly to be made in ranking upon the estate or the other. I am clearly of opinion that this falls to be done in ing on the estate of Galbraith, Reid, and Company and not on that of Alex-r and Baird.

ORD MURE.—The question is one of some nicety, but I have come to the conclusion. I think the transaction between Galbraith, Reid, and Com-and the bank, ex facie of the documents, gave the bank an absolute right e disposal of the goods, which, indeed, they expressly stipulated for. In circumstances the handing over of the bills of lading to the bank by Gal-h, Reid, and Company, in whose name they were drawn, seems to me to be valent substantially to the granting of the delivery-order in Hamilton v. The tern Bank (supra, p. 653, note 1); and having regard to the rules laid down in and subsequent cases I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

ORD SHAND.—The question is, whether the goods were, in the sense of the section of the bankrupt statute, the estate of the bankrupts, in which case value must be deducted, or of Galbraith, Reid, and Company. I do not t that in a question between Galbraith, Reid, and Company, and Alexander Baird, there remained a radical right of property in the goods in the latter firm.
goods were put under the full control of Galbraith, Reid, and Company for sation. But, I think, that firm did not in any true sense become proprietors.
ander and Baird were, I think, entitled to get back the goods on payment e advances and of any sums which that firm might properly claim for comions. And if Galbraith, Reid, and Company had paid the bills to the bank not doubt that on their making a claim against Alexander and Baird the ee would have been entitled to require them to deduct the value of the goods

No. 99. on the footing that these goods were the property of the bankrupts, held in security; and would have been entitled to delivery of the goods under the provisions of the statute which entitle the trustee to purchase a creditor's security. Mar. 13, 1877. British Linen Co. v. Gourlay. But though this be so, the fact was that Alexander and Baird gave a title to Galbraith, Reid, and Company, which enabled them to deal with the goods practically as owners, and probably nothing short of such a title would have been accepted. Having this title Galbraith, Reid, and Company dealt with the bank as in right of the goods. It is not alleged that the goods will produce more than enough to pay the advance which the bank made to them; and, this being so, the goods must, I think, be taken to be part of their estate which has been exhausted in meeting their debt to the bank. I do not think with your Lordships that an absolute title was necessary to operate this result. Suppose the case of a title created by a bond and disposition in security, on an assignment of which the bank had advanced £5000, and the bank came to rank upon the estate of the person to whom they had made this advance, and who had granted them the assignation, I think they would be bound to value and deduct the estate conveyed by the bond and disposition in security though plainly it was held as a security title only, and the radical right of property was in another party. And, on the other hand, in ranking for any debt on the estate of the grantor of the bond (the owner of the property), they would not be bound to deduct the value of the property, assuming that its value was required to meet their claim against the insolvent grantor of the assignation to them.

It is also worthy of consideration that the practical result of sustaining the argument for Alexander and Baird might be that they would receive double payment in part at least for the same goods. Suppose that of £3000 worth of goods a small part, realising only £100, had been sold, the contention is that though the bankrupts had already got £3000 in the advance made to them by Galbraith, Reid, and Company at the time of consignment, the bank should again give the value for the goods, and value and deduct as if the goods still belonged exclusively to them: that would be obviously double payment or value for the same goods—a result which shews that the argument for the trustee is unsound.

It may not be necessary but it is often very useful to refer to English authority and I think the judgment we are to pronounce is much fortified by a case which in the course of the argument I referred to—ex parte Brett, L. R., 6 Ch. App., 838. If the law of England were based on any specialties it could not be advantageously founded on or referred to; but the rule in bankruptcy is precisely the same as in this country. The 99th rule framed in compliance with the English bankruptcy statute regarding the obligation of secured creditors to deduct the value of any estate belonging to the bankrupts, their debtors, &c. in these terms:—"A secured creditor, unless he shall have realised his security shall, previously to being allowed to prove or vote, state in his proof the particulars of his security, and the value at which he assesses the same, and he shall be deemed to be a creditor only in respect of the balance due to him after deducting such assessed value of the security." In the case of Brett the point now to be decided arose. The question was whether goods sent home by a merchant abroad for realisation on "sale and return" to a merchant in this country who had made advances on them and on the security of the bills of lading, and who in his turn had obtained advances from a bank, were to be deducted from the estate of the merchant in this country. The Judge in bankruptcy held that the merchant abroad was the owner, and that the bank were not bound to deduct the value of the goods from their claim on the bankrupt estate of the merchant in this country; but Lords Justices James and Mellish reversed that decision, holding that the transference, though only in security, made the goods substantially part of the estate of the merchant who had made the advances to his foreign correspondent, and that the bank having got the benefit of the security from him must deduct its value in ranking on his estate.

THE COURT adhered.

MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—Agents.

STEEL AND CRAIG, Pursuers.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

No. 100.

THE STATE LINE STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Defenders.—Asher—Jameson.

Mar. 18, 1877.
British Linen
Co. v. Gourlay.

Ship—Carrier—Bill of Lading—Negligence.—A bill of lading may be extended so as to exclude the shipowners' liability for loss caused by the negligence of his servants.

THIS was an action by Steel and Craig, grain merchants, Glasgow, against the State Line Steamship Company for damage to a cargo of wheat. 1st Division.
Lord Young.
B.

The following issue was tried before Lord Young and a jury:—Whether, on or prior to 31st August 1875, Messrs Sawyer, Wallace, and Company, grain merchants in New York, shipped on board the defenders' steamship 'State of Virginia' 15,409½ bushels of wheat in good order and condition, to be conveyed in terms of the bill of lading contained in the schedule annexed hereto; and whether the defenders, in breach of the undertaking contained in the said bill of lading, failed to deliver the wheat at the port of Glasgow in the like good order and condition, he loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers, as indorsees and holders of the said bill of lading?"

The bill of lading, after the usual obligation to deliver the goods in the good order and condition as received, bore:—"Not accountable for age, breakage, . . . howsoever caused. Not responsible for the bursting of bags, or consequences arising therefrom, or for any of the following losses, whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or persons in the service of the ship, or for whose acts the shipowner is liable or otherwise: namely, risk of theft, or hulk, or transshipment, explosion, heat or fire at sea, in craft or on shore, boilers, steam or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto, howsoever such damage or injury may be caused, collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation and transit, of whatever nature or kind soever, and howsoever caused, except as aforesaid."

The jury returned the following special verdict:—"In respect of the oral agreement between the said parties they find that Messrs Sawyer, Wallace, and Company, on or prior to 31st August 1875, shipped at New York, on board the defenders' steamship 'State of Virginia,' 15,409½ bushels of wheat, in good order and condition, to be conveyed to the port of Glasgow, in terms of the bill of lading set out in the schedule appended to the issue: Find that the defenders did carry the said wheat to the port of Glasgow in the said steamship, and did there deliver the same to the pursuers, who are the onerous indorsees and holders of the said bill of lading: Find that the said wheat when so delivered was not in the like good order and condition in which it was when shipped at New York, but damaged by sea-water: Find that, through the negligence of some of the crew, one of the orlop-deck ports of the said steamship was insufficiently fastened, and that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby

No. 100. admitted to the hold after the ship had been five days at sea: Find that as the ship was loaded, the said port was situated about a foot above the water-line, and that, if properly fastened by means of the screws there attached, the said port would have been water-tight throughout the voyage: Find that the said sea-water was not admitted to the hold until the morning of the 6th September, and that for the first seven days of the voyage the weather encountered was substantially as set forth in the mate's log, No. 49 of process: Find that in the said bill of lading, the terms 'craft' and 'hulk' do not mean the defenders' ocean steamers, and, in particular, do not mean the said 'State of Virginia': Find that, if the pursuers are entitled to a verdict, the amount due to them as damages is the sum of And the jury reserve to the Court to enter up the verdict for the pursuers or defenders according as the Court shall be of opinion in point of law that, in respect of the facts above found, the defenders have or have not committed a breach of their contract with the pursuers, as embodied in the said bill of lading."

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

The pursuers argued;—The clause, "not responsible," &c., was separated into two members, the second beginning with the word "collision." According to that reading, assuming that the cause of damage was a peril of the sea, the previous words, "whether arising from the negligence . . . of the . . . mariners . . . or otherwise" were not applicable; and as this peril was caused by the negligence of the mariners, for whose acts the shipowner was responsible, it was not an excepted risk. It was only a certain class of risks in the former part of the clause that were excepted even if caused by negligence.¹

The defenders argued;—There was only one clause. The words "not responsible" at the beginning governed the whole, and so did the word "excepted" at the end, though it was superfluous. It meant, "which is excepted." Therefore a peril of the sea, such as this accident, was expressly excepted even though caused by the negligence of the mariners. Indeed there were several insurance cases which decided that that would be so without express stipulation. The only responsibility left on the owners was to provide a seaworthy ship. But even if the clause were read in two parts, perils of the sea, "howsoever caused," are excepted and therefore the verdict should be entered up for the defenders.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, by bill of lading, dated at New York on the 31st of August 1875, the defenders undertook to carry 15,000 bushels of wheat from New York to Glasgow by their steamship called the "State of Virginia."

¹ Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Co., May 30, 1864, 33 L. J. Ex. 269; Moes, Moliere, and Tromp v. Leith and Amsterdam Shipping Co., Jan. 5, 1867, 5 Macph. 988, 39 Scot. Jur. 546; Nugent v. Smith, May 29, 1867, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 423; Phillips v. Clark, April 23, 1857, 26 L. J. C. P. 16; Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co., Nov. 9, 1867, L. R. 3 C. P. 14; Ly v. Mells, June 19, 1804, 5 East, 428; Stevenson v. Henderson, Nov. 25, 1862, ante, vol. i. 215, H. of L. June 1, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 71; Finlay v. North British Railway Co., July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, Addison on Contracts (7th ed.), 50.

² Davidson v. Burnaud, Nov. 30, 1868, L. R. 4 C. P. 117; Redman v. son, June 28, 1845, 14 Meeson and Welsby, 476; Dixon v. Sadler, 1834, Meeson and Welsby, 405, affd. 1841, 8 Meeson and Welsby, 895; Walker Maitland, Nov. 3, 1821, 5 Barnw. and Ald. 171; The Duero, July 31, 1862, L. R. 2 Adm. 393; Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Co. v. Shand, June 22, 1865, 3 Moore, P. C. (N. S.) 272; Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., May 8, 1852, 21 L. J. Exch. 261; Austin v. Manchester Railway Co., May 3, 1852, 21 L. J. C. P. 178; McCawley v. Furness Railway Co., Nov. 1872, L. R. 8 Q. B. 57; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co., June 4, 1868, L. R. 1 C. P. 600, and May 12, 1868, L. R. 3 C. P. 476.

assigned to the pursuers of this action. The special verdict finds that the defenders did carry the wheat to the port of Glasgow, and delivered it there to the users, but it finds also that the wheat when so delivered was not in the like good order and condition in which it was when shipped in New York, but was damaged by sea-water; and it finds further, "that, through the negligence of some of the crew, one of the orlop-deck ports of the said steamship was insufficiently fastened, and that in consequence the said sea-water was thereby admitted to the hold, after the ship had been five days at sea;" and "that as the ship was loaded, the said port was situated about a foot above the water-line, and that, if properly fastened by means of the screws thereto attached, the said port would have been water-tight throughout the voyage." Now, my Lords, if it had been dealing with an ordinary contract of affreightment,—I mean such a contract of lading as we were accustomed to in former days,—the effect of this special verdict could not have been doubtful, because it is distinctly found that the damage which was sustained by the wheat on board the defenders' ship was caused by the negligence of the mariners. No doubt the proximate cause of the injury was sea-water, but that sea-water was admitted to the hold of the vessel through the negligence of the mariners; and for that at common law, and independent of any express stipulation in the contract of affreightment, there cannot be the smallest doubt that the shipowners are liable. But this case has been brought before us in the form of a special verdict, in consequence of the very peculiar terms of the bill of lading, and particularly of that part of the bill of lading which enumerates excepted risks. The bill of lading stipulates expressly in usual form that goods are to be delivered at the port of destination in the like good order and condition as they were received at the port of loading; but there immediately follows a very long and special clause containing a number of exemptions from liability stipulated by the shipowners, and I think it is conceded on the part of the shipowners, the defenders here, that the object of this clause was to exempt them from all liability implied in the obligation to deliver in like good order and condition, except a liability which might arise from the unseaworthiness of the vessel. If they provided a seaworthy ship, tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and equipped, for the carriage of goods, they say that in consequence of the manner in which the clause of excepted risks is conceived they are free from all other liability. Now, that is not an illegal contract in itself. There is nothing to prevent shipowners stipulating and shippers agreeing that the ordinary liability of the shipowners shall be entirely discharged, and that although in form they undertake to deliver in the like good order and condition they shall not in effect be liable to do so. But, of course, in order to give effect to such an exemption from all the ordinary liabilities of shipowners, it is necessary that the exemption should be very distinctly expressed; in short, that such conditions of this kind must be interpreted contra proferentem. On the other hand, there is another kind of construction applicable to a bill of lading which it is quite necessary to keep in view along with that which I have stated,—and that is, that such a document must not be subjected to a too literal verbal interpretation. Documents of this kind are never grammatically constructed, and just as little are they expressed with any logical precision or accuracy; and, therefore, we must be content to construe the language, not literally, but according to what is the apparent meaning of the parties. Now, bringing these two rules of construction in view, the question comes to be whether the shipowners have here stipulated that they shall not be answerable for damage done to the cargo by sea-water through the negligence of the master

No. 100.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

No. 100. or mariners. The first part of the clause of exemption which begins with the words "not accountable," has not much bearing upon the present question. It consists of a variety of different risks for which the shipowners are not to be accountable; but it is needless to consider these in detail. A new sentence begins with the words "Not responsible," and it is within this second part of the clause of exemption from liability that the particular exemption relied on in the present case must be found, if anywhere. Now, the opening words are these,—"Not responsible for the bursting of bags, or consequences arising therefrom, or from any of the following perils," and then there occur between three and four lines which plainly must be taken to be a parenthesis, and which I omit reading at present. The sentence without that parenthesis will run thus,—"For any of the following perils," "namely, risk of craft, or hulk, or transshipment, explosion, heat or fire at sea, in craft or hulk, or on shore, boilers, steam, or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto, however such damage or injury may be caused, collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation, or land transit, of whatever nature or kind soever, and howsoever caused, excepted." Now, the contention of the defenders is that the risk under which the present case falls in that enumeration is "perils of the sea." But this special verdict would under ordinary circumstances completely negative that ground of exemption, because what injured the cargo here was not in any proper sense of the term a peril of the sea. It was no doubt such damage as occurs upon the sea, and could hardly occur elsewhere, but the efficient cause of the damage was the negligence of the crew, and that is not in the eye of the law a peril of the sea in the ordinary sense of the term. And it is only by referring back to the words comprehended within what I have called the parenthesis that the defenders can get the benefit of that part of the clause which I have just read, namely, exempting them from perils of the sea; because the words within the parenthesis are—"Whether arising from the negligence, default or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engine-room, or persons in the service of the ship, or for whose acts the shipowner is liable or otherwise." Now the defenders contend that they are exempt from every peril of the sea caused by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master or mariners; and I confess it seems to me very difficult to say that that is the fair and obvious construction of this clause. A peril of the kind caused by the negligence of the master or mariners must, according to ordinary and common principle, cease to be a peril because it is caused by the negligence of the crew; but then this clause stipulates that though it is caused by the negligence of the crew it shall nevertheless be a peril of the sea,—for that, I think, is the effect of the words. And, therefore, it rather appears to me that giving full effect to the principle that this clause must be construed contra proferentem, it is still impossible to resist the conclusion that what has here occurred is just one of the things against which the shipowners stipulated by their bill of lading that they should not be liable. It was contended in argument, and, indeed, I think it was the main point of the pursuers' argument, that the clause upon which they have been commenting, beginning with the words "not responsible" and ending with the word "excepted" was not to be read as one clause, but as two, so that the first section of the clause, so to speak, ended before the word "and excepted," and in that way the second part of the clause, or the second clause, would consist of these words,—"Collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation or land transit of whatever nature or kind soever, and howsoever caused, excepted." If that were the true reading, then the result would be

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

ording to the pursuers' contention, that perils of the sea would fall to be read the ordinary meaning of that term, and that it would not be possible to say that that second clause, within which in that case the defenders' claim of exemption must be brought, could be qualified by the words occurring in the first part of the clause, "whether arising from negligence," and so forth. Now, that is a very ingenious argument, and was most ably maintained on the part of the pursuers, and I think the greatest support which it received was from the occurrence of the word "excepted" at the end of the clause; indeed, but for that word it hardly suggested that this separation of the clause into two could be maintained. And there is no doubt that the occurrence of the word "excepted" is somewhat anomalous. If the clause is one clause and not two it is tautologous—quite unnecessary—because it expresses no more than is expressed by the opening words of the clause "not responsible." But I think the presence of the word there is very easily accounted for. There is no doubt that formerly, before it was the custom to introduce long strings of new exemptions into bills of lading, the way in which the excepted risks were expressed was always by a list. There first came an enumeration of the risks, not introduced by any such words as "not responsible" or "not accountable," but beginning thus—"The perils of God, the Queen's enemies, stranger princes, perils of the sea," and so forth, ending with the word "excepted." And there cannot be the least doubt that in introducing these long strings of excepted risks in this bill of lading the framers of the bill have just left in the old word "excepted," although it is no longer necessary or useful. But I cannot say that the presence of that word enables me to make that division of the clause into two which is necessary in the pursuers' case. On the contrary, it appears to me that the natural and true reading of the clause as it stands is that the shipowners are not to be responsible for any of the risks enumerated which are excepted. The mere tautology is plainly not sufficient to conduct us to a construction of the clause which it does otherwise bear, and I therefore come to the conclusion that the defenders are entitled to the benefit of this clause to the effect of exempting them from liability, and that the verdict must, in terms of the reservation contained in it, be given up for the defenders. I cannot say that I arrive at this conclusion with regret, because I am perfectly satisfied that the limitation of the liability of shipowners in the manner here stipulated, making them not responsible for any amount of negligence or misfeasance upon the part of their own servants, is likely to lead to a great deal of negligence, and to be attended with disastrous results. But if parties will contract in this form I can do nothing to effect to their contract.

THE DEFENDERS.—This bill of lading commences by acknowledging that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, and undertaking to deliver them at the port of Glasgow in the like good order and condition. The argument of the pursuers is, that, by the clauses which follow, this obligation is entirely excluded, and that, in consequence of these clauses, they are liable for nothing, in no circumstances, except that they have a seaworthy ship. Now, I submit to your Lordship that that is a contract which is not unlawful, but that is the meaning of it, it ought to be very clearly expressed, and in any way that the party reading it, under the circumstances, and in the manner in which these contracts are generally read, can have no doubt about its meaning. But the difficulty that I have in concurring with your Lordship

No. 100.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

No. 100.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

arises from this, that that contract certainly does not, to my mind, clearly express that meaning,—does not, upon the face of it, clearly and distinctly express this—that although the shipowners undertake to deliver the goods in like good order and condition they are not to be bound to do so. If we read the words that are used grammatically, then I think the exception which occurs of perils of the sea, rivers, navigation, and so on, is an exception from the previous exception. If you read the words grammatically, and give the words “excepted” its natural meaning, that is the result. The objection to that reading is, that it leads to a consequence so extravagant that we cannot suppose it to be the meaning. That is the answer, and the only answer, that has been made to that reading of the contract. Now, it is just because of that extravagant result to which the reading of the words in that sense would lead that I doubt whether it is reasonable to hold that this meaning is so clearly expressed, and is so distinctly expressed on the face of this contract, as it ought to have been. If it is to be so read, I agree with your Lordship that it is very much to be regretted that a document of this kind should be expressed in so obscure, and I may almost say unintelligible, manner. But while I have great difficulty in concurring with your Lordship on the ground I have now stated, I cannot say that I am prepared absolutely to dissent from the result at which you have arrived. The point is very difficult. I should have been very much pleased if your Lordship had arrived at the opposite result, and I rather think I would have joined in that more willingly than I join in this; but, at the same time, it seems to be true, as your Lordship says, that these documents are not usually expressed in a grammatical or distinct manner. That also is very much to be regretted. It is impossible to have much sympathy with a practice of that kind, which may be—and I rather suspect is—taken advantage of by those who prepare such documents, just to mislead the other party who is entering into the contract. That is much to be regretted. But, on the whole matter when we read it carefully, and consider it deliberately—as is always done in a court of law—I cannot help agreeing with your Lordship that the meaning which was intended by those who framed it is the meaning that we must put upon it. I think that is the meaning they intended, though I doubt whether they were entitled to express themselves in that obscure manner. On the whole matter, I have very much difficulty and doubt, but I cannot say I am prepared to dissent from your Lordship’s opinion.

LORD MURE.—This is an important question, and it is not free from difficulty. As I understand the special verdict, the facts which we have to deal with are that the damage to the cargo arose from one of the orlop-deck ports of the steamer having been insufficiently fastened, through the negligence of some of the crew, in consequence of which the sea-water got into the hold of the vessel during the voyage.

Now, I agree with your Lordships that this is a neglect which, under the ordinary terms of a bill of lading, would have subjected the shipowners to liability. Upon that I do not understand that there is any difference between the parties, but the shipowners maintain that in this case they are not liable, because of the special terms of the bill of lading, which they say are sufficient to free them from liability. Now, the bill of lading is certainly a very special one; and its first impressions were rather adverse to its validity as a defence to this claim, because of its being calculated to mislead; for it is not clearly expressed though it was apparently not written out in a hurry, but is in a printed form No. 100.

 ed by this steamship company. But while it is not very clearly expressed it very broad in its terms, and is not of an altogether unusual description. It not been stated that bills of lading containing the things here enumerated not occasionally used; and I observe that in the case of Moes and Moliere,¹ ich has been referred to, the bill of lading contained almost all the same ex-tions. The bill of lading, therefore, cannot be said to be one of an alto-her unusual kind, and it was, I think, sufficient to put the party shipping goods on their guard, seeing that there are things stipulated in it which are erent from the ordinary risks. That, I think, is plain upon the face of the ument, and viewing it in that light I have come, though not without hesita-
 , to the same conclusion as your Lordship, that, on a sound construction of erms, it is sufficient to free the shipowners.

he negligence of the crew is specially mentioned in the parenthetical part of clause; and the main difficulty I have had is in consequence of the use of word "excepted" at the end of that part of the clause which deals with ls of the sea. If I could adopt the construction contended for on the part he pursuers, viz., that the bill of lading could be divided into three special ses, and that the part of it which begins with the word "collision" and with "excepted" was a separate and distinct provision, I think there ht be grounds for holding that the defenders were not entitled to succeed in defence. But I cannot so read the bill, because it appears to me that from t responsible" down to "howsoever caused" is a distinct clause by itself; and read by itself it is applicable to the negligence of the crew. It is, more-not unimportant to observe, as was pointed out by Mr Jameson, that the ession "howsoever caused" is a very broad and somewhat unusual expression, one which seems calculated to reach the perils of the sea, whether arising negligence or any other cause. In the English case of Carr,² founded on he defenders, which related to railways, it was held that the words "how-caused" were sufficient to extend the exemption from liability to every of damage that might arise from negligence of servants, and I see no rea-why the same effect should not be given to them here. On these grounds, fore, I have come to the conclusion that your Lordship has put a sound ruction on the contract between these parties.

ORD SHAND.—This is undoubtedly a case of great importance in the law of ping, because, as we have been informed, the bill of lading which is the ct of consideration has been in common use for some time in the shipping between New York and this country, and because I rather think this is rst instance in which it has been decided that the terms of the bill of g are such as entirely to free the shipowner from responsibility for the gence of his own servants.

he decision of the case depends upon the construction of the bill of lading, of that document two different readings have been suggested. It has been tained by the defenders, the shipowners, that the word "excepted" has left by mistake at the end of that part of the clause which has been the ct of discussion, and must be taken pro non scripto; or, alternatively, that o be regarded as a mere repetition, having the same force as the words responsible" at the beginning of the clause, thus making the clause prac-

Mar. 16, 1877.
 Steel & Craig
 v. State Line
 Co.

¹ Supra, p. 658, note 1.

² Ibid, note 2.

No. 100.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

tically end as if the words had been "all of which risks or perils above enumerated are excepted." On the other hand, it has been contended by the pursuers the owners of the goods, that the bill of lading is to be taken as consisting of three members, the first beginning with the words "not accountable," the second with the words "not responsible," and the third with the word "collision," and ending with the word "excepted."

I am of opinion that the defenders' construction of this bill of lading is sound; but I am further of opinion that even if the pursuers were right in their reading the clause, the result would be the same, and that the defenders are not responsible in the circumstances which are disclosed in this special verdict.

I think, in the first place, that there is no warrant for the view that the word "excepted" is to be struck out of this bill of lading, or dealt with pro non scripto. It may be, and probably is the case, as has been suggested by your Lordship in the chair, that that word has been left there by inadvertence. But I think it would not do for a court of justice, finding the word in the bill of lading, to disregard it, and say it shall be held pro non scripto, unless that was absolutely necessary in order to read the document sensibly. Taking the word as we have it, I agree with Lord Deas in thinking that if the clause were taken literally the true reading of the word "excepted" following the clause beginning with "collision, straining, or other peril of the sea," &c., would practically be that it expressed an exception from what had gone before,—the shipowner having said he was not responsible for certain things, the clause proceeds—collision, straining, and other perils of the sea, &c., "excepted." That taken literally, would mean this, that it was an exception from the stipulation of non-responsibility, or, in other words, that the shipowner stipulated that he would not be responsible for the bursting of bags, or consequences arising therefrom, and certain other perils enumerated, but would be responsible for collision, straining, or other ordinary perils of the sea. That meaning is obviously extravagant that it must be rejected, and in argument it was rejected accordingly by both parties. In considering the other meanings which have been attributed to the clause, I think it is obvious and clear that the whole purport of the clause from beginning to end was to exempt the shipowners from risks which otherwise they would be liable. It begins with the words "not accountable," again it repeats the words "not responsible," and again the word "excepted" occurs at the end. The result, in my opinion, is, that the sound construction of the bill of lading is that the shipowner has stipulated that he shall be free from all those risks against which the owner of the goods can secure himself by insurance; in other words, that while he shall be bound to present a ship in a seaworthy condition as regards her hull, masts, rigging, and appointments, and fit for her voyage at starting, with a crew suitable for the service, the owner of the goods shall take all risks beyond that, including the negligence on the part of the persons employed on board the vessel, or the service of the owner. It is said that there is a certain repugnancy or contradiction in the bill of lading, because the shipowner undertakes to deliver the goods in the like good order and condition as that in which they were received, and the observation is not without weight; but I think it is met, if not very satisfactorily at least sufficiently, by the consideration that the shipowner undertakes certain responsibility to which these words "in like good order and condition" may apply when he undertakes that his ship shall be fit and manned for the voyage.

I think it is clear, on the authorities, that the term "perils of the sea" has a much wider signification when contained in a policy of insurance than it has in a bill of lading in ordinary terms. In a policy of insurance the term includes damage done by the sea though really caused by the negligence of the master and crew. The term "perils of the sea," used in a policy, without any additional words, has that signification; and of this the case of Davidson, referred to in the discussion, and a number of earlier cases, are illustrations. So that inquiry in insurance cases, where the policy is so framed, is only this—Was the peril of the sea the proximate cause of the damage? for if so, it is one of the risks insured against, though it is clear that the damage would not have arisen from negligence. The case of Davidson is a very distinct instance of this. On the other hand, in the case of a bill of lading, in ordinary terms—the act of the ship, the Queen's enemies, and all perils of the sea, of what nature soever, excepted—it is held that the clause does not include a peril of the sea resulting from the negligence of persons in the employment of the shipowner or the crew of the ship; and of that many instances have occurred. The case of Thompson v. Clark, 26 L. J. (N. S.) C. P., page 168, and the cases of Moes v. Thompson, Thompson v. Leith, and Amsterdam Shipping Company, Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, and Grill against the same company, which were referred to in the course of the discussion, are cases in which that rule has been applied. Keeping that distinction in view, it is in my mind clear that it was here intended by the terms used to limit the shipowner's liability by extending the class of perils for which he should not be responsible. In the first clause, after an enumeration of the perils, you have the words "howsoever caused;" in the second clause perils resulting from the negligence of the master, mariners, or persons in the service of the ship are expressly mentioned; and again, at the close of the clause, with reference to the various risks enumerated, you have the words "howsoever caused," repeated. Taking the clause as a whole, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the special words "whether arising from the negligence, default, or error of judgment of the master, mariners," &c., or others in the service of the ship, override the general words; so that you have an express stipulation that if damage shall result from negligence the shipowners shall not be responsible. I think the true interpretation of the clause at its close is as your Lordship has suggested. After stating that the shipowner shall not be accountable for certain perils, and shall not be responsible for certain others, and after an enumeration of these perils, the ellipsis is practically this—"which various perils are all" excepted. It is even if the clause were to be read as the pursuers have contended, by being broken up into three branches, and if the concluding part of it were to be as disconnected from what has gone before, thus—"Collision, straining, or other peril of the seas, rivers, navigation, or land transit, of whatever nature or kind soever and howsoever caused, excepted," I am of opinion that, in respect of the words "howsoever caused," the owner of the goods is not entitled to succeed in his action, because the shipowner has stipulated that he shall be free not only from perils of the sea, but from perils of the sea howsoever caused. It may be observed that without these words "howsoever caused," the shipowner would be free from liability for damage caused by the ordinary perils,—as, for example, a storm or a collision; and some force must necessarily be given to the words "howsoever caused." The argument for the pursuers gives neither force nor meaning to these words; for, according to the pursuers' argument, the

No. 100.

Mar. 16, 1877.

Steel & Craig
v. State Line
Co.

No. 100. shipowner is freed from responsibility only with reference to the ordinary perils of the sea. The defenders, I think with reason, say that these words must cover something. They must cover some perils that would not be excepted if the words were not there; and therefore they must cover the only case which the ordinary clause would not already cover, namely, perils of the sea caused by negligence of the masters or seamen. It appears to me that a very good test of the soundness of this view may be found by taking the first of the perils here referred to, namely, collision. The words are—"Collision, or other perils of the sea, howsoever caused, excepted." The shipowner stipulates that he shall not be responsible for the consequences of collision, howsoever caused. Even with these words, "howsoever caused," the shipowner would not be responsible for collision unless it was caused by the negligence of his own servants. He is freed from the consequences of collision in all other circumstances, under the ordinary law which exempts him from liability for perils of the sea. What, then, is the meaning of these words, "collision, howsoever caused"? The only meaning which I think can be attached to them is that they shall exempt the shipowner in the only case in which he would have been liable before, namely, collision, even though caused by the negligence of his own servants. I can give no other meaning to the words "howsoever caused," and no other has been suggested. The force of these words has not come now for the first time under judicial consideration of the Court, for in the cases of Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., and Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co.,¹ reported in 21 Law Journal, they received precisely the signification which, it appears to me, they must receive in this bill of lading, the signification, namely, that they protect the parties who had them in their contracts from the result of accidents or occurrences, even though caused by the negligence of their own servants. And I observe that in the case of Philips v. Clark, which I have already noticed, and in which the question of the shipowner's liability for leakage and breakage caused by the negligence of his servants was the subject of discussion, while the shipowner was held liable, Mr Justice Crowder made the observation,—"It is said that the intention was to free himself from all responsibility. In order to do that he ought to have expressed in clear terms that he was not to be liable for leakage or breakage arising from whatever cause," which are substantially the very words that have been inserted in this bill of lading. It is also worthy of notice that in a subsequent case, the case of Lloyd, reported in the 33d volume of the Law Journal, to which I have also referred, the present Mr Justice Brett, in giving the case, made the observation, that in the earlier cases cited for the defendants the words used are "damage, howsoever caused,"—"a well-known form of adjudged upon."

On these grounds, I am of opinion that the verdict in this case must be entered for the defenders. It may have been an imprudent contract on the part of the insurers. They may have paid a rate of freight too high, having regard to the risk and responsibility that the shipowner undertook, but I think that the contract is so distinct that it can only receive the effect which your Lordships have given to it. I concur with your Lordship in thinking it is to be regretted that the parties have thought fit to make a contract of this kind, and that the result may be to lead to negligence in the management of cargo-carrying ships. But on the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that the remedy is in the shipper's

¹ Supra, p. 658, note 2.

ds. They may either decline to send goods under such a contract, or insist No. 100.
n paying only such modified rates as are suitable to the shipowner's engage-ts, which are of the restricted nature contained in this bill of lading ; in Mar. 16, 1877.
ch case I should think that prudent underwriters would either decline to v. Steel & Craig re, or would very properly demand and receive a higher rate of insurance State Line they would require where the shipowner is liable for the negligence of his Co.
ants, and therefore has the strongest motive to take care that such negligence not occur.

THE COURT entered up the verdict for the defenders, and in respect thereof assoilzied them.

JOHN HENRY, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE EARL OF BREADALBANE, Pursuer.—Kinnear—Lorimer.
G. A. JAMIESON (Judicial Factor on Estate of the late Marquis of Breadalbane), Defender.—Balfour—Murray.

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

duil—Mansion-House—Obligation to Rebuild—Heir and Executor.—An of entail in possession pulled down the greater part of the mansion-house, h was in good repair, and proceeded to rebuild it on a more extensive scale.
re the new house was finished or made habitable he died.

an action by a succeeding heir of entail against the executors, concluding they were bound to complete the house according to the plans, or alterely to make it as good as it was originally, the defenders were assoiilzied, e ground that the demolition of the house, with a view to rebuilding it, g been in good faith, was a lawful act of the heir, and that no obligation build transmitted against his executors (diss. Lord Deas, who held that it only lawful for the heir in possession to demolish the mansion-house under sonal obligation to rebuild, which transmitted against his executors).

erved (1) that substitute heirs of entail have no control over the heir in ssion in the exercise of his proprietary rights, except as provided by the of entail ; (2) that the only proceedings competent to heirs substitute of against an heir in possession are interdict and declarator of contravention.

1862 John Marquis of Breadalbane had plans prepared for rebuild-Armdaddy House, the mansion-house of the Argyleshire portion of Breadalbane estates. The rental of the Argyleshire estates was about 000, and they were held under the same entail as the Perthshire es, on which there was another mansion-house. The existing house small but habitable. After part of it had been taken down, and the building had proceeded a certain length, the Marquis died, in Novem-862. His trustees roofed in the building, and compromised the is of contractors for unexecuted work.

is action was brought by the Earl of Breadalbane, heir of entail in ssion of the estates, against Mr Jamieson, judicial factor on the -estates of the Marquis. The main conclusions were that the defender bound (1) to complete Ardmaddy House according to the plans ; or -wise (2) to build a house equal to the old one, or (3) to restore the e to its former condition.

ie estates were disentailed by the pursuer in 1872.

appeared on a proof, and from the admissions of parties, that from ommencement of the operations in 1862 about £5800 had been spent ie house by the Marquis, and by his trustees after his death ; that of sum £1960 was expended by the Marquis before his death, and an n by the trustees against the next heir, the pursuer's father, for repayof three-fourths of that sum, was compromised ; and that it would re about £5600 to complete the house according to the plans.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

No. 101. The Lord Ordinary, after findings in fact, the substance of which been given above, assolizied the defenders.*

Mar. 16, 1877.

Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

* "NOTE.— . . . The house of Ardmaddy was part of the entailed estate; but there are in the entail no special provisions by which its existence or its maintenance was fenced. The heir in possession for the time might, out a violation of any condition, express or implied, have left it to fall into. Nevertheless, it was a part of the entailed estate, and he was not entitled to make spoil of it for his own benefit, and to the loss of those by whom he was to be succeeded. This was a point which was fixed by, or was involved in the cases cited by the pursuer. These are Boyd v. Boyd, 8 Macph. 637; Don v. Gordon, 24th May 1811, F. C.; and Moir v. Graham, 4 S. 737 (2). And the Lord Ordinary does not consider that anything besides, which has bearing upon the present controversy, was settled by any of these decisions. What is the subject of judgment on the present occasion is in his opinion a thing which is as much on the one side as on the other unforeclosed.

"The question, therefore, which has now to be decided for the first time is whether an heir of entail who finds the house on the estate unsuitable for property, because it is unsuitable for his occupation, in consequence of the insufficiency of its accommodation,—who for that reason resolves to replace what shall be a suitable residence,—who removes it that it may be so,—who has shewn by his expenditure upon the work the good faith in which it was commenced, and so long as he lived was carried on,—but who dies before the building is completed, transmits against his personal representatives an obligation to finish the structure as designed, or at any rate to restore a building equal to what was on the ground when his operations were commenced. The Lord Ordinary is at a loss to understand upon what principle this obligation could be sustained. An heir of entail, so far as not unfettered, is full of power; he is entitled to carry on the reasonable administration of the estate, without incurring a penalty for so doing; and the question as to the unsuitability of an existing house, and the propriety or necessity of its being replaced by another, is one of the things upon which he may, and indeed ought, to decide. If it is the contention of the pursuer to be carried? Must every work that begins to be finished by his personal representatives, if uncompleted at his death, be continued? Suppose that he has resolved upon the formation of a pond in his park, while a portion of the estate has been rendered unfit for ordinary use, and much cost to be incurred before what was intended can be accomplished; that an old bridge, too narrow for convenient use, is removed, and the new bridge by which it is to be replaced is left unfinished; or that the stead on the home farm is unfit for modern requirements, and the new one, by which improvement was to be effected on the property, is only partially constructed in these, or in any of these cases, which are only examples, is there a legal liability undertaken for the completion of the new work, or otherwise for the restoration of things to their original condition? The Lord Ordinary has come to this conclusion. In his opinion there is principle as well as authority against such a result; and, so far as he is aware, there is neither legal principle nor a decision by which it is sanctioned. The hardship inseparable from the opposite view, it is scarcely necessary to add, is all the greater that the personal representatives of a deceased heir have not the privileges of the heir conferred by the Montgomery Act. If they are to finish a mansion-house in the course of construction, the whole cost must be borne by them. None of it can be charged upon the entailed estate.

"These are the considerations upon which the foregoing judgment has been pronounced.

"Had the pursuer contended that the old house was suitable, or that the new house in course of erection was unsuitable, a different issue would have been raised. But neither of these points is matter of contention. The fact that the primary conclusion of the summons is for the constitution of an entail against the trustees of the late Marquis, under which they are to be bound to complete the new buildings begun by his Lordship, contains an implication consistent with both." . . .

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—Either the pursuer was entitled No. 101.
require the trustees to carry out the contracts as an obligation which mitted against them, or alternatively, they were bound to restore Mar. 16, 1877.
mansion-house to a habitable state. If a man dies subject to a per- Earl of obligation, his executors must fulfil it, and if the effect of it is to Breadalbane ure a heritable right, the benefit goes to the heir.¹ But, at all events, v. Jamieson.
heir of entail in possession was bound to leave the next heir a habit-house.² The test of this matter was what the substitute heirs could e required the Marquis to do as a condition of being allowed to de-ish the house. If an interdict had been brought, it would not have refused, unless he had undertaken absolutely to complete the house.
ould not have been an answer to say that if he lived he might charge e-fourths of the cost on the estate, but if he died he could not. That an inevitable consequence of the position of an heir of entail. He d bind his executors, but he could not leave them the power to charge, could the substitute heir complaining consent to any such burden g laid on the estate. There was no room for an interdict in the actual instances; but that was the test; and though it might be assumed the Marquis might have restricted his plans, as he did not do so they t be carried out in full. It was said that the heir had got all he was led to get, because the Marquis had actually spent on the house much than one-fourth of the cost, and yet had not charged any part of it on estate. But the answer was that the heir's demand upon the trustees not to spend so much money, but to give him a habitable house.
gued for the defenders;—The Marquis, as heir of entail, was far of estate. He was entitled to deal with it in any way, so long as he did neur a contravention of the entail, and the remedies against heirs of l were confined to those provided in the deed. Now, this was a per-y lawful act, though not an ordinary act of administration. It was cutting down trees.³ Assuming that there was an obligation to re-it did not survive the heir in possession. It did not go beyond that he could not pull down without intending to rebuild, and going do so as long as he lived. No interdict would have been granted s there was an apprehension of a wrong. Again, the obligation, at ighest, was only to pay one quarter of the cost out of his private
; but he, and his trustees after his death, had spent much more.
advising,—

THE PRESIDENT.—I do not think it will admit of dispute that the house
Ardmaddy Castle is the proper mansion-house of the Argyleshire estates Breadalbane family. It is true that these Argyleshire estates are held the same entail with the Perthshire estates, and that the estates in these counties very nearly adjoin one another, if they are not absolutely contiguous, at on the Perthshire estates there is a very fine and suitable mansion at outh. But even supposing that the estates in Perthshire and Argyleshire o be considered as one entailed estate, there would be nothing at all intent with the ordinary rules applicable to such cases in holding that there be two mansion-houses belonging to estates of the extent and value of which we are considering. That, I think, is quite settled in the well-obson v. Macnish, Feb. 2, 1861, 23 D. 429, 33 Scot. Jur. 217; Malloch v.

n, Jan. 29, 1867, 5 Macph. 335, 39 Scot. Jur. 172; Brothie v. Stewart, 0, 1869, 7 Macph. 1031; Chiesley v. His Sisters, Dec. 22, 1704, M. 5531;
r v. Jarman, Dec. 4, 1866, L. R. 3 Eq. 98; Tod v. Moncrieff and Skene, 4, 1823, 2 S. 113, H. L. May 27, 1825, 1 W. and S. 217.

ordon v. Gordon, Jan. 24, 1811, F. C.

thcart v. Schaw, Jan. 31, 1755, M. 15,399.

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

known case of the Marquis of Ailsa, which is reported in 15 Dunlop, 308. Taking it to be clear, then, that Ardmaddy Castle is the mansion-house of the Argyleshire estates, or (which is the same thing) one of the mansion-houses of the combined estates in the two counties, it follows, I think, of necessity, that this house is an essential part of the entailed estate. That is settled in the case of Gordon of Ellon, which is reported under date 24th January 1811, in the Faculty Collection. The heir of entail in possession, therefore, is not entitled to alienate or put away the mansion-house any more than he would be entitled to alienate or put away one of the farms on the estate. He must hand down the mansion-house to his successor just as he does the entailed lands. But the obligation is not inconsistent with his altering the mansion-house in the way of improvement, or even pulling down the mansion-house with a view to rebuilding upon the same site in a manner more suitable or equally suitable to the entailed estate. In this case the Marquis of Breadalbane, who seems to have spent some of his time in Argyleshire, living in this house of Ardmaddy Castle, was of opinion that the house was not suitable to the estate—that it was small and inconvenient—the estates in the county of Argyre being of very great extent, about 180,000 acres, and yielding a rental of about £23,000 a-year. It was quite within his power to reconstruct this mansion-house either in the way of additions or in the way of demolition and restoration, and he was entitled to make the expense of these operations a charge upon the entailed estate to an amount not exceeding two years' free rent of the estate, under the provisions of the Montgomery Act. Now, it is not disputed that what the Marquis did was quite within his power as heir of entail in possession, and that down to the time of his death he was doing no wrong and committing no violation of the provisions or conditions of the entail. He had plans prepared for the building of the new mansion, and these plans required that a considerable portion of the old house should be pulled down. This was done, and without any delay or interruption the work of reconstruction proceeded from the date at which it began down to the date of the Marquis' death in 1862. The operation of rebuilding and completing the mansion-house had not been finished at the time of the Marquis' death, indeed it had not proceeded so far as to substitute for the old house another habitable house, but a good deal of money had been spent, more than the value of the old house, and a good deal was intended to be spent farther if the Marquis had lived. It is quite obvious, therefore, that in what he did, the Marquis of Breadalbane was exercising his undoubted right as heir in possession of this estate. He was not violating any of the prohibitions of the entail, but he was doing that which any heir in possession would have been entitled to do. He had therefore committed no wrong, and the question which is raised in this record is, whether, in respect that he left the mansion-house unfinished at the time of his death, his executors and his general assignees are liable to a pecuniary claim of an amount requisite to finish and complete the mansion, or at least to proceed so far with its completion as to make it a habitable dwelling for the heir who has succeeded? It appears to me that this is a question of very great importance in the law of entail. It is in some respects a new question, but I think it is to be solved by a reference to principles which are very well established. It is trite law, that an heir of entail in possession is absolutely free as fiar of the estate, except in so far as he is expressly limited by the prohibitions and conditions of the entail, but it is quite necessary to start with that general proposition, because it is the foundation of the licable to a question of this kind. If an heir of entail in possession violates the prohibitions of the entail then the appropriate remedy is a declarator of contravention and irritancy, to be brought by the next or any subsequent heir of entail; and I think for such a wrong done by the heir of entail in possession that is the only remedy which is provided by the law. It is the only remedy provided by the statute 1685, and by the terms of every perfect deed of entail. I think the law knows no other remedy for an act of contravention. Saying so, I am not leaving out of view that the next heir of entail may be well entitled to interdict a threatened act of contravention. But an application for interdict is not, properly speaking, a remedy. It is a preventive proceeding—to prevent a wrong being done—and not a proceeding to give a remedy for a wrong that has been done. At all events, there can be no doubt that the existence of the right to bring a declarator of contravention upon the wrong done naturally presupposes the right of the next heir or any other subsequent heir to prohibit that act of contravention before it is done. But with the creation of a declarator of contravention and irritancy, or an interdict to prevent an act of contravention, I think there is no remedy whatever against an heir of entail in this position. On the other hand, if the heir of entail does not commit an act of contravention, but does something which is not an act of contravention, I think, it necessarily follows that he has done no wrong, and that nobody is entitled to challenge or interfere with what he has done, or to interdict it. If it is done; in short, in respect he is not contravening any of the prohibitions or conditions of the entail, he is acting as a fee-simple proprietor might do, quite as free and unlimited as that fee-simple proprietor. Now, in the present case, I think it is not disputed that there was no contravention of the prohibitions or conditions of the entail. No doubt if the heir of entail in possession pulled down the mansion-house without any purpose of rebuilding it would be undoubtedly a contravention, as was found in the case of Gordon, which I have already referred to. But if he pulls down a part of the mansion-house as he did here, or even the whole of it, for the purpose of clearing a site for a new house, which he forthwith proceeds to build, then he is doing right and not wrong; he is doing what is desirable for the benefit of the estate, and that is not a contravention of the prohibitions of the entail. No man, therefore, can stop him from doing that, and just as little can anybody bring against him an action of contravention and irritancy. Now, it seems to me that as long as an heir of entail in possession and the next heir about to succeed him can be no obligation and no liability, except that which arises out of the terms of the entail. The heir in possession is free, except in so far as fettered by the terms of the entail. The terms of the entail are the sole protection of the heir who is next to succeed. If, therefore, the fetters cannot protect the heir next to succeed against that which his predecessor has done, it seems to me to follow of necessity that the heir next to succeed can have no ground of complaint and no claim of any kind in respect of that which has been done. It was said, no doubt, in argument, that when a person pulls down the mansion-house, being the heir of entail in possession, he is under an implied obligation to rebuild it, and that if that obligation is not fulfilled during his own lifetime his representatives must fulfil it as coming in their place. Now, I am humbly of opinion that as between an heir of entail in possession and the heir next to succeed there can be no implied obligation. The heir of entail is not to be interpreted in such a way as to extract from it any obligations by implication. It is strictissimi juris. If you cannot find the

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

No. 101. obligation expressed upon the face of the deed of entail it is worth nothing Mar. 16, 1877. entail law. And, therefore, the heir of entail in possession pulling down a or the whole of the mansion-house, and proceeding to reconstruct it, is no Earl of Breadalbane my opinion, under any implied obligation. In proceeding to reconstruct it v. Jamieson. only doing that which is necessary to shew that in demolishing it he has been committing an act of contravention. It shews that, and it prevents interference of the next heir by a declarator of contravention and irritancy but it raises no obligation by implication, which, I think, is impossible under a deed of entail. In short, it appears to me that for an act so done, being a perfectly lawful and right act, and no contravention or violation of the entail, there can be no remedy to the next succeeding heir, and that under no circumstances so far as I can see, can there ever arise a pecuniary claim to the heir next succeeding against the executors of the last heir in possession. It has been held in well-known cases of *Ascog*¹ and the *Queensberry leases*² and *Bruce v. Bruce*³ all of which occurred in the House of Lords about the same time, and are reported in the 4th vol. of Wilson and Shaw, and in the more recent edition of Eglinton v. Montgomerie, 4 D. 425, H. L. 2 Ball's App. 149, although a contravention may have been committed by the heir in possession which has damaged the estate in consequence of the entail not being recorded or in consequence of a defect in one of the prohibitions, that can only obtain a remedy of a declarator of contravention and irritancy, but can found no pecuniary claim whatever at the instance of the next succeeding heir against the representatives of the heir in possession. Now, surely if the next heir succeeding cannot have a claim of reparation against the executors of the party who committed the act of contravention, still less can he have any claim against the executors of an heir who committed no act of contravention, but did that which he was entitled to do as an unfettered fiar of the estate. In short, it appears to me that the principle involved in these cases is quite sufficient for the decision of the present case. I think that the principle is, that the only measure of damages and liability between the heir in possession and the next succeeding heir can be found in the express prohibitions of the entail, and that the only remedy competent to the next heir or any succeeding heir is, as I have said before, a declarator of irritancy; but beyond what is secured to the next heirs by the prohibitions of the deed of entail, they have no right and no remedy whatever against the heir in possession or his executors. For these reasons the court entirely concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary..

LORD DEAS.—The late Marquis of Breadalbane was for a number of years prior to his death on 8th November 1862, heir of entail in possession of the Breadalbane estates, which comprehended, inter alia, the lands and estate of Breadalbane in the county of Perth, and the lands and estate of Nether Breadalbane in the county of Argyle. When the Marquis succeeded there were and had been two mansion-houses on the entailed estates,—the one the castle of Breadalbane in Perthshire, and the other the house of Ardmaddy on the Nether Breadalbane estate in Argyleshire. The lands in both counties are understood to have been held under the same entail, but that is of no moment here, because the

¹ Stewart v. Fullarton, July 16, 1830, 4 W. and S. 196.

² D. of Queensberry's Exrs. v. M. of Queensberry, July 16, 1830, 4 W. and S. 240.

³ Bruce v. Bruce, July 16, 1830, 4 W. and S. 240.

L. IV.]

thermore alone is, admittedly, expected to have been made in the two years' rent contemplated by the statute, commonly called the Montgomerie Act, 10 Geo. III. cap. 51, sec. 28.

The late Marquis, after he succeeded, expended, between Martinmas 1837 and Martinmas 1839, £3275, 3s. 7d. in repairing and improving the mansion-house of Ardmaddy, and in building offices in connection with it. For £2456, 7s. 8½d., three-fourths of that sum, the Marquis obtained decree of constitution under the statute just mentioned on 19th July 1844.

At although the house of Ardmaddy had been thus put in full repair the Marquis appears to have soon afterwards come to think that the accommodation provided was short of what it ought to be, considering the rank of those by whom it was meant to be occupied, and the extent and value of the estate. Accordingly, the Marquis, from time to time, obtained plans for rebuilding or restructuring the house of Ardmaddy, first, from the late Mr Gillespie Graham, architect in Edinburgh, and after his death from Mr Robert Baldie, architect in Glasgow, who prepared working-contracts early in 1862, and obtained estimates for execution thereof, amounting in whole to £5647, 0s. 9d. Thereafter the Marquis consulted Mr David Bryce, architect in Edinburgh, and he suggested additions to and improvements on the plans, which increased the estimates to £5998, 11s. 3d.; and, upon the footing of these increased estimates, the Marquis entered into contracts with the different classes of tradesmen for taking down and re-erecting a great part of the mansion-house, and upon these contracts work of demolition and re-erection was commenced in June 1862. In the course of these operations it was found necessary, with a view to strength and security, to authorise the contractors to take down considerably more of the building than had been anticipated, and the consequence was that, at the death of the Marquis in November 1862, the greater part of the old house had been taken down while the re-erection was only partial. The sum expended by the Marquis between the commencement of his operations on 12th June 1862 and his death on 8th November same year, was £1964, 17s. 6d., and the Marquis having, as is regarded that expenditure, complied with the requisites of the Montgomerie Act, his executors obtained decree of constitution for three-fourths thereof on 1st December 1862.

In addition to this sum an expenditure was found necessary of £19s. 4d., which was disbursed by the executors, to cover and protect the house as it stood from the effects of the weather,—leaving the house still inhabitable. In the meantime a compromise had been made with the different contractors, and arrangements were also made about the unused materials, the particulars of which I need not enter into.

Under these circumstances, and without noticing, in the first instance, the dissentient other procedure which took place after the death of the Marquis, the first question arises for consideration, whether, as contended for by the Earl of Breadalbane, the Marquis laid himself under, and transmitted to his executors, an obligation either to finish the house of Ardmaddy in conformity with the contracts which he had entered into and begun to execute at his lifetime, or, at all events (alternatively) to make the house as good and as it was before his operations for its demolition and re-erection began? My opinion I have formed is that the Marquis did incur, for himself and his executors, this last or minor obligation.

The contention of the executors is that the Marquis laid himself and his

No. 101

Mar. 16, 1871
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

No. 101. general representatives under no obligation to do anything more with reference to the mansion-house than he had done in his lifetime,—that having been intended to restore and indeed greatly to improve the mansion-house, and having done all that time and circumstances permitted to carry out that intention, his death, while it terminated his right to the rents and beneficial enjoyment of the estate, terminated also all his duties and obligations connected therewith, and devolved them on the heir of entail who then entered into the beneficial possession.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

The Lord Ordinary has given effect to this contention, basing his judgment, as appears from his note, upon the principle that “an heir of entail, so far as unfettered, is full fiar,” and observing that “he is entitled to carry on the reasonable administration of the estate without incurring a penalty for so doing, and the question as to the unsuitability of an existing house, and the propriety or necessity of its being replaced by another, is one of the things which he may and indeed, ought to decide.”

In supplement of this view it has been argued that the act of the Marquis in pulling down the mansion-house of Ardmaddy must either have been an act of contravention of the entail, which inferred forfeiture, or a lawful act, which inferred a mere conditional obligation, namely, to complete or restore the mansion-house if he lived and enjoyed the rents till this had been done. I am not convinced by this reasoning.

I have not the most remote idea that the Marquis ran any risk of forfeiture or that what he was in the course of doing could have been interdicted as unlawful. His generous desire in what he did, and intended doing, to support the dignity of those who were to inherit the ancient family title after him, was palpable. But I demur to the inference that, because there could be neither forfeiture nor interdict, there could be no obligation. The contrary, indeed, involved in the very terms of the argument. The act was not struck at by the entail. It was a lawful act. Nevertheless it, admittedly, implied a conditional obligation—conditional it is true, but still an obligation—and the question consequently simply is, What was the obligation which this lawful act implied? In my opinion it was an unconditional obligation to restore the mansion-house to at least as good a state as that in which it was before he pulled it down.

I do not dispute the doctrine that an heir of entail in possession is far as not fettered. But he is fiar only during his life. He ceases to be fiar the moment the breath is out of his body, and a new fiar comes in his place. This new fiar does not, like an heir at law or a mortis causa donee, derive his rights from the deceased fiar. He has rights of his own, which come into instant operation, and which the deceased fiar could not touch. No personal obligations undertaken by the deceased fiar can be devolved by him upon the new fiar, either directly or indirectly. He cannot, on the one hand, lay upon the new fiar an obligation to rebuild the demolished mansion-house. Nor can he, upon the other hand, deprive the new fiar of the mansion-house which he previously had, any more than he can deprive him of any other part of the estate. The conclusion seems irresistible,—that he must restore the demolished mansion-house at his own expense. The lawfulness of his act is the answer to the binding nature of his obligation. It was that obligation alone made the act lawful.

The new fiar was left no choice. He must either restore the mansion-house at his own expense,—which he certainly was not bound to do,—or he must without it. According to the contention of the executors there was thus imposed, by the voluntary act of the deceased fiar, an obligation on the new fiar to restore the mansion-house at his own expense, under the penalty of having no habitable mansion-house on the estate. I think the deceased fiar had no more power to impose that penalty than he had to bind the new fiar in express terms to pay the expense of the restoration. It would be of no relevancy to say that a new fiar might have laid three-fourths of that expense upon the estate or exceeding heirs under the Montgomery Act. He certainly could not have done so if it was his right, and consequently his duty to the succeeding heirs, to recover the amount from the general representatives of the deceased fiar, which is the question now to be decided. At common law the heir in possession could not burden the next heir or the estate with the expense of any improvements whatever which he had either made or undertaken to make on the estate. If the burden now in dispute really rests on the succeeding heir, it has not been shown how he either can or could lighten that burden under the Montgomery Act, and, indeed, any plea of that kind would be subversive of the leading argument for the executors in the case.

A clause in the building-contracts bearing to bind the next heir or the estate to the expense which might necessarily be incurred under the contracts after the contracting heir's death would neither have enabled the contractors to recover from the next heir nor freed the executors of the contracting heir from being liable to the contractors without relief against the succeeding heir. It would be very anomalous if the contracting heir, who could not bind the next heir directly, could do so indirectly by subjecting him to the loss of a part of his estate (namely the mansion-house) if he did not take upon himself the burden of the restoration.

The accommodation which the old house of Ardmaddy afforded before it was pulled down is set forth in detail in article 20 of the condescendence, and the accuracy of that statement is admitted in the answer. The parties are further agreed that, in addition to all the money expended by the late Marquis and his tutors, a sum of £1500 is still required to restore the mansion-house of Ardmaddy to the condition in which it was before the Marquis commenced his meliorations of 1862. I think it very clear that by no act of the Marquis, however lawful, could he impose the burden of that restoration on his successor in the entailed estate. He could not have done so even if it had been the cost of meliorations for the benefit of the next heir. Far less could he do so when it was the cost of meliorations at all, but simply the cost of replacing things as they were. I think it also clear that by no act of the Marquis, however lawful, could he impose upon his successor in the entailed estate the obligation to accept of a mansion-house which required £1500 to be expended upon it in place of a mansion-house which required no such expenditure.

I have attended to the various cases which have arisen under leases. But I think the only cases of that class which have a bearing on the present question are those which relate to liability for the expense of meliorations made under leases granted by an heir in possession, and which expired after the succession was opened to the next heir. These cases seem to me to be examples of the principle on which my opinion proceeds, and I shall therefore notice some of them in the order of their dates.

In the case of Dillon v. Campbell, 14th January 1780 (M. 15,432), the lease granted by the heir in possession bore that the tenant was to be entitled, at the

No. 101.
Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

No. 101. end of the lease, to the value of buildings to be erected by him during its currency. In an action against the succeeding heir at the instance of the tenant for the value of the buildings, Lord Braxfield (Ordinary) assoilized the defender in respect he did not represent the granter of the lease otherwise than as heir of entail, "which entail contains the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses de non alienando vel contrahendo debita." Against this judgment it was pleaded that "by the improvements in question the defender enjoys an addition to his fortune and income. To that extent, therefore, independently of a passive title, he must be liable, upon the principle quod nemo debet cum alieni jactura fieri locupletior. Nor can the statute 1685, by which heirs of entail are prevented from selling or burdening the estate, be understood to bar claims of this equitable nature."

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

It was answered, in substance, that no debt could be made to affect the succeeding heir of entail which could not be also made to affect the estate, and consequently that to bind the next heir, even for improvement debts, other than under the Montgomery Act, would infer a contravention of the clause of the entail against the contraction of debt, the efficacy of which could not be recognised.

The report bears—"The Lords, at first, moved by the equitable nature of the pursuer's demand, found the defender liable in the prestations of the lease; but upon advising a reclaiming petition they returned to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary"—that is to say, they affirmed the principle of Lord Braxfield's interlocutor that the heir in possession has no common law power to bind the succeeding heir for the expense of improvements, however much these may have increased the value of the estate, because this would be equivalent to contracting debt on the estate contrary to the terms of the entail.

The principle thus sanctioned by the high authority of Lord Braxfield was found to have been carried out to its legitimate consequences under the various circumstances of subsequent cases of leases granted in the ordinary course of administration. The obligation to reimburse the tenant for the cost of buildings to be erected by him is construed as binding the granter of the lease and his general representatives only, and not the heir of entail, because to construe otherwise would infer a contravention of the entail.

In Webster v. Farquhar, decided in December 1789 (Bell's 8vo Case 1790-91, No. 7), the lease granted by Mr Thomas Farquhar, the heir in possession, in 1722, for nineteen years after Michaelmas of that year, bore—"As in respect there are no houses at present upon the foresaid ground, the said John Webster or his above-written are to have liberty to build a barn, byre, stable, or other houses they may judge necessary thereupon, it being hereby agreed that immediately upon such houses being built and finished, the same shall be appraised by men mutually chosen by both parties; and whatever the houses shall be thereby valued at the said Thomas Farquhar hereby obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to pay the amount thereof to the said John Webster or his assigns at the expiry of this tack."

The granter of the lease died in spring 1789 without any general representative, and was succeeded in the entailed estate by John Farquhar, who declined to name a valuator at the end of the lease, and consequently Charles Webster, the son of the original tenant, brought an action against John Farquhar, then in possession, for the value of several houses which had been erected on the farm. The Sheriff sustained the claim, and gave decree accordingly. A vacation it was pleaded for the tenant that the obligation imposed by the lease No. 101.

the grantor's successors to pay for the houses did not fall under the prohibitions of the entail, and must therefore be applicable to the heir in possession of Mar. 16, 1877.
estate; and, besides that, as the heir in possession was locupletior factus, he Earl of must be liable for the improvements. Lord Henderland (Ordinary) found that Breadalbane defender represented the grantor of the lease only as heir of entail, and there- v. Jamieson.
fore absolved him, and the Court by a majority adhered.

Then, in Taylor v. Bethune of Balfour, decided shortly afterwards, viz. in 1 (Bell's 8vo Cases, No. 8), the lease granted by the heir in possession bore
In regard that the houses on the said farm have been appraised by two real persons at Martinmas last, therefore it is agreed by both parties that if same are found to be of less value at the expiry thereof, in that case the heir shall be obliged to pay up the difference; and if they shall be found to be of greater value, the said proprietor shall be obliged to pay up the difference to the tenant." The appraised value of the houses at the end of the lease exceeded the appraised value at the commencement, and the tenant claimed the balance out of the last year's rent due to the succeeding heir, who was by that in possession. The Sheriff gave effect to the claim, as the ameliorations were in rem versa of the defender; but Lord Braxfield (Ordinary) recalled this verdict, and the Court adhered to his Lordship's interlocutor.

On the points which I should say were plain enough as matter of inference from the above cases were made matter of express decision by this Court and the House of Lords in Moncrieff v. Tod and Skene, which is fully reported under 17th May 1825, 1 W. and S. 217. In that case the lease, granted by the heir in possession, for the ordinary period of nineteen years, at a time when she was eighty-seven years of age, expressly bound her "or the then proprietors of the lands, at the end of this lease," to pay to the tenant at the expiry thereof the sum of £620, which the tenant had agreed to expend, and did expend, in erecting a new steading on the farm, he being allowed a deduction of £21 a-year from his rent on condition of keeping the steading in repair during the currency of the lease. The action brought by the tenant was directed against the executor of the deceased grantor, and the executor brought an action of relief against the heir of entail, who was by this time in possession, so that all parties were in judicial bond.

The executor pleaded, in the House of Lords, that the grantor had not bound herself, executors, and successors, but only the proprietor of the lands at the expiry of the lease—viz. the heir of entail—that "he alone will derive all the benefit arising from the improvements, and consequently ought to pay for them and thereby be benefited," and that the Act of Geo. III. has merely the effect of rendering the heirs liable whether they are lucrati or not; but at common law an heir is lucratus a liability is affixed to him.

And it was answered that the obligation undertaken by the grantor could not be enforced against her personally, and consequently could be equally so against her representative. "The entail contains a prohibition against contracting or burdening the lands with sums of money, and therefore Mrs Skene had no power to do so; and as she did not avail herself of the statute no claim can be made against the respondent, Mr Skene, who does not represent her.
The general question has been settled by a series of decisions in which the arguments urged by the appellant both in law and equity were repelled."

The Court Lord Gillies (Ordinary) decreed against the executor, and, in

No. 101. the process of relief, assoilized the heir of entail. The Court adhered (2 S. and D. 104), and the House of Lords affirmed the judgment.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

There are a number of subsequent decisions to a similar effect. Among them I may mention Fraser v. Fraser, June 7, 1825 (4 S. and D. 76); Do. v. Do., May 29, 1827 (5 S. and D. 673); and Do. v. Do., January 29, 1830 (8 S. and D. 409), affirmed on appeal February 25, 1831 (5 W. and S. 69).

It is obvious that the principle given effect to by this train of decisions is the principle of general application, arising from the nature and terms of a deed of strict entail. It was based upon that general principle, by Lord Braxfield in the Court, in the early case of Dillon, and this has been followed ever since. Each heir of entail is fiar during his life so far as not fettered. But the very terms and nature of the entail prevent the heir in possession, by any voluntary act or deed of his, from either depriving his successor of any portion of the estate, or laying him under an obligation either to make or to pay for meliorations on that estate, otherwise than under and in terms of the Montgomery Act (extended as it has been by the Entail Amendment Act).

The present case, in the view I take of it, is a fortiori within the principle of the above cases. It is not a case of meliorations, but of simple restoration. What the late Marquis did was, undoubtedly, voluntarily done on his part. It was lawfully done, because he undertook restoration, and neither he nor his representatives can, I think, escape from fulfilment of the obligation to restore which alone made his act lawful.

The death of the Marquis, of course, prevents his executors from obtaining a decree of constitution under the Montgomery Act for any expenditure incurred or falling to be incurred subsequent to his death, and I have considered attentively whether the claim against the executors might not be equitably restricted to the same amount as if the whole necessary expenditure had been made and duly vouched by the Marquis in his lifetime, as required by the Montgomery Act. But I am reluctantly satisfied that the law has provided no other valents for the relief competent under that Act.

I am still more reluctantly satisfied that the disentail of the estate after the death of the Marquis can make no difference on the result. It is true the present summons was raised and is insisted in by the Earl as heir of entail, as he is now neither heir of entail nor the representative of the other heirs in the entailed estate. He is fee-simple proprietor, and the money to be recovered must go into his individual pocket. The intention to disentail was intimated by the present summons was raised, and the disentail followed as a matter of course, no consents being necessary. But I have come to think that the claim must be regarded as at the date when it arose, and that no subsequent proceedings, once fully adopted, by disentail or otherwise, can take away the right and title of the Earl to sue for and recover the full sum claimed of £1500.

We have nothing here to do with such cases as arose out of the Queen's leases, or with other cases of that class, in respect of acts of contravention. There has been here no contravention. The claim arises out of a lawful administration. Not an act of ordinary administration, it is true, such as the granting of a nineteen years' lease with conditions as to buildings, but an extraordinary administration with respect to the mansion-house,—a disposition which surely cannot be in favour of the executors. Neither can it make any difference, in the principle applicable to the case, that the necessity for expending £1500 arises from an act done by the Marquis which obliges the Earl to ward as pursuer, in place of from a contract of lease granted by the Marquis, No. 101. which would have left the Earl, in the first instance, at all events, in the position of a defender. The circumstances of the case are new, but the principle applicable to it is not new. The heir in possession cannot by his act, any more than by his written deed, affect the succeeding heir with any burden with which he could not equally affect the estate, except in so far as competent under the Montgomery Act. The Marquis could certainly not affect the estate with the burden in question—namely, the cost of restoring the mansion-house to as good a state as that in which it was before it was pulled down—and it is not to be assumed that he intended to do what he could not lawfully or effectually do.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

The fact that the executors are defenders and not pursuers cannot change the nature of the question, which really comes to be, Whether the late Marquis could burden the estate with the £1500 necessary to replace what he took away from

That would have been to burden or contract debt upon the estate contrary to the fetters of the entail as clearly or more clearly than if the £1500 had been expended on expense of meliorations, as in the various cases which I have cited above. The Marquis had meant to limit his obligation to rebuild the mansion-house to his own lifetime, that would have been to devolve the burden on the estate merely to the tailzie. There is no presumption either of law or of fact in favour of that view of his intention. The Marquis meant to perform a lawful and laudable act of administration, and he must be held to have undertaken the obligation which the law exacted from him in order to make that act lawful, namely, an obligation that the mansion-house should neither be thereby despoiled nor the estate burdened to preserve it from being despoiled.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decerning that the £1500, with an alternative, if the defenders desire it, of themselves restoring the mansion-house to as good and habitable a state as it was in before the Marquis pulled it down.

AND MURK.—I do not think the parties are much at issue as to the broad legal facts on which we are called upon to decide. It appears to me that it is distinctly made out upon the evidence, and upon the allegations on which I find, that what was done by the late Marquis of Breadalbane was not only within his power, but that it was done in perfect bona fides, and with the full intention of improving the mansion-house on the estate of Ardmaddy. I find no allegation on the record to the effect that that was not the position of the Marquis at the time of his death; and in taking the steps which he did it is clear that he was exercising a power conferred upon him by statute. He was acting with a view to the benefit of the entailed estate; and he was not only authorised to do what he did, but the statute is so framed as to shew that it was intended to encourage heirs of entail to make improvements of that description. The 17th section of the Montgomery Act proceeds upon the allegation that it frequently happens that mansion-houses on entailed estates are not suitable for the habitation of the parties occupying these estates, and that it would be for the benefit of the estate and of the heirs of entail that they should be authorised to expend money in building, or improving, or adding to these mansion-houses; and the statute provides that if they do so lay out money, they shall be entitled to charge the larger proportion of that money against the succeeding heirs of entail. Now, I understand Lord Breadalbane was proceeding to avail himself of the power conferred by that clause of the statute; and if he had com-

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
 Earl of Breadalbane
 v. Jamieson.

pleted the large improvements which he contemplated, as shewn upon the plan prepared by the late Mr Bryce, he would have put up not only a much larger house than the one he was improving, but one of a description that would have enabled him to charge a very considerable sum against the succeeding heirs of entail. But in that position of matters, and before these improvements were completed, Lord Breadalbane died; and the question which we have to consider is, Whether the half of the mansion-house having been pulled down, and the rest of it having been in the meantime rendered incapable of beneficial occupation, the executor of Lord Breadalbane can be called upon at the expense of his personal estate to complete this erection upon the entailed estate? That a very considerable benefit was in the course of being conferred upon the estate is plain; because it appears from the evidence of Mr Baldie that the value of the west wing, which was pulled down, was not £1500, and that for that sum a house could now be put up, replacing the west wing, so as to put the mansion-house in as good a condition as it was at the time that wing was pulled down. All that Lord Breadalbane did, therefore, was to take down a house of the value of £1500, while the sum actually expended by him and the executors is proved to have been nearly three times that amount, viz. £5664.

I concur with your Lordship in the chair as to the legal rules upon which this case must be disposed of. It appears to me that the remedy of the heir must be found either within the terms of the entail itself, or within the terms of the statutes under which such proceedings are made lawful for heirs of entail; and being of the opinion expressed by your Lordship, that the principles which were laid down in the House of Lords in the cases of the Queensferry leases, of Ascog, and the later case of Montgomerie, are applicable to a claim of this sort, I should in ordinary circumstances have been content to abstain from entering into any further detail, and with simply stating that I concur in the grounds on which your Lordship has proposed to decide the case. It is only that the remedy in cases of this description must be by irritancy for contravention, or that there may be special cases, such as the case of Gordon, where the interdict may be applied for, to stop a party from doing what would be a contravention of the entail; and I should not have thought it necessary to say so, had it not been that when the case originally came before me in the Outer House, and when I allowed a proof, I pronounced an interlocutor indicating my views on the questions raised, though without committing myself to them. That was on 18th June 1873, and I see I stated that as then advised I was disposed to think that the pursuer, "even upon the assumption that the allegations upon which he and the defenders are at issue are well founded, would not be entitled to demand the reconstruction of the mansion-house in question according to the plans prepared for and approved of by the late Marquis of Breadalbane, whatever expense that reconstruction might involve." That was with reference to the first conclusion of the summons, that the plans of Mr Bryce should be carried out at the expense of the defenders. But I added, that in regard to the special circumstances of the case, and more particularly to the fact that the mansion-house taken down had been recently repaired, and that the expense of that was charged to a certain extent against the estate, I thought there might possibly be in equity some claim on the part of the present Lord Breadalbane to be relieved of the charges so made against the estate, and that at all events a mansion-house of a habitable description made good to him at the expense of Lord Breadalbane's moveable estate, and I allowed a proof of cts upon which that claim was rested. That is the view which, without committing myself, I indicated before the facts were investigated. But upon reconsidering the matter, with the information contained in the proof, I am satisfied that in the special circumstances of this case no injustice will be done to the succeeding heir by refusing the remedy which has been asked. If Lord Breadalbane's original plan had been carried out, or even if the mansion-house had been finished in the more moderate way now proposed, what would have been the position of the succeeding heir? The sum actually expended by the late marquess and his executors amounts to about £5600, and it would require about £400 more to put the new west wing into habitable condition, and to connect it with the east wing, which has not been pulled down. Now, if that had been done by the late Lord Breadalbane during his life, and he had availed himself of the provisions of the statute, he himself would only have been liable for one-fourth part of £8000, and the estate or the succeeding heirs would have been charged in payment of the interest of the other three-fourths. Lord Breadalbane would thus have had to spend only £2000 out of his own pocket, and £6000 would have been constituted against the next heir and the entailed estate. Now, what is the present position of the succeeding heir? Upwards of £5660 have been expended in building a new west wing to the mansion-house, and all that is required to complete it is about £2400. The entailed estate has therefore been already benefited to the extent of £5600 by what has been done, and the injury that is sustained by the succeeding heir of entail is this, that in requiring the estate to remain entailed, he will require, in order to put the house in habitable condition, to expend out of his own pocket £600, and he would be entitled to charge the other three-fourths, viz. £1800, against the succeeding heirs of entail. I am therefore quite satisfied, dealing with the matter simply upon these considerations, that no injustice is done to the pursuer by refusing this claim. I am clearly of opinion that, as matters stand, your Lordship has put your decision upon sound grounds in law; but having indicated these views in 1873, I have thought it right to explain that on the evidence led I am satisfied that there is, on equitable considerations, no foundation for the pursuer's claim.

No. 101.
Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the opinion of the majority of your Lordships. I think there are two settled principles of entail law which are sufficient for the decision of this case. The first is, that an heir of entail in possession is the proprietor of the property, in so far as he is not limited and restricted by the entail under which he holds the estate; and the second, which seems to follow from this, is that the rights of heirs inter se, and the remedies competent to them, are to be ascertained from the deed itself. It may be convenient to state these principles somewhat more fully before considering the particular case, and I cannot refer to any passage in which the principle of them is more distinctly put than the statement of Lord Brougham in the case of Montgomerie v. Eglinton, 2 Bell's App. p. 185, where his Lordship said:—"An heir of entail in Scotland is never considered a trustee for the subsequent heirs of entail. He is considered as a proprietor in all respects whatever, except in so far as he is tied up, bound down, and fettered; and I have often had occasion, both at the bar in your Lordships' presence and since I have come on the bench, to explain the great difference—I may rather say the contrast—between the Scotch law and the English law in that respect. If I here make a tenant for life by settlement, he is tied up eo ipso, and he can do nothing that

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

shall endure beyond his own life-estate, unless in so far as I add powers to his estate. But in Scotland it is the very reverse. The heir of entail is the fiar—he is free. Here the tenant for life is fettered except so far as he is freed by powers. In Scotland the heir of entail is free except so far as he is fettered by the provisions of the entail. He is the fiar—he is in possession of the fee-simple of the estate in every particular, except in so far as he is tied up by the entail. This is the governing principle, and it is upon this governing principle that the decisions have gone.” And I observe that Lord Campbell, referring to the passage I have just read, says, at p. 193 of the report—“I entirely concur in the distinction which my noble and learned friend so forcibly pointed out between the English and Scotch law with reference to the subject of entails. Under the English law the tenant for life has no power except what is expressly conferred upon him beyond his own life, whereas the heir of entail in Scotland is armed with every power except that which is expressly taken from him.”

The other rule or principle which results from this is very well stated, I think, in a sentence in the notes by Mr Chalmers, which were referred to by the counsel for the defender in this case, as expressing correctly the result of the judgments in the cases of Ascog and Tillicoultry, and similar cases, and which has been repeatedly referred to with judicial approval. At p. 31 of the appendix to Wilson and Shaw's Appeals, vol. iv., the principle is thus stated:—“The rights of the several parties interested under the deed, and the remedies in case of contravention, can only be ascertained by what the deed itself contains. Judges are not at liberty to go out of it either to give or to take away, however plausible or seemingly equitable the construction may be.”

Having these principles in view it appears to me to be clear that at the time when the Marquis of Breadalbane proceeded to take down this mansion-house which I take to be the mansion-house of the estate, he was acting entirely within his powers as the proprietor of these estates. If, instead of having it in contemplation to improve or rebuild the mansion-house it had been his intention simply to take down the house and dispose of the materials, it would be clear that that would have been a contravention of the entail under which he possessed the estate; and the authority of the case of Gordon of Elgin shews that in that state of the facts an heir proceeding thus avowedly to contravene the entail would be restrained by preventive diligence from doing so. But if an heir has succeeded in demolishing the house and removing its materials, I know of no authority in the law for the view that there is a remedy against him by way of a pecuniary claim, or any remedy except that of an action of declarator of irritancy and forfeiture founded on contravention. If, then, the question which is now raised had arisen in the form of an interdict presented against the Marquis of Breadalbane when he began his operations, and it had been conceded that his intention then was to improve the mansion-house or to put up another, and that with that view he was partially taking down the present house, I take it to be clear that the interdict would have been refused, on the ground that he was doing nothing which was not within his powers as fiar of the estate. It may be that even after the interdict had been refused, if subsequently the Marquis having removed the house had refrained from putting up another—if he had ceased in his operations for a considerable time, so that it became evident that he had no intention of putting up another—he would have been liable to an action; but the action in this case would not have been an action to restore the house or to pay damages, but action founded on his having violated a prohibition—an action of irritancy No. 101.

 of forfeiture for the contravention. There was no room for any such action so long as the Marquis lived, for it appears that from the time the house was moved until he died he continued to carry out his intention of restoring the mansion-house by putting up the building which at great expense is now upon property, although in an unfinished state. And therefore I take it that at death there was no action competent at the instance of the heirs of entail in respect of what had been done. He had either committed a contravention by what had been done, in which case the sole remedy was an action of irritancy founded on that contravention (the right to bring such an action having, however, ceased at his death) or he had not committed a contravention, in which case he was exercising his powers as a fiar in possession—a proprietor dealing with his own estate—and he came under no obligation in consequence of his doing so. This last view I take to be the right one. It has not, indeed, been maintained on the part of the pursuer that there was an act of contravention up to the time of the Marquis' death.

It has been argued that the Marquis having died without finishing the building it must be held that in law his representatives were under an implied obligation to complete it. I cannot find any ground for that contention in the fact of entail on which the Marquis possessed, and I think the whole stream of authorities goes to negative that view. There have been two classes of cases in which practically the same argument has been presented, and in both of which the Court have rejected it,—I mean, in the first place, the cases of Aiscog, Tilli- try, and Montgomerie v. Eglinton, and in the second, the case of the Queensberry leases. The argument in the first of these cases was that as the Marquis of entail had sold the estate, contravening the entail in a question inter creditors, he was bound, by an implied obligation to be gathered out of the proceeds of the entail, to reinvest the price. But the Court held—and this was the principle on which the cases were decided—that no such obligation could be implied or reared up out of the entail—that what the Court had alone to deal with was the express terms of the prohibitions of the entail, and that the sole remedy, and the only remedy, for a contravention was an action of forfeiture and not a pecuniary claim. The case of the Queensberry leases (4 W. and S.
 101) was of the same character. The heir of entail in a question inter heredes contravened the entail by granting a lease at too low a rent. The lease was in violation of the prohibition against alienation, but was effectual to the tenant, and the entail was unrecorded. The next heir claimed damages on the ground that the prohibition inferred or implied an obligation to pay the loss or damage caused by its violation. But, again, the answer was that the remedy of a succeeding heir must be found in the express provisions of the entail, and that though the entail prohibited there was no ground in law for holding that an implied obligation to pay damages could be inferred. I think these cases on principle repel the notion that an implied obligation, such as is here insisted on, can be reared up from the prohibition of an entail. If such a claim were to be maintained, it is very difficult to say where it should end. Suppose an heir of entail has cut down the old trees that surround the family mansion, and which are of great importance to it, for ornament and shelter—suppose he has done so irrevocably which never can be restored, and dies after having done so—can it be said that because there was a prohibition in the entail which deprived him of right to cut down the trees, his executors would be liable in damages? I think that

Mar. 16, 1877.
 Earl of Breadalbane
 v. Jamieson.

No. 101.

Mar. 16, 1877.
Earl of Breadalbane
v. Jamieson.

would necessarily follow from the argument which has been submitted on the part of the pursuer; and I do not see where the cases would stop if such an action as the present were entertained, for in numerous cases of minor disposition of the estate there would be no limit to the claims of reparation which might be made on the same ground.

The cases of improvements or meliorations made by heirs of entail in the case of entailed estates, with very great deference indeed to my learned brother Lord Deas, do not appear to weaken, but rather to confirm, the view which is now to receive effect by this decision; for I think the principle which is at the root of the decision of these cases is this, that the express provisions of the entail are decisive between the heirs, and that nothing can be founded on implied obligation to be reared out of these. The contention in the cases to which his Lordship has referred was substantially this, that because one heir had died after permanently improving an estate, and so enhancing the rents received by his successor, there was an implied obligation that his successor should pay for these meliorations; but the Court held that no such implied obligation existed. I think that just as the heir in possession cannot by his acts impose pecuniary liability on his successor beyond what the deed of entail authorises, so the succeeding heir cannot establish pecuniary liability against the representatives of his predecessor for the acts of his predecessor while in possession, and that appears to me to be the principle on which these cases were decided. If the pursuer succeeded in his demand this would certainly be the first case in which liability would be established against the representatives of a prior heir for acts done by him in dealing with the estate, and I confess if it were sustained I do not see to what length that principle might not go. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship, on the general grounds stated, that this claim cannot be entertained.

We had a good deal of argument upon another point pleaded by the pursuer. It was maintained that even if he were not entitled to succeed under the doctrine of implied obligation arising from the provisions of the entail, yet, because of the Marquis of Breadalbane's actings, in having entered into contracts with builders and having materials on the ground and otherwise, shewing his fixed intention to complete the new house, there was some vested right in the pursuer to have these acts continued. That argument was founded upon cases which have occurred between heir and executor. In all of these cases the question was between parties who had a legal right to the succession of the estate with reference to the particular position in which the testator had left part of his funds and property which necessarily and by force of law belonged to one or other of them. I am of opinion—and I presume in saying so I express the opinion of all your Lordships—that these cases have no application to the present, and that there was nothing in the actings of Lord Breadalbane which could give these pursuers the right as beneficiaries, or quasi beneficiaries, to insist on this building being completed, if there be no legal obligation to do so. I have noticed that point in this case it should be observed that the argument had not received full notice. I believe your Lordships' reason for not commenting upon it was that you were quite satisfied, as I am, that the argument was untenable.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIE, W.S.—Agents.

PORTOBELLO PIER COMPANY, Petitioners.—A. J. Young.

No. 102.

HENRY CLIFT, Respondent.—J. C. Smith.

Mar. 16, 1877.

Portobello

Pier Co. v.

Clift.

Process—Expenses—Compensation.—Where the respondent in a petition had obtained an award of expenses against the petitioners, the Court refused to allow a decree to go out in name of the agent disburser, on the ground that in another litigation between the parties relating to the same subject-matter, disposed of at the same time, the petitioners had obtained a decree for expenses against the respondent, which they were entitled to set off against the respondent's account.

SEE supra, p. 462.

The Portobello Pier Company (Limited) presented a petition to the Sheriff of Midlothian, praying that Henry Clift, who had been their servant, whom they had dismissed, should be ordained to assign and deliver a certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors to Donald S. Fraser, whom they had appointed restaurateur in room of Clift.

1st DIVISION.
M.

Henry Clift also presented a petition to the Sheriff of Midlothian, praying for interdict against the Portobello Pier Company supplying the public with exciseable liquors during the currency of the certificate.

After various proceedings the two cases came before the First Division on appeal by Clift, and were heard and disposed of together. In the petition for interdict he instance of Clift he was found liable in expenses, and after the account had been audited the Portobello Pier Company, on 14th March, obtained a decree in their own name. In the petition at the instance of the Portobello Pier Company they were found liable in expenses, and as the account had been audited Clift moved that the report should be allowed of and a decree allowed to go out in his agent's name.

The company objected, on the ground that they were entitled to set off one account of expenses against the other, and were bound only to the balance, and that they could not do so if a decree was given in the respondent's name.¹

Clift argued;—Compensation did not take place except when both accounts were incurred in the same litigation. It must be clear from the deponent's sheet that the accounts were incurred in the same litigation.

JUDGMENT.—There were two petitions in the Sheriff Court relating to the same matter, one being for delivery of the certificate by which Clift was empowered to sell exciseable liquors, and the other for interdict against the Portobello Pier Company carrying on the business of the sale of exciseable liquors in their premises. In the latter case we decreed in favour of the Portobello Pier Company, with expenses, and in the petition for delivery of the certificate we gave a decree for delivery of the certificate, but found the Portobello Pier Company liable in the expenses. The Portobello Pier Company, after paying the account of expenses in the interdict case audited, yesterday got the Auditor's report approved of, and obtained a decree. The account now before us presented by Clift for his expenses in the action against him, and he asks for approval of the Auditor's report, and for a decree in the agent's name. In the other case this would be granted. The Portobello Pier Company object, because they desire to have the one account set off against the other, and only the balance paid. This raises the question whether the right of the agent dis-ordon v. Davidson, June 13, 1865, 3 Macph. 938, 37 Scot. Jur. 494; v. Craig, June 1, 1852, 14 D. 829, 24 Scot. Jur. 477; Stothart v. John-Trustees, May 14 and 23, 1823, 2 Mur. 549; Warburton v. Hamilton, 30, 1826, 4 S. 639; Graham v. M'Arthur, Nov. 28, 1826, 5 S. 46.

No. 102. Portobello Pier Co. v. Clift.
 Mar. 16, 1877.
 burser for Clift can be defeated by the claim of compensation by the Portobello Pier Company. This matter must be decided by authority, and the only duty is to apply the authorities. In the cases of Stothart v. Johnston and Warburton v. Hamilton, where expenses were awarded to both parties in contextu, it was held that the one must be set against the other, and that no agent disburser could take any benefit by the ordinary rule that he may of decree in his own name. But in the cases of Graham v. M'Arthur and Graham v. Davidson the principle was carried still further. There the award had been made at an earlier stage of the litigation, and yet when the second award was made in favour of the opposite party he was held entitled to set the one against the other.

It was contended here that a different principle applied, because there were two actions and two applications for expenses. But there is no doubt that the two actions might have been conjoined, because they relate to the same subject-matter, and are between the same parties. If the actions had been conjoined they would have formed one action, and so the accounts here would have been taken under the rule of the earlier cases. I think that compensation must be granted, and that the best way of doing it is not to allow extract to go out in the agent's name.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—W. N. MASTERTON, L.A.—Agents.

No. 103. John Clark Junner, Pursuer.—Fraser—Rhind.
 Mar. 17, 1877. North British Railway Company, Defenders.—Balfour—James.
Process—Proof—Skilled Witness—Reparation—Personal Injury—Inquiry by Medical Witness prior to trial.—Circumstances under which the pursuer can bring an action of damages for personal injury was held bound to submit himself to examination prior to the trial by a particular medical man selected by the defender.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Adam.
 R.
 IN an action of damages at the instance of John Clark Junner, for personal injury occasioned to him through a collision which occurred on the line of the North British Railway Company on 11th Decr. 1876, the pursuer averred that in consequence of the accident he sustained severe injuries to his head and back, involving concussion of the spine and severe shock to his system.

The action was raised on 20th February 1877.

On 27th March the defenders' solicitor wrote to Mr R. Menzies, the pursuer's agent, requesting to be informed when it would be convenient for the pursuer to submit himself to examination on behalf of the company by Professor Spence, and Drs Dunsmure and Watson.

On 3d March Mr Menzies wrote in reply that Mr Junner was willing to be examined by Dr P. H. Watson, Dr Dunsmure, and any other medical gentleman the company might choose to send except Professor Spence. "Mr Junner declines to be examined by him because of the treatment he received from the Professor when he called upon him as an ordinary patient, while suffering greatly both in body and mind through the results of the accident. On that occasion Professor Spence declined to look at him, or to give him any advice which would tend to relieve his pain and anxiety, because he, the Professor, stated that he could not do so, being retained by the North British Railway Company to examine other patients, and give evidence in their behalf."

On receipt of this letter the defenders' solicitor communicated with Professor Spence, and on 5th March Professor Spence wrote in reply :—
 "I have received yours of this date, with the annexed copy of Mr Menzies' letter, stating Mr Junner's reasons for objecting to be examined by me. The statements in that letter so gravely misrepresent my conduct towards Mr Junner that I cannot but express astonishment that any legal gentleman should have written it without having taken further steps to ascertain the correctness of the statements advanced."

No. 103.
 Mar. 17, 1877.
 Junner v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

"When Dr Young (Mr Junner's ordinary medical adviser) called on me Mr Junner, he said Mr Junner wished my opinion as to the effects of a railway injury which he had sustained. I then asked, Did he content me as to treatment or in view of legal proceedings? Dr Young lied that it was in view of a probable action for damages, as Mr Junner had been injured on the Portobello line. I then said that will be the case with the British Railway Company, and as they usually consult me in such cases I think it better to decline examining or giving an opinion in the case."

"Mr Junner certainly did not express any desire that I should examine him in reference to treatment, nor did he seem to be suffering either 'in body or mind' at the time. So far from appearing to be hurt at my declining to examine him I thought he appreciated the grounds on which I did so, for either he or Dr Young asked whom I would advise him to consult, and I named a medical gentleman."

"The defenders moved the Lord Ordinary to pronounce an order ordaining the pursuer to submit himself on their behalf to examination by Professor Spence, and Drs Dunsmure and Watson."

"The Lord Ordinary, on 13th March, pronounced this interlocutor:—Having heard counsel on the motion of the defenders for an order ordaining the pursuer to submit himself, on behalf of the defenders, to examination by Professor Spence and other surgeons, refuses the motion as regards Professor Spence, on the ground that the pursuer is unwilling to consult with that gentleman, and as regards the others, that the motion is unnecessary, in respect that the pursuer states that he is willing to submit to examination by any other surgeon or surgeons: and leaves to the defenders to reclaim against this interlocutor." The defenders reclaimed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There was evidently a most unfortunate misunderstanding here between Mr Junner and Professor Spence. This is much to be regretted, but as the matter has come before us we must deal with it as we think proper in the circumstances.

"Mr Junner says that we are not to interfere with his liberty in the matter, and that to grant the order craved would be on the one hand practically to compel him to be procognosed, and on the other to subject him, while suffering from a serious nervous affection, to an interview which must necessarily be disabling to him in the extreme. I think there is no doubt, however, that we have power to make this order which the Lord Ordinary has refused, if we are satisfied that it should be granted. When a man says that he has suffered a real injury and craves reparation therefor, the question of his physical condition after the alleged injury is the most important element in the case. It is not to be inspected prior to the trial it is evident that the defenders will be put to a most serious disadvantage, amounting almost to deprivation of all medical evidence."

"The only question is, whether the pursuer, who says that he is willing to

No. 103. submit to the examination of any other medical gentleman than Professor Spence, is bound to submit to examination by that gentleman, against whom it appears to entertain some not very intelligible, and certainly entirely unfounded, grudge or pique.

Mar. 17, 1877.
Junner v.
North British
Railway Co.

I should be slow in a matter of such delicacy as this to disregard any objection made to examination by a particular doctor, even though the objection appeared to be somewhat fanciful. But, looking to the explanation given by Professor Spence, I am satisfied that the objection taken here should not be entertained, and that the order craved should be granted.

LORD ORMDALE and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the North British Railway Company against Lord Adam's interlocutor of 13th March 1877, recall the said interlocutor, and on the motion of the reclaimers appoint Mr J. C. Junner to allow himself to be examined by Professor Spence, along with the other medical gentlemen, on behalf of the railway company, reserving the question of expenses, and decern."

ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—ADAM JOHNSTONE, Solicitor.—Agents.

No. 104.

WILLIAM HAMILTON Senior, Pursuer and Respondent.—Rhind.
WILLIAM HAMILTON Junior, Defender and Appellant.—Mair.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Hamilton v.
Hamilton.

Jurisdiction—Appeal—Sheriff Court—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40—A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5.—A. S. 11th July 1828 requires that in advocations for trial from the Sheriff Court under sec. 40 of the Act 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, leave of the Sheriff should be obtained in cases where the claim shall be simply pecuniary, so that it cannot appear on the face of the bill that it is above £40 in amount.

Held that an action in the Sheriff Court for 2s. 6d. per week of aliment to a man sixty-six years of age was a claim "simply pecuniary," and for more than £40, and could therefore be removed to the Court of Session under sec. 40 without leave of the Sheriff.

Parent and Child—Aliment.—A father brought an action for aliment against one of his four children. The defender pleaded that the other children should have been called. Plea repelled, on the ground that it was not supported by an allegation that the other children had a superfluity of means after providing for themselves and their families.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
M.

WILLIAM HAMILTON, Musselburgh, sued in the Edinburgh Sheriff Court his son, William Hamilton junior, lademan, Dalkeith Mills, for aliment at the rate of 2s. 6d. per week.

The pursuer stated;—(Cond. 1) "The defender is the pursuer's late son, who is employed as a lademan at Dalkeith Mills, Dalkeith, at a weekly wage of not less than £1, 5s. sterling." (Cond. 2) "The pursuer is upwards of sixty-six years of age. He is in a weak and infirm state of bodily health, owing to his suffering from disease of the heart and chronic bronchitis, and unable to earn his own livelihood."

The defender stated;—(Stat. 1) "The pursuer has been twice married and has four children, two sons and two daughters, the youngest of whom is upwards of nineteen years of age. His youngest daughter, Isabella Hamilton, who is an outworker, lives with him at Mason's Mill." (Stat. 4) "The defender is a lademan and has 21s. per week of wages. Previous to entering on this employment he was a railway porter and had 17s. per week of wages. He was married on 6th June 1873, and has now a wife and two children depending upon him for support, with the prospect of having a farther addition to his family shortly." No. 104.

The defender made no statement as to the other children to shew whether or not they were able to contribute towards the aliment of the pursuer. Mar. 20, 1877.
Hamilton v. Hamilton.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's other children not having been called along with the defender, the action ought to be dismissed. (2) The pursuer being able to earn his own livelihood, and being possessed of means of his own, is not entitled to support from the defender. (3) The defender's wages being barely sufficient for the proper maintenance of himself, his wife, and family, he is not liable to support the pursuer.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

The Sheriff (Davidson), on 15th February 1877, recalled this interlocutor, and repelled the defender's first plea in law.

On 2d March 1877 a proof was allowed by the Sheriff-substitute.

The defender appealed for jury trial.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—(1) That, under the 5th section of Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828,* a previous petition to the Sheriff for leave to appeal was necessary.¹ (2) The pursuer was entitled to select any one of the sons, as they were all bound to support him. If the others were also liable, the defender could recover their proportion of aliment from them.²

The defender argued;—(1) The Act of Sederunt applied only to actions factum præstandum, whereas here the claim was pecuniary, and the amount above £40. (2) The father was not entitled to call only one child in an action of aliment. He was bound to call all who were in a position to aliment him.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am quite satisfied that the appeal is competent, and that the 5th section of the Act of Sederunt of 1828 does not apply. That clause was intended to apply to the case where the claim was not simply pecuniary, so that it could not appear on the face of the bill that it was not above £40. It seems to me that this claim is simply pecuniary, and that a claim of £6 a-year aliment for a man of sixty-six years of age is a claim for more than £40. In that I can have no doubt, and I am therefore of opinion that the appeal is competent.

With regard to the first plea in law for the defender, I should have thought it worthy of consideration if it had been supported by a relevant statement of fact. If it was to be maintained that other children should be called it was necessary not only to aver that there were such children, and that they were in a position to support themselves, but also to state that they were possessed of Section 5 of the Act of Sederunt, in dealing with sec. 40 of the Act 6 Geo. c. 120 enacts,—“Whereas it is enacted by section 40 that in all cases originating in the inferior Courts in which the claim is in amount above £40, as soon as order or interlocutor allowing a proof shall be pronounced . . . it shall be competent to advocate such cause to the Court of Session, it is enacted and decreed that if in such causes the claim shall not be simply pecuniary so that it not appear on the face of the bill that it is above £40 in amount, the party intending to advocate shall previously apply by petition to the Judge in the inferior Court for leave to that effect.”

Aberdeen v. Wilson, July 16, 1872, 10 Macph. 971, 44 Scot. Jur. 540.
Moir v. Reid, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 1060, 38 Scot. Jur. 551.

No. 104. such a superfluity of means as would enable them to contribute to the support of their father.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Hamilton v.
Hamilton.

In order to support a claim of a father two things are necessary,—1st, that the father should be indigent, and 2d, that the children should have a superfluity after providing for the maintenance of themselves and their own families. Unless both these circumstances occur the father has no claim. The allegation here is, that the defender is possessed of an income of 25s. a-week, and that may raise a nice enough question—whether this is such an income as will enable him to contribute to his father's support after providing for his own family. But that question is not now before us, and therefore I shall say nothing about it. There is no statement here with regard to the other children, and it is not therefore plain whether or not they can contribute to the support of their parent.

I think the Sheriff is right.

LORD DEAS.—I have no doubt as to the competency of this appeal. On the face of the petition a claim for 2s. 6d. a-week of aliment for a man of sixty-four years of age cannot be held to be ex facie a claim for less than £40. What the Act of Sederunt says is that if the claim is not simply pecuniary there shall be a previous petition for leave to appeal, and the petitioner is to give his solemn declaration that the value of the claim is above £40. Now, what could the petitioner's solemn declaration add to what appears on the face of his petition? This is not a claim ad factum præstandum. It is simply a money claim.

Upon the first plea stated for the defender in the Sheriff Court I agree that it would raise a question of some nicety if there had been a proper averment to found the plea. But all that is averred is that the pursuer has been twice married and that he has two sons and two daughters. With the exception of Isabella Hamilton, who is stated to be an outworker, neither the names, occupations, nor incomes of any of them are given. These would all require to be stated in order to disclose whether or not the children can be regarded as in a position to contribute to the support of the parent.

With regard to the statement for the pursuer at the bar to-day that the defender is in receipt of 25s. a-week, this may raise a serious question, so far as it does as regards expenses, if it turns out that this statement has been made at random without any inquiry on the subject; and as regards the merits, if the fact should be found to be that the defender has only 21s. a-week, and is a married man with two children to support, and the prospect of having more, the pursuer will have to say the least of it, a very narrow case.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships. If there had been a relevant allegation that the rest of the family were in a position to support their father I should have been ready to consider the first plea in law for the defender. But there is no such allegation.

LORD SHAND.—This being a pecuniary claim at the pursuer's instance for aliment during his lifetime, it is clear that the plea of the respondent as to the competency of the appeal must be repelled, for the liability sought to be enforced is obviously greater than £40 in value.

On the other question raised under the first plea in law for the defender it is so clear, I think, that the obligation to support the father must be discharged No. 104.

 y such of the children as are capable of contributing. It is very desirable that l the parties liable—at least if resident in this country, and so subject to the Mar. 20, 1877.
 jurisdiction of the Court—should be before the Court, rather than that only one Hamilton v.
 ould be here, and that he should be compelled, if himself found liable, to Hamilton.
 ise an action or actions of relief against his brothers and sisters. But this ea requires to be supported by an averment that there are other members of e family in such pecuniary circumstances as enables them to contribute, and ere is no such averment here. The merits of the case cannot perhaps be safely posed of now in the absence of any admission of the truth of the defender's tement as to his own circumstances and family responsibilities. But I agree th Lord Deas that the case for liability is a very narrow one, and the pursuer ould consider whether he will get any benefit by going into a proof before the eriff, to whom the cause will be now remitted.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repel the first plea in law for the defender, appellant, in respect it is not supported by any relevant averment, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 15th February 1877: And in respect the cause is not suitable to be tried by jury, remit to the Sheriff to proceed with the proof allowed by interlocutor of 2d March 1877: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

C. B. Hogg, S.S.C.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

OMAS ABERCROMBY PETRIE HAY AND ANOTHER (John Gauld's Trustees, No. 105. and as such Administrators of George Gauld's Estate),

First Parties.—M'Laren.

JAMES PETERKIN AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—M'Laren.

MARGARET DUNCAN AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Moncreiff.

Mar. 20, 1877.
 Gauld's
 Trustees v.
 Duncan, &c.

Succession—Testament—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.—A testator beathed to his only brother, who died without issue, the liferent of the residue is estate, and directed that such residue should, "after his death, be divided ally among the lawful children of my living and deceased sisters who may alive at the time, share and share alike, namely, the children of the late Mrs the children of Mrs G," &c. The whole children of his sisters survived the ator, but some of them predeceased the liferenter, leaving issue. Held that conditio si sine liberis decesserit applied, and that the issue of the testator's hews and nieces predeceasing the date of vesting were entitled to their ents' share of the residue of the estate.

GEORGE GAULD, who died 27th April 1852, by deed of assignation and 2d DIVISION.
 lement appointed his only brother, John Gauld, his sole executor, and R.
 gned to him absolutely his interest in the lease and stocking of the n of Bomakellach, Banffshire, and gave him a liferent of all the rest is estate.

With regard to the fee he gave the following direction:—"And after (John Gauld's) death it is my will, and I ordain, that the principal unt of the money so belonging to me, after deducting the necessary enses and charges, shall be divided equally among the lawful children ny living and deceased sisters who may be alive at the time, share and re alike, namely, the children of the late Mrs Peterkin; the children Mrs Gauld, in Glenbeg; the children of Mrs Duncan, Corrie; the dren of Mrs George, in Mains of Drummuir; and Alexander Car-

No. 105. michael, presently student at King's College, Aberdeen, the surviving son of my late sister, Mrs Carmichael."

Mar. 20, 1877. The testator, and John Gauld, both died without issue.

John Gauld survived the testator, and died 20th June 1876, when his trustees fell to account to the beneficiaries under George Gauld's settlement for the amount of George Gauld's estate which had been liferent by John Gauld. It was, however, found that though his nephews and nieces, children of his sisters designated in his assignation and settlement had survived the testator, some of them had died leaving issue during the lifetime of John Gauld, the liferenter.

The question therefore arose whether the issue of the deceased nephew and nieces of "the trustor" were entitled to participate in the division of the estate.

A special case was accordingly presented to the Court by (1) the trustees of John Gauld, (2) James Peterkin and others, nephews and nieces of the testator who survived the liferenter John Gauld; and (3) Margaret Duncan and others, the issue of the testator's nephews William Duncan and Alexander Carmichael, who had survived him but predeceased his brother John Gauld, the liferenter.

The question submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court was—"Are the third parties, the children of the said William Duncan, and the children of Alexander Carmichael, or either of these families, objects of the residuary bequest by the 'testator' in favour of the lawful children of his living and deceased sisters who might be alive at the period of the designated?"

Argued for the second parties;—The date of the liferenter's death was both the period of vesting and distribution, and by the express direction of the testator the bequest was limited to those nephews and nieces who should be alive at that date.¹

Argued for the third parties;—Though there was the apparent limitation of the bequest to those nephews and nieces who should be alive at a certain date, the settlement was clearly a family settlement, one in which to whom the testator stood in loco parentis, and his presumed intent was therefore let in the conditio si sine liberis.²

At advising,—

LORD ORMDALE.—The question to be answered in this case relates to the application of the condition si sine liberis decesserit, and is attended with some difficulty, arising chiefly, I think, from what, at first sight, appears to be a conflict of decisions on the point.

The testator, George Gauld, by what is called an assignation and settlement constituted and appointed his brother, John Gauld, his sole executor, and assigned to him his whole moveable estate, for the purposes, first, of paying his debts, deathbed, and funeral expenses, and, secondly, in order that he, the executor

¹ Wishart v. Grant, June 16, 1763, M. 2310; Fleming v. Martin, June 1798, F. C. and M. 8111; Hamilton v. Hamilton, Feb. 8, 1838, 16 S. 478, Scot. Jur. 263; McGown's Trustees v. Robertsons, Dec. 17, 1869, 8 Macph. 42 Scot. Jur. 161; McCall v. Dennistoun, Dec. 22, 1871, 10 Macph. 281, Scot. Jur. 160; Blair's Executors v. Taylor, Jan. 18, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 34; Nicol v. Nicol's Trustees, Jan. 18, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 374; Gillespie v. Macfarlaner, March 8, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 561.

² Wallace v. Wallaces, Jan. 28, 1807, M. voce Clause, App. No. 6; Christie v. Patersons, July 5, 1822, 1 S. 543, and F. C.; Thomson's Trustees v. Robertson, July 10, 1851, 13 D. 1326, 23 Scot. Jur. 619.

ould have the liferent enjoyment of the residue. And the testator goes on to declare it to be his will, that after the death of his brother the capital, after deducting necessary expenses, should be "divided equally amongst the lawful children" who might "be then alive" of his five sisters, whom he names, some of them being living and others deceased.

No. 105.
Mar. 20, 1877.
Gauld's
Trustees v.
Duncan, &c.

It was assumed in the argument, and rightly, I think, that the date to which the testator refers as that when the children of his sisters should be alive is the period of distribution, after the death of his brother, the liferenter. The only disputed question was whether, although all his nephews and nieces, that is to say, all the children of his sisters, survived the testator, yet as some of them died before the liferenter, leaving issue, the latter are to be held entitled, as in the case of their deceased parents, to a share of the testator's estate in virtue of the maxim si sine liberis decesserit.

It is certainly not enough to exclude the application of the maxim that the parties claiming the benefit of it are nephews and nieces of the testator, for the contrary may be taken as settled law; and this was not disputed. The only contested point was whether the testator by referring, as he expressly does, to the children of his sisters who "may be alive" at the period of distribution, had not so limited the objects of his bounty as to exclude all room for that precatory will which is at the foundation of the maxim. It is certainly not sufficient to exclude the maxim that the words of the testator are not enough of themselves to effect that which, without it, could not be entertained, for the object of the maxim is to supply what is not expressed, but what, in accordance with certain natural and equitable principles, it may be fairly presumed the testator would have expressly provided for had he had present in his mind at the time he executed his settlement the precise circumstances, as they afterwards existed, in relation to the objects of his bounty. Now, certainly there is nothing to indicate in the present case that the testator would, if he had dealt expressly with the matter, have left that part of his estate which he destined to the children of his sisters, who, although they had survived himself, had died before the period of distribution, leaving issue, to the surviving children, to the exclusion of their issue. On the contrary, it is only natural and equitable to presume that the testator would have preferred the issue of such of the children of his sisters as had predeceased the period of distribution as coming into their parents' hands, to their surviving aunts or uncles; and in order to admit of this equitable presumption it is not necessary that there should be on the part of the testator words sufficiently expressive of such a preference. It is sufficient that there is nothing to indicate the condition which the law presumes, although it is not expressed, that in certain circumstances a child was intended to take not in right of but in the stead of a deceased parent as institute or legatee.

The principles I have now referred to have been repeatedly given effect to by the Court in circumstances which cannot, I think, be distinguished from the present. I refer, in particular, to the cases of Wallace v. Wallaces, Christie v. Others v. Paterson, and Thomson's Trustees v. Robb. It is true that the second of these cases has been questioned as an authority in some respects, but not, I think, in regard to the general principles with which we are presently dealing; and, at any rate, the other two cases stand, so far as I am aware, unimpeached. The case, indeed, of Wallace v. Wallaces is referred to by the Court in the other two with marked approval; and as its similarity to the present, if not its identity, so far as all the essential circumstances are concerned,

No. 105. appears indisputable and was not denied, I must hold it to be conclusively point.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Gauld's
Trustees v.
Duncan, &c.

But then the case of M'Call and Others v. Dennistoun and Others was presented upon the consideration of the Court as an adverse and the most recent authority. It appears to me, however, that this case, when closely examined, is distinguished in its circumstances from the others to which I have referred, as well as from the present, and must be held to have been governed by considerations which have no place in these other cases or in the present. In M'Call's case the question related to a specific legacy of £1000 bequeathed, not to the children generally as a class, of the testator's sisters, as here, but to "each of the children of my late brother Samuel M'Call who shall be alive at the period of my wife's decease, or of my decease in case of my surviving her." Accordingly we find that the Court, in deciding M'Call's case, dealt with it as relating to a specific legacy, bequeathed conditionally upon the legatee's survivance of a certain event. Thus, the Lord President expressly says that he held the application of the maxim si sine liberis decesserit was excluded, in respect the legacy was made conditional on each child surviving a certain term; and the other Judges appear to have adopted the same view. But in none of the opinions—and they are reported at considerable length—do I find any observation to the effect that the decisions in the previous cases of Wallace v. Wallaces, Christie v. Paterson and Thomson's Trustees v. Robb, although all of them are referred to as having been cited in the argument, were to be held as impinged on as authorities in the circumstances in which they occurred.

I am, therefore, for the reasons I have now stated, of opinion that the question submitted to the Court in the present case ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. In the present case all the arguments combine and coincide which favour the natural and implied construction of the maxim si sine liberis decesserit in family settlements, a condition under which if an immediate legatee predeceases the term of vesting leaving lawful issue such issue will take their parent's share. No such presumption applies in the case of a stranger legatee; but here the legatees are the whole nephews and nieces of the testator, described as "the lawful children of my living and deceased sisters." The testator then, in order to avoid any possible mistake, proceeds to enumerate these children by families, as the children of Mrs Peterkin, the children of Mrs Gauld, the children of Mrs Duncan, the children of Mrs George, and the children of Mrs Carmichael. This last child is named, as he happened to be the only child of Mrs Carmichael, who was then deceased; but this does not derogate from the generality of the class who are all called equally, share and share alike, to the legation. Then the bequest is one of residue, which is to be divided equally among all the members of the class called, and it is distinguished in this respect from the case of a simple fixed and pecuniary legacy to a nephew or a niece by will, with a condition making the legatee's survivance of a particular date a condition of the legacy. Yet, again, the expression used is, "the whole children of my living and deceased sisters," and the word "children" where it is not limited or qualified as by the word "immediate" or otherwise is very easily held to include all children where immediate children have deceased and where the provision is made from an ascendant or from one in loco parentis to the legatees. An uncle occupying the position which this testator did to all his sisters' children has always held as in loco parentis, and unless the case of Wallace and a considerable number of cases following it are now to be overruled I think that the implied condition si sine liberis must be given effect to in the present case, and the question answered in the affirmative.

No. 105.
Mar. 20, 1877.
Gauld's
Trustees v.
Duncan, &c.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the third parties named in the case, being the children of William Duncan and the children of Alexander Carmichael, are objects of the residuary bequest by the testator, George Gauld, in favour of the lawful children of his living and deceased sisters who might be alive at the period there designated: Allow the expenses of all the parties to be paid out of the trust-funds, and remit," &c.

RHIND & LINDSAY, W.S.—JOHN CARMENT, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE STANDARD PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY (LIMITED), Pursuers.—
Kinnear—Guthrie. No. 106.

MRS PATRICIA CHALMERS HUNTER OR COWE, AND C. B. LOGAN, (her Curator ad litem), Defenders.—McLaren—Blair.

HENRY COWE, Defender.

DAVID KINNEAR (Henry Cowe's Trustee in Bankruptcy), Defender.
JOHN ALEXANDER BRODIE, Defender.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v.
Cowe, &c.

Provisions to Wives and Children—Wife's Liferent unprotected by Trust—renunciation.—Held that it was competent for a wife infert in a liferent of her husband's heritage, conferred upon her by antenuptial marriage-contract, to consent to an alienation by the husband, for onerous causes, of the liferent subjects, that such consent, judicially ratified, was not revocable by her as a donation in vim et uzorem.

HENRY COWE, and his wife Patricia Hunter or Cowe, on the occasion of their marriage in 1869, entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract, which Mr Cowe disposed "to and in favour of the said Patricia Hunter, the event of her surviving him, in liferent, for her liferent use alienably, so long as she shall remain his widow,—declaring that in the event he said Patricia Hunter entering into a second marriage then the liferent right hereby conveyed shall eo ipso cease and determine,—heritably irredeemably, All and Whole" certain subjects at Bonnington, near Edinburgh. Under this marriage-contract Mr Cowe conveyed other property to trustees for behoof of Mrs Cowe and the children of the marriage, and Mrs Cowe conveyed her whole property to the same trustees for like purposes. These trustees were not, however, interposed for protection of the liferent right over the Bonnington subjects conferred Mrs Cowe. Mrs Cowe was infert in the subjects for her liferent right 2ND DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.
18th May 1872.

The provisions in Mrs Cowe's favour in the marriage-contract were acted by her as in full satisfaction of all her legal rights.

In June 1872 Mr Cowe borrowed from a Mr Hunter the sum of £1025, granted a bond and disposition in security therefor over the Bonnington subjects, with consent and concurrence of Mrs Cowe, for all her right interest under the antenuptial marriage-contract between herself and Cowe. This bond and disposition in security was judicially ratified Mrs Cowe, and was registered in the General Register of Sasines on July 1872. The advance of £1025 made by Mr Hunter in respect

No. 106. of which this security was granted was applied entirely in payment of Mr Cowe's debts, and not to any extent paid to or applied for behoof of Mrs Cowe individually.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

To this bond and disposition in security over the Bonnington subject the Standard Property Investment Company obtained right by assignation dated 13th August 1874.

In the beginning of 1875 the estates of Mr Cowe were sequestrated and David Kinnear, accountant, Edinburgh, was appointed trustee.

The interest on the debt for which the Standard Property Investment Company held the Bonnington subjects in security falling into arrears they brought the subjects to sale, in virtue of the powers in their bond and they were purchased, on 23d March 1876, by John Alexander Brodie at the price of £1150. A protest was taken against the sale by Mrs Cowe, and Mr Brodie was afterwards interpellated by her from paying the price, on the ground that her consent to the bond and disposition in security of 1872 was a gratuitous donation inter virum et uxorem, and revocable and that the sale to Mr Brodie could not be implemented except under reservation of her liferent right.

The Standard Property Investment Company accordingly raised the action, in which they called Mrs Cowe and her husband, and the trustee in his sequestration, and also Mr Brodie, as defenders. They concluded for declarator (1) that under and by virtue of the bond and disposition in security over the Bonnington subjects, and judicial ratification thereof by Mrs Cowe, and their assignation to the same, they had full power to buy and dispose of these subjects, and that free and disencumbered of all right which might be pretended by the defender Mrs Cowe under her marriage contract with the other defender, her husband, Henry Cowe, to the liferent of these subjects in the event of her surviving him; (2) for interdict against Brodie of the contract of sale.

Defences were lodged only for Mrs Cowe, to whom, as her husband and his creditors had an adverse interest, Mr C. B. Logan, W.S., was appointed curator ad litem.

Mrs Cowe pleaded;—(1) The liferent right in favour of the present defender contained in the said antenuptial contract of marriage being onerous and reasonable provision, created for her behoof after her husband's death, could not be discharged by her during his life, and the pursuers are only entitled to sell the said subjects under burden of the liferent. (2) The deeds founded on by the pursuers, in so far as they import a discharge of the defender's liferent right in the said subjects, have been granted by her without consideration, and for her husband's behoof are revocable by her as donations inter virum et uxorem. (3) The pursuers being only entitled to convey the subjects in question subject to the present defender's liferent right, the conclusions of the summons so far as directed against her, are incompetent, and she should be absolved, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary, on 5th December 1876, pronounced this interdictor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares against the defender, Patricia Chalmers Hunter or Cowe, and, in absence, against the other defenders, in terms of the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns, reserving to the defender, Mrs Cowe, all claims competent to her under and in virtue of the marriage-contract mentioned in the summons against her husband, Henry Cowe, and the trustee on his sequestrated estate, and against the pursuers, the subjects mentioned in the summons, in so far as any free balance thereof may remain after satisfying the debt due to the pursuers, and arrears of interest and instalments thereof, and the expenses of the action of said subjects, and the answers of all concerned as accords of law: F.

defenders, other than the defender John Alexander Brodie, liable to No. 106.
pursuers in expenses : Appoints an account thereof," &c.*

Mar. 20, 1877.

Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

"NOTE.—The question raised in the present action is whether it is competent for a married woman who has been infest in a liferent or other provision of her husband's estate, in virtue of her antenuptial marriage-contract, to renounce or discharge such provision stante matrimonio, by consenting for her part to the alienation of the estate by her husband to a third party for other considerations. I had occasion to consider this question, and I decided in the affirmative, in March last, in an action between the widow of the late Falconer of Carlowrie and the trustees of Mr Hutchison, who had purchased from her husband, with her consent, the estate of Carlowrie, in which had been infest in security of an annuity provided to her by her antenuptial marriage-contract. And as the question was then discussed as being one of great interest and importance, I thought it right, in the note appended to my judgment, to trace the history of this law, and exhibit the leading authorities applicable to the question. The parties having acquiesced in that judgment the case has not been reported, and I regret that I am thus unable to refer to it (as I could have wished to do) for the grounds upon which I have pronounced the foregoing judgment in the present case. I must, therefore, once more express my reasons for the judgment in detail."

After stating the facts—"Notwithstanding a very able argument by the defender's counsel, I retain the views which I held in the Carlowrie case, and I am of opinion that the defences in the present case are ill-founded, and that the pursuers are entitled to the decree which they ask.

The defender does not allege that the price of £1150 to be paid by the defender, Mr Brodie, for the property is not a full and fair price, nor does she say the sum of £1025, in consideration of which the bond and disposition in her favour was originally granted, was not paid by Mr Hunter to her husband, or that the like sum was not truly advanced by the pursuers as the consideration for their obtaining the assignation to the said bond and disposition in security. Nor does she say that her consent to the deeds, by which she virtually renounced her liferent over the subjects, was extorted from her vi aut metu by the force or fraud of her husband. Indeed her judicial ratification of the bond and disposition in security would exclude any such ground of challenge. Her main ground of defence is that her consent to the sale of the property and her renunciation of her liferent are not now binding upon her, in respect that she could not, stante matrimonio, lawfully renounce the provision made for her in the antenuptial contract of marriage. The question is a material one for both the pursuers and the defender, and it is also of much importance in its general legal aspect. The defender relies upon which the defender mainly relies are the judgments in a series of well-known cases, beginning with the case of Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1855, 15 S. 1073 (9 Scot. Jur. 509), and ending with the recent case of Fletcher v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 Rettie, 507, in all of which it was held that a married woman could not, during the life of her husband, effectually re-constitute a trust constituted in her antenuptial contract of marriage for the purpose of securing the provision thereby made in her favour, or rather of protecting her separate estate; and if the present defender had been in the position which a married woman occupied in each of these cases judgment must have been pronounced in her favour. But it appears to me, after careful consideration of the whole case, that the circumstances are essentially different from those which obtained in the cases referred to, and that the principle which guided the Court in these cases is not applicable to the present case. The principle I understand to be that where in an antenuptial contract of marriage the provisions in favour of the wife or her own separate estate are vested in trustees for her benefit the law holds that this is done for the express purpose, not only of securing her life against the risk of loss from the acts and deeds of her husband, or from subsequent insolvency, but of protecting her against all influence and interference on his part, and against her being induced by her desire unto her husband to renounce or alienate her provisions or estate. In short, the trust is regarded

No. 106. The defenders, Mrs Cowe and her curator ad litem, reclaimed.¹
At advising,—

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question between the parties is, whether the defender, Mrs Cowe, is entitled to interfere with the sale of the subjects referred as a means, if not the only effectual means, of protecting the wife's marriage contract provisions and her separate estate, not merely against her husband, quite as much against herself and her own acts, and it is now settled that such trust is irrevocable stante matrimonio, whether it is declared in the marriage contract to be so or not. But I am not aware of any case in which it has been held that a married woman has not power effectually to renounce, alienate, or charge during the marriage a provision in her favour contained in her marriage contract not secured by a trust but merely constituted by an infestment in her own name, without any restriction against alienation or renunciation, or without any declaration that it shall be irrevocable. There are, on the other hand, many cases in the books in which such renunciations and alienations have been expressly sustained as competent and lawful, and as binding upon her if judicially ratified, and in some instances even where not ratified such deeds are regarded in the same light as alienations of the wife's separate heritable estate, where that estate has not been vested in trustees by the antenuptial contract, which are undoubtedly lawful if consented to by her husband and ratified by her coram iudice with the presence of her husband.

"And here it may be observed, that so far from the alienation or discharge by a wife of her marriage-contract annuity or jointure being regarded by the law as ultra vires of her, and inept if granted by her own voluntary act, the system of judicial ratification which has now prevailed for nearly four centuries proves very clearly that the fact of coverture will not entitle a married woman to challenge such a deed where there has been no such ratification, unless she can establish that it has been extorted by her husband vi aut metu. As the defender contends, the fact of the discharge of her jointure having been granted by her, a married woman, stante matrimonio, is sufficient to entitle her to resist the deed,—a judicial ratification, which merely bars her from challenging on the ground of force and fear could afford no security to parties contracting with her. Now, it is worthy of notice that the first case in which such ratification was held sufficient to bar a married woman from revoking an alienation granted by her during marriage had reference to an alienation of jointure. 'This doctrine,' Erskine says (i. 6; 34), 'was established by a judgment in a private cause pronounced by the Lords of Council 6th March 1481, which caused it to be engrossed in the body of our statute 1481, c. 84, it became part of our written law.' The title of the Act, as printed in the duodecimo edition of 1682, is—'Ane woman, conjunct fear, makand faith that scho sall never challenge against the alienation theriof sall nocht be hearde afterwarde to impugn the said alienation;' and the words of the judgment are as follows:—'Mandatum.—The sext day of March, the zeir of God 1481 zeirs. Robert Daniel was perswede by a woman called Glen before the Lordes of Council, and would have cummin against her with that scho maid in judgment before the official of Glasgow, and there was schawin ane instrument under the seale of the said official that scho consented to the alienation of sik landes, and swore that scho suld never come in the contrair hereof, and would have the saidis landes allegand that it was her conjunct feftment, and maid revocation after the decease of her husband, sayand that he compelled her thereto. The action was delivered against this woman.'

"The following references to some of the institutional writers and decisions suffice, in my opinion, to shew that coverture, apart from force and fraud by the husband, does not disable a married woman from discharging or renouncing a liferent of lands or jointure, even when constituted by antenuptial contract, in cases in which third parties have onerously contracted with her husband.

¹ The authorities referred to will be found in the Lord Ordinary's notes.

in the summons, in respect that she was infest in a contingent liferent of them the event of her surviving her husband, under an obligation contained in her

No. 106.

Mar. 20, 1877.

Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

faith of her consent. Thus Erskine, in further treating of the subject, says (i. 6, 33)—‘In like manner, if the husband had, with the wife’s consent, made a deed to a stranger any part of the lands settled on her in liferent, action was competent to her for setting aside the alienation, upon the ground that the contract given by her to the deed had been extorted from her by her husband. To prevent the grantees against the consequences of such actions, when they were sued vexatiously, ratifications have been introduced into our practice, by which the wife, appearing before a Judge, declares upon oath that her husband has induced her by force nor fear to grant the deed or give her consent, but that she did it freely and for her own utility, and that she shall never afterwards call it in question.’ And again (i. 6, 35)—‘Every deed by which any interest accrues to a third party may be thus secured by the wife’s ratification, though a consequential benefit should arise to the husband; for the aforesaid Act of 1481, which establishes the law of ratifications, and fixes their extent, applies expressly to the case of a wife whose husband was pressed by debt to sell his estate, and to have renounced her interest in her jointure lands that the husband might be disencumbered, and had judicially ratified her renunciation.’

So also Craig, lib. i. d. 15, sec. 20, writing long before the time of Erskine, says—‘Quomodo autem in alienatione per maritum facta, illius proedii, cujus fructum mulier habet, uxoris consensus interponi debeat, multi questionem sent. Antiquitus coram iudice tantum et extra presentiam mariti interhebatur; hodie si subscripserit instrumento alienationis coram testibus sufficit, post, se ad subscribendum coactam vi et metu probare poterit; tutius tamen fit, qui in iudicio ejus consensum extra mariti presentiam obtinuerit.’

The cases now to be noticed shew that, where force and fear are not alleged, such deeds are, as Craig indicated, sustained even without ratification. Thus, in the case of Hepburn v. Naismith, 16th June 1613, M. 16,482, a woman having consented to an alienation made by her husband of lands wherein she was infest in liferent before her marriage in liferent or conjunct fee intuitu matrimonii, for an annual rent of 400 merks yearly during her lifetime, the alienation was held effectual without her judicial ratification, ‘unless she had libelled verum pressum metum by relevant circumstances and deeds, and proved the same lawful and ordinary means.’ In the case of Grant, 8th July 1642, M. 83, a married woman having consented to and judicially ratified a disposition made by her husband of a tenement in Perth provided to her in conjunct with her contract of marriage, she was held not entitled to set it aside. And a similar decision was pronounced in the case of Hay v. Cumming, 28th June 1656, M. 16,506, in which the question was distinctly raised and decided that a married woman, if not coerced vi aut metu, might effectually discharge her jure stante matrimonio by consenting to the alienation of the subjects over which it was secured to a third party for a fair price. The case of Lockhart, November 1762, M. 5994, is another decision to the like effect. The other case of the kind to which I will refer is the case of Arnold v. Scott, June 1673, M. 6091, where the widow of William Baxter having raised a claim for maills and duties of her liferent lands, wherein she was infest on a deed of marriage, the defence was that she was denuded by her consent to a deed of the lands granted by her husband to the defender, and judicially admitted—‘Wherein, albeit there be a back-tack, yet it is set to the husband, his assigns, and was apprised from him, to which apprising the defender is right.’ The Court, drawing the distinction between the wadset to the husband and the back-tack to the husband, held that the judicial ratification of the wife could only be extended to the interest of the wadsetter, and that the back-tack, being only in favour of the husband, a donation revocable, bound the wife to have the right to the maills and duties more than the wadsetter’s annual rent.

In contrast to these cases reference may be made to the cases of Cassie, 27th June 1632, M. 10,279, and Woodhead, 24th June 1662, M. 10,281, in both of which a married woman's consent to a wadset granted by her husband of jointure lands was held to be revocable, and was set aside even against an onerous wadsetter, because she alleged and proved that it had been extorted from her by her husband by violence, and she had not ratified the deed.

No. 106. antenuptial contract of marriage, and that the bond and disposition to which she was a party was gratuitous on her part, and is revocable by her, having been granted solely for her husband's behoof.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

"An authority which at first sight appears to be counter to these is the case of Scott v. Cranstoun, Aug. 10, 1776, M. 6108, reversed by the House of Lords April 21, 1777, 2 Pat. App. 425. The rubric of the case is, as reported by Paton,—'A husband procured a renunciation from his wife of her property secured preferably over his estates, in order to allow them to be sold and the price paid to his creditors. Held the wife not bound by the renunciation although third parties were interested, and had agreed to abate claims on granting it.' This rubric does not correctly state the import of the decision of the House of Lords, which, it is evident from the report, proceeded upon the grounds (1) that the renunciation had been granted by Lady Cranstoun under an essential error on her part; (2) that although the creditors had agreed to certain abatements in respect of that renunciation, nothing was done by them to implement the agreement, and nothing followed upon it; and (3) that there was a final judgment of the Court of Session pronounced years before the ultimate judgment appealed against, to the effect that there was no evidence that the transaction between the creditors and Lady Cranstoun was ever concluded, so that the creditors were therefore not bound to give an abatement from their debts. It also appeared from documents produced in the House of Lords that negotiations had been renewed, although never completed, for a new deed of renunciation being granted by Lady Cranstoun. This case, therefore, is no authority for holding that a married woman cannot effectually renounce during marriage an antenuptial marriage-contract provision made directly in her favour."

"These cases, which, as I think, must be taken as establishing the law, show that a married woman may effectually alienate or renounce a security held by her directly over her husband's estate for her marriage-contract provisions, and she cannot competently challenge her renunciation as being a donation inter vivos or virum et uxorem in a question with a third party, who, on the faith of it, has onerously contracted with her husband, do not appear to me to be in any way affected, or to have their authority lessened, by the judgments in the recent cases already referred to, viz., Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 Sh. 10 (40 Scot. Jur. 509); Pringle v. Anderson, July 3, 1868, 6 Macph. 982 (40 Scot. Jur. 563); Hope v. Hope's Trustees, March 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 699 (42 Scot. Jur. 362); Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees, Nov. 24, 1871, 10 Macph. 120 (44 Scot. Jur. 77); and Fletcher Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, 2 Rettie, 507. In all of these cases a trust was interposed for the express purpose of protecting the wife's interest. Such trusts are of comparatively recent introduction, and are obvious that they enable parties to secure the provisions in favour of a married woman, and to protect her own separate estate in a much more effectual manner than by taking infestment on the contract in her own name, or by allowing her separate estate to remain under the original infestments in her own name. Now, if I have not entirely misinterpreted the judgments in these recent cases, the existence of the trust was in each case the ground on which the Court set aside the wife's estate and the provisions in her favour to be effectually protected against the acts of the spouses stans matrimonio, and a provision not so protected must, in my opinion, be dealt with as the provisions were dealt with in the earlier decisions to which I have adverted. In the present case it was intended to give the defender the security of a trust with reference to her life-rent. This is shewn by the circumstance that the funds coming from her husband were all carefully vested in trustees for her behoof, but no such precaution was taken with reference to her life-rent. I am therefore of opinion that the defender is not entitled to be reinstated in the full right of her life-rent as against the parties who lent money onerously and in bona fide over the property."

The pursuers are onerous holders of this bond, for full value advanced, and before if Mrs Cowe had the power to burden the property to the exclusion of her life-rent right she is clearly bound to the creditors whatever may be her claims against her husband's estate. The only question is, whether she had power so to bind herself.

No. 106.
Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

It is maintained on the part of Mrs Cowe, 1st, that as the life-rent right being to her in this property was conferred in an antenuptial contract of marriage she had no power to deal with it, burden it, or renounce it stante matrimonio, even with her husband's consent; and 2dly, that by the terms of the marriage-contract the property was vested in the marriage trustees for her behoof, so, under the authority of the cases of Torry Anderson, Pringle, and Menzies, removed beyond the reach of the deeds of the wife.

It may as well clear the ground by disposing of the second of these pleas, which is clearly untenable. The life-rent right did not belong to Mrs Cowe at the marriage-contract was executed, neither did she acquire it after marriage. The deed was a contract, in which the husband provides contingent life-rent to his promised wife, and the lady on her part, and for the corresponding consideration, conveys all her own property which she then possessed, and which she might acquire after the marriage, to trustees for her behoof. The consideration given by the husband cannot be part of the consideration given by the wife, which would appear quite distinctly if the conveyance had been, not to trustees, but to the husband direct. With-going farther into details it is clear from the trust purposes that this life-rent was meant to fall under the trust, and, as the Lord Ordinary observes, us mariti is excluded as regards the funds and property conveyed in trust, there is no restriction on the life-rent right. But what is quite conclusive on the head is, that if it had been intended that the trustees should hold the life-rent right, it would have been conveyed to them directly, while the obligation of the contract is to invest the wife in it without burden or condition of any kind. The proposition maintained for Mrs Cowe is the very general, and, as I think, a very novel one, that an heritable estate acquired by a married woman in virtue of an obligation in an antenuptial contract cannot be the subject of conveyance by her ante matrimonium, although the right is not burdened by a trust, or any qualification or condition. The general law as to real property vested in a married woman is exactly the reverse. Erskine says (i. 6, 27)—“All obligations granted to her we now brought the property to sale under the powers which she, and her husband with her consent, conferred upon them.

In the case of Rae v. Neilson, May 14, 1875, 2 Rettie, 676, was referred to the defender as virtually superseding the earlier decisions which I have mentioned, and as establishing the broad general proposition that a married woman stante matrimonio, renounce any provision made in her favour by her marriage-contract, whether secured by the interposition of a trust or not. But the case does not in the slightest degree support such a contention, for the fact which the widow was there found entitled to revoke after her husband's death was a mutual settlement executed by her and her husband, by which her marriage-contract provisions were materially reduced, and the estates of herself and her husband were settled gratuitously upon relatives of the husband and to whom she had given no onerous consideration for the deed, and the judgment of the court proceeded on the ground that none of these beneficiaries could plead in solutum tertio.

On the whole matter I have come to be of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.”

No. 106.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

by the wife, either charging or even alienating any estate or subject of which she retains the property exclusive of the jus mariti, whether proper heritable bonds bearing interest, are effectual, provided the husband, as curator, consent to them." I am not aware that this rule of law has ever been questioned, although many cases have arisen in regard to the voluntary nature of such deeds by a wife or the necessity of judicial ratification. Lord Moncreiff, in the well known case of Buchan v. Risk (12 Sh. 511), stated the law thus: "Though the pursuer, as a married woman, could not grant any personal obligation on which diligence could proceed, she had power, with her husband's consent, and in a sound mind, and not induced thereto by force, fear, or fraud, to dispose of her heritable estate effectually to a third party absolutely, or under reversion, and that such a disposition requires no separate ratification, unless it can be shown by the wife that she acted under undue influence. This judgment was affirmed by the Court, after taking the opinion of all the Judges on the last point. The first seems to have been thought to be beyond controversy. The authorities will be found collected in the last edition of Mr Fraser's work, p. 805, and the general point requires no farther demonstration.

But it is said that because this lifereit right was acquired in virtue of an antenuptial marriage-contract there is a special restriction attaching to it, though none is expressed. I can see no principle on which this proposition can be supported, nor do I know any authority for it. An antenuptial marriage contract is an onerous deed, but it is neither more or less, so far as such a question as this is concerned. The betrothed wife, being free to contract, contracts with her intended husband as she would with any other third party, and if she stipulates for and obtains a conveyance it is as valid to her and comprehends all the same rights and powers as if it flowed from any one else, unless the contract limits it.

The cases of intervening trusts constituted by antenuptial contract which have been referred to really illustrate this by contrast. A direct title taken to the wife means that she and she alone is proprietor. A title taken to trustees means that the wife, although a beneficiary, is so only through the sides of the trustee's title, and subject to all the restrictions, expressed and implied, in the trust deed. The recent case of *Menzies*¹ illustrates this very forcibly. There it was necessary to break down the trust right in order to reach the desired result—to vest the title on the terms of the title. The Court in effect held that this direct title, intervening between the wife and the property, could not be overpassed during the lifereit, because the barrier had been intentionally erected for that very end. The intention was logically deduced from the act done. It is hard to see how it can be deduced from the granter of the conveyance having done exactly the reverse.

The fact that this lifereit was not vested in trustees, but taken directly by the promised spouse, indicates, as I think, as clear an intention not to limit the wife's power over her own property as the interposition of a trust title would have indicated the reverse.

The cases of Anderson and Pringle were entirely out of the category of this belongs. The case of Hope was strongly founded on; but, rightly understood, it really confirms instead of weakening the views I have expressed. The case was this: Mr Hope, in his son's antenuptial marriage-contract, became bound to the lady, in the event of her widowhood, to pay her an annuity of £1000 per annum.

¹ Cited in the Lord Ordinary's note supra, p. 700.

ar. On his death his widow, as his executrix, became liable in this obligation, and she, her son, and her son's wife, came to an arrangement, stante matrimonio, by which the son's wife renounced the obligation contained in the marriage contract, and, on the other hand, the widow conveyed to her son certain parts of the father's property, and stipulated that she should be discharged of obligation for the annuity, and that it should be secured over part of the property conveyed. These things were all done, and the Court found they should not be undone by the son and his wife, for they were parts of an onerous contract with a third party. But the case shews that a wife and her husband deal with rights secured to the former even by a contract of marriage.

No. 106.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, &c.

ORD ORMDALE.—I entirely concur with your Lordship, as well in the result which you have come as the grounds on which you have proceeded.

Early the assignation challenged is not revocable on the principle of donatio virum et uxorem. And it is also clear that it cannot be challenged as having been granted gratuitously and without consideration, for it involves the interests of bona fide onerous third parties.

Neither can it be said that the wife's life interest right in question, although proper for her by her husband in their antenuptial contract of marriage, has the sanction of a trust or any other protection. It is not declared inalienable, or alimentary. Nor is it said that in assigning it as she did the wife was induced by force, fear, or fraud, or was actuated by any undue influence whatever. It is therefore unable to see any reason for holding that the Lord Ordinary's decision is erroneous. On the contrary, it appears to be supported by ample authority, by the institutional writers, as well as by a whole series of decided cases.

ORD GIFFORD.—I concur in the views now expressed by your Lordships, and in the views so fully and ably enforced by the Lord Ordinary.

It is now quite fixed that by antenuptial contract of marriage or by separate agreement entered into before marriage a bride may place her own property, or a part of her marriage provisions, or part of them, so completely out of her own power while the marriage subsists that she shall be unable, however much she may wish it, and however much she may think it for her husband's interests to ask to herself or to hand over to her husband any part of the property or provisions which she so secured to herself before the marriage was entered into, and they should certainly be available for her in case of her widowhood. The illustration of this rule is the case of Fletcher Menzies v. Murray, 2 Rettie. In most of the cases which have occurred this object—I mean the object of placing a wife's provisions beyond her own power of defeating them stante matrimonio—has been accomplished by entirely divesting herself in favour of a third party, so that the property was not vested in the wife at all but in third parties, for certain trust purposes, which were only to emerge on the wife's death, and which trust, either by express words or by implication, the wife while she was under coverture, disabled herself from recalling. Possibly the object might be accomplished by a sort of interdiction making the consent of certain parties named indispensable to the validity of any deed affecting the property secured provisions, but certainly the object is best and most completely accomplished by means of an irrevocable trust.

And the wife, however, or her parents or advisers, do not resort to any such means for placing the wife's property or provisions out of her own power and beyond her own control, however much she may desire to affect them, and

No. 106.
 Mar. 20, 1877.
 Standard Property Investment Co. v.
 Cowe, &c.

however much her husband may consent that she should do so, and where the contrary, the wife herself retains in her own hands alone the full and absolute control of her property or provisions, and does not give anybody else power of any kind to interfere therewith or to restrain or prevent her dealing with them as she pleases, then I do not see how such restraint or of power is to be inferred from the mere fact that the property is reserved provided to the wife in an antenuptial contract of marriage. It may be the jus mariti of the husband is well and effectually excluded. It may be also the husband's curatorial power, or right of administration as it is sometimes called, is also well and effectually excluded. The effect of such clauses is just to leave the property or the provision more absolutely, more exclusively and more uncontrolledly in the possession of the wife herself and at her command and disposal. All these clauses simply keep out the husband, but do not keep out or fetter the wife herself. On the contrary, they only enlarge the wife's rights; they leave her free to do as she pleases without requiring the husband's consent, or even against his wishes; but they do not prevent her selling her separate property to a third party, or from disposing of it at pleasure. It may be very important that a wife should have this power, and she often most naturally refuse to give it up, and refuse to put herself under restraints, which, whatever be the emergency, she cannot remove.

Accordingly, where there are no restrictions on the power of the wife herself where she is not fettered by a trust or by some other device which directly disables her, she remains her own mistress, and free to do as she pleases for her own. She is free even to give her separate property to her husband, and his creditors stante matrimonio, he consenting where his curatorial power is excluded; for a married woman with her husband's consent may do all the acts affecting her property as she could have done by herself alone before marriage, or which she could do if she had become a widow. In such cases, however, the law still gives a remedy to the wife who is induced, it may be by the love of her husband, to give to him or his creditors, for all such gifts, donations inter virum et uxorem, and the wife may revoke them at pleasure only in a question with her husband. The sale or the pledge will stand only to a third party, but the husband must, when required, restore the value of the amount. All this is fully illustrated by the cases referred to by the Court of Ordinary, and I am unable to distinguish so as to make a different rule in the case of an antenuptial marriage-contract provision to the wife when it is stipulated for out of the wife's own estate, and when it is stipulated for out of the husband's estate, or when it is given from the property or funds of the parents or friends of either of the spouses. In all cases I think the general rule is that if the wife wishes in antenuptial settlements to be absolutely secured against her own acts she can only be so by disabling herself from acting, and this she can only do by means of a trust or by making effectual conditions duly made real and published, making the consent of third parties or some equivalent indispensable. If she does not do this, the remedy seems to be revocation of a donation and a claim against the husband.

Of course I am not now dealing with cases where the wife's act has been obtained by force or by fraud, or where there are grounds for challenging the act as not her own act and deed. These cases have their own appropriate remedies.

THE COURT adhered.

J. DUNCAN SMITH, S.S.C.—JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, Pursuer.—M'Laren.
CHARLES G. H. KINNEAR AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Murray.

No. 107.

Mar. 20, 1877.*
Kinnear v.
Kinnear, &c.

Entail—Moveables.—Held, by Lord Shand (Ordinary), that an entail of moveables is ineffectual even inter hæredes.

(SEE special case Kinnear, June 5, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 765.)

Outer-House.
Lord Shand.

The question for decision in this case was, whether a deed of entail duly recorded in the Register of Entails, executed by the trustees of the late Charles Kinnear, of the lands and estate of Kinloch, and the furniture, plate, paintings, and plenishing in the mansion-house, was an effectual entail so far as regarded the moveable property which it included. This question was presented in the form of an action at the instance of the heir of entail in possession of the estate and moveable property conveyed by the deed, directed against the whole succeeding heirs of entail, and including for decree of declarator, inter alia, that the deed, in so far as affected the conveyance of furniture and others, with the prohibitions and other clauses of a strict entail, was inoperative and ineffectual to strain the pursuer from altering the order of succession, selling or disposing of the said furniture and others, or contracting debt whereby the same might be evicted, and that the pursuer had right to the furniture and others, and was possessed thereof in fee-simple.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, decerns, and declares that the disposition and deed of entail described in the conclusions of the summons, in so far as regards the furniture and other moveable effects therein conveyed, is inoperative and ineffectual to restrain the pursuer and his successors under the destination from altering the order of succession, selling or disposing of the said furniture and others, or contracting debt whereby the same may be evicted; and that the pursuer has right to the said furniture and others, and is possessed thereof in fee-simple; and as regards the remaining conclusion, dismisses the same, and decerns; and finds no expenses due."†

† "NOTE.—The general question as to the power of making an effectual entail of moveables is one of much importance, and has not, I think, formed the subject of previous decision in a question inter hæredes. In a special case between the pursuer and the late Mr Kinnear's trustees the opinion of the Court was asked as to whether the directions in the late Mr Kinnear's trust-deed to include the moveables in the entail of the estates ought to receive effect. The Court in disposing of that case held that the trustees were bound, as directed by the truster, to include the moveable subjects in the entail, but as the proper parties interested in the question, viz., the succeeding heirs of entail, were not parties to the proceedings, the Court expressly refrained from expressing any opinion as to whether the direction when so carried out would constitute an effectual entail of the moveable property.—Special Case Kinnear, 5th June 1875, 2 Rettie, 765.

The disposition and deed of entail has now been executed, and the proper parties are in Court to try its effect. On the narrative of the testator's instructions, contained in his deed of settlement and codicils, his trustees by the deed were granted, and disposed to and in favour of the pursuer and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, the other heirs-substitutes therein mentioned, the lands and estate of Kinloch, as therein described, 'together also with the furniture, silver plate, paintings, bed and table linen, and other plenishing in the mansion-house of Kinloch, conform to inventory thereof' appended to the deed, subscribed as relative to it. The deed contains prohibitions against alteration of the order of succession thereby established, against sales of 'the lands and estate and others' thereby conveyed, or any part or portion thereof, and

* Decided Feb. 17, 1876.

- No. 107. against the contraction of debt which might be the ground of any adjudication, eviction, or forfeiture of the 'lands and others,' or any part or portion thereof.
- Mar. 20, 1877. It does not contain irritant or resolute clauses with reference to these prohibitions, but contains a clause declaring that the heir of entail who shall permit adjudication or other real diligence to affect the lands entailed for upwards of three years shall forfeit his right to the 'lands and others' thereby conveyed. The inventory appended to the deed embraces in detail the ordinary articles of furniture of a mansion-house, including plenishing of the different rooms, bed and table linen, and silver plate, paintings, and books. The deed also contains authority for registration in the Register of Tailies, which, by the statute of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., cap. 101, sec. 14), is equivalent to the insertion of an effectual prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, so far as regards the heritable estate. As regards the moveable subjects conveyed the deed contains prohibitions only. And it is important to observe that, in dealing with the heritable estate, there is no clause of forfeiture applicable to the event of the donee, or any heir, disposing of the moveables, either gratuitously or for onerous considerations, though the heritage, by force of the clause authorizing registration in the Register of Tailies, is the subject of prohibitions and irritant and resolute clauses. The moveables are the subject of the express prohibitions contained in the deed, but of no other clauses of a restraining nature—and the heritable and moveable property are not tied together by any penalty of forfeiture of right to the heritage, should the donee or a succeeding heir after the order of succession to the moveables, or gratuitously dispose of them. The case is thus substantially the same as if the deed were a conveyance of moveables only with the prohibitions already mentioned, and no other clauses of a restraining nature; and the question raised is, whether a deed conveying moveable property, of the nature now mentioned, to a series of heirs and beneficiaries in succession with prohibitions against alienation, burdening, or altering the order of succession but without irritant or resolute clauses, constitutes an effectual entail of the moveable subjects, so as to make it unlawful for the donee, in a question with the persons substituted to him, to dispose of the subjects at his own pleasure.
- "It is maintained by the heirs of entail that, in a question with them, the pursuer is not entitled to dispose of the moveable subjects included in the conveyance as an ordinary fee-simple proprietor might do. It is not disputed that third parties could effectually purchase the articles, and that they might be carried off by diligence for payment of the pursuer's debts. But it is maintained that the pursuer has no right to defeat the substitution by voluntary or gratuitous acts or deeds. The pursuer, on the other hand, maintains that he is heir of the moveable property, and as such entitled to dispose of it as a fee-simple proprietor notwithstanding the prohibitions contained in the deed.
- "1. In determining the question raised, it must be observed at the outset that if the defenders' pleas be well founded, the remarkable result must follow that an entail of moveable subjects effectual inter hæredes may be constituted by deeds which would have no such effect in reference to heritable estate, which has always hitherto been regarded as the proper subject of entail. It is true that after the decision in the case of Carrick v. Buchanan, 1844, 3 Bell's App. 36, it was no longer doubtful that even where an entail contained prohibitions unfenced by irritant and resolute clauses, a gratuitous deed altering the order of succession prescribed by the entail was ineffectual. But after the Entail Act of 1848, 11 and 12 Vict., cap. 36 (sec. 43), this was no longer the law, and it is quite settled that mere prohibitions will not constitute an effectual entail in question inter hæredes any more than in a question with onerous third parties. See Duke of Hamilton, 8 Macph., H. L., 48; Dempster, 3 Macqueen's App. 6. Again, it is to be observed that even in regard to moveable property a very important limitation has also been imposed on the power of testators in the case of liferents, for by the Entail Amendment Statute of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., cap. 84, sec. 17), it is provided that a liferent of moveable estate can be constituted only in favour of a party in life at the death of the granter of the deed, and that where such estate shall be held in liferent by or for behoof of a party born after the date of the deed the estate conveyed shall belong to him absolutely.

"In this state of the law as to heritable estate and liferents of moveable property the defenders are certainly not in a favourable position for maintaining that the Court should now for the first time decide that a conveyance and destination of moveables containing prohibitions against selling or altering the order of succession is effectual as an entail inter hæredes, so as to prevent a donee from gratuitously disposing of the subjects.

"2. There is no dictum or authority to be found in the institutional writers in favour of an entail of moveables. The subject of entail is invariably treated as having reference to heritable property, and under the head of heritable rights; and there are strong reasons of public policy and expediency against the view that moveable subjects, the property of which passes by mere delivery, without any written title, may be tied up either by a de presenti conveyance or mortis causa settlement for all time, to descend in property from one person to another in a specified line.

"3. The only case in which the effect of an entail of moveable articles came directly before the Court for decision was that of Baillie v. Grant, 21st May 1859, 21 D. 838. The deed in that case contained prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses applicable to the moveable property conveyed, and the question arose in a process of suspension and interdict at the instance of the heir of entail in possession against a creditor of his own about to do diligence against the moveable property. The Lord Ordinary passed the note to try the question; the creditor reclaimed, but his counsel was stopped in the course of his argument, on which the suspender's counsel stated that he could not support the suspension, and the note was accordingly refused. The defenders distinguished the case from the present on the ground that this is a question inter hæredes. They do not dispute that purchasers from the pursuer could acquire an undoubted right to the moveable articles conveyed, and that creditors of the pursuer or any succeeding heir of entail, could by diligence affect these subjects.

"4. It is stated, however, that there are earlier authorities which support the view that prohibitions in an entail of moveables are effectual. The cases referred are those of Leven v. Montgomerie, 1683, M. 3217, reported also at pages 153 to 5819; and Veitch v. Young, May 25, 1808, M. voce Service and affirmation, Appendix No. 4. The former of these cases has been referred from the bench as deciding that an entail of a moveable subject is effectual inter hæredes. On consideration of the various reports, however, I do not think it can be properly regarded as a decision to that effect. The question which arose in that case between the Earl of Leven and Mr Francis Montgomerie had reference to certain alienations which the Countess of Leven had made on her dower, and which were challenged by the Earl of Leven as in prejudice of rights as heir-at-law. These acts included a deed of discharge in favour of the Countess, and a conveyance in favour of Mr Montgomerie, her husband, of her share of the goods in communion of the marriage, and the delivery to him of her jewels, including a particular jewel which had been gifted to her grandfather, the first Earl of Leven, by the King of Sweden, and which the Earl had provided by his testament should remain in the family, and should not be alienated. It was decided that all of these acts of alienation were reducible as in prejudice of the heir's right of relief of moveable debts, excepting the gift of the jewel, in which the Court held was paraphernal, and as such not subject to the heir's relief, as other moveables were. It was held that the King of Sweden's jewel was not of this class, and the alienation or gift of it was set aside in the same manner as the conveyance and discharge which had been granted by the Countess. None of the various reports of the case occur under the head of entail.

The decision is classed amongst these relating to husband and wife, or law of deathbed. There are no doubt passages in certain of the reports which indicate that it was pleaded that the King of Sweden's jewel was 'inalienable' or 'inalienable,' in respect of the provision to that effect in Lord Leven's deed. It may be inferred that opinions to that effect may have been expressed, although it rather appears from the terms of the interlocutor dictated by the clerk (M. 5806) that the jewel was regarded as within the class of 'heir-moveables' rather than an inalienable subject. But the general ground of

No. 107.

Mar. 20, 1877.

Kinnear v.
Kinnear, &c.

No. 107. decision appears to me to have been, that the alienation of moveable property was, in the circumstances, liable to challenge, and that this ground applied to the important jewel, which was not within the lady's paraphernalia, in the same way as to the other moveable estate not in that position.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Kinnear v.
Kinnear, &c.

"The case of Veitch certainly does not favour the view maintained by the defenders. The deed of entail conveyed to the heirs called the grantor's household furniture or plenishing of whatever kind within his house at the time of his death, together with his whole library and books of every kind. It was maintained that the right to this property having been rendered heritable destination could not be taken up by mere possession, so as to render the subjects liable to the diligence of the creditors of the heir; but the Court rejected this view, and found that the property was effectually vested, and subject to the diligence of arrestment.

"The case of Leven v. Montgomerie thus stands alone as the sole authority by way of decision in favour of the defenders' contention. That case is in doubt referred to in the opinion of Lord Balgray in the case of Maule v. Maule, 4th March 1829, F.C. 4, p. 689, and 7 Shaw, Appendix, page 6, in support of the general statement that 'even moveables can be protected by an entail and may be transferred from heir to heir under what limitations and conditions the original proprietor thinks proper,' but, for the reason already stated, I do not think the case (the only authority referred to) can be regarded as an authority to that effect. The passage in Sandford on Entails, p. 251, to a somewhat similar effect, is also founded on the case of Leven, and on the opinion of Lord Balgray in the case of Maule, and a similar expression of opinion by Lord Craig at an earlier stage of the same case. The statement by Mr Sandford 'that prohibitions in a deed of entail entitle the heirs to prevent the alienation of entailed moveables, or renders the heir who breaks the prohibition liable in damages,' is inconsistent with the decisions of the House of Lords in the Ascare, Tillicoultry, and Queensberry cases, 4 Wilson and Shaw, pp. 196, 240, and 254. These cases make it clear that even if an entail of moveables should be regarded as of the same force as prior to the statute of 1848 an entail of land had, the heir in possession could dispose of the moveables by sale, or by pledge, with power to sell, and that no claim of any kind could be made against him 'as compensation or damages, as for a wrong done to the future heirs. It is very difficult in these circumstances, and with reference to moveable subjects, the property of which passes by delivery without any written title, to find a good reason for holding that there is a restraint throughout a long course of succession against gratuitous alienations.

"5. Holding, then, on the grounds now stated, that the question is open, and that the Court is now asked for the first time to decide that an effectual entail of moveables may be made by a simple conveyance subject to conditions and prohibitions, I am of opinion that an entail of moveables cannot be effectually made. Having in view the nature of the property and the fact that a right of fee is given to the donee and his successors, it appears to me to follow that the right must be absolute, and that it is incompetent to limit or control the disposal of the moveables, though it might cause a forfeiture of right to the land. In that view it would only give a strong, and it may be, overwhelming reason against such an act, and so might indirectly secure the descent in one line of certain moveable articles with the heritable estate. The two determining elements against a valid entail of moveables are the direct fee given, and the nature of the subjects. In the present instance many articles which would perish in a short time by mere use are included in the entail, as e.g., tapestries and curtains, bed and table linen, bedding, fire irons, washing tubs, and the like. It appears to be out of the question to suppose that an effectual entail articles like these can be effected. A more plausible argument can be urged in regard to such articles as paintings, family portraits, articles of plate, and books, which may be preserved, and often are, for many generations, in a family. Yet it is to these it is clear that no prohibitions can prevent the fiar from disposing of them for onerous consideration, and their very nature as moveables renders them unsuitable as the subject of an entail. Again, what is the meaning and effect of giving them over in fee? A limited right may be given by creating a trust and conveying the property to trustees, to be held in trust for a particular purpose, as paintings or articles of interest and value are frequently given over to such bodies as the trustees for the National Gallery or for the Society of Antiquaries. In these cases, the right of fee is limited at once by the trust character of the disponees and the trust purpose expressed in the deed of gift. Too, limited rights may be given to beneficiaries, through the interposition of a trust, or by giving a liferent to one person and the fee to another. But if the fee be given so as to vest a full right of property in moveable subjects, I think the result is that the disponee becomes fee-simple proprietor, and that conditions to the effect that the property must descend through a defined series of heirs are ineffectual. They are so because they are inconsistent with the nature of the property and the right of fee given.

"In this case the full right of fee is given to the pursuer by the deed of conveyance. I think he is not affected by the prohibitions, and that he is therefore entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the preceding interlocutor. The necessity of reduction of the deed, even to the limited effect craved, is, I think, applicable, for the decision gives to the deed its legal effect. The conclusion in the direction in the trust-deed to entail the moveable property is inoperative, I think, also unsuitable, for the Court has already held that the direction would so far receive effect that the trustees should execute the deed of entail, which they have accordingly done. The matter for determination is what is the effect of the deed, and the judgment disposes of that question."

MELVILLE & LINDSAY, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

MATTHEW FAIRLEY AND OTHERS (Snell's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.—M'Laren—Lang. No. 108.

JAMES MORRISON AND OTHERS, Claimants.—M'Laren—Lang.
MRS JESSIE SNELL OR ANDERSON AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Gloag.
JOHN MILLER AND OTHERS, Claimants.—Balfour.

Mar. 20, 1877.*
Snell's
Trustees v.
Morrison, &c.

Testing.—A testator directed his trustees, upon the death of his widow, to set in their own names three-fifths of the residue of his estate for behoof of laughter and her husband in liferent, for their liferent use alienably, and for that of their children, in such proportions as their parents, or the survivor of them, should appoint by writing; "and failing both of them without having executed such writing, then for behoof of their said children equally, share and share alike, in fee," declaring that in the event of any grandchild dying without having received payment of his share and leaving issue such share should fall to the issue. The testator was survived by his widow, and also by his daughter and her husband, and by several of the daughter's children, three of whom predeceased their mother and the truster's widow without leaving issue.

Held by Lord Shand (Ordinary) that a right to a share of residue vested in the grandchildren at the date of the testator's death, subject only to the condition that in the event of any grandchild dying before the term of payment of the share of such child should belong to such issue.

WILLIAM SNELL died in 1849 survived by his widow, and a daughter, the wife of Alexander Morrison. A son had predeceased him, leaving a wife and children. Mrs Morrison had ten children alive at the date of William Snell's death. Mr Snell left a deed of settlement, executed a few Outer-House.

Lord Shand.

No. 108. months before his death, by which he conveyed his property to trustees. After certain provisions in favour of his widow he appointed his trustees to hold his estates undivided during the lifetime of his wife, and to pay three-fifths of the proceeds, in so far as not required to meet the provisions in favour of his widow, to his daughter, Mrs Morrison, and failing her, to her husband, and the remaining two-fifths to his son's widow and her three daughters named in the deed in certain proportions. The clause as to residue then proceeded as follows:—"And upon the decease of my said spouse I appoint my said trustees and their aforesaid to divide the residue and remainder of my said estates and effects into five equal parts or shares, and to lend out on personal security, or to invest in their own names as trustees foresaid, three of the said shares for behoof of my said daughter in liferent for her liferent use allanarly, and, in the event of her decease, survived by the said Alexander Morrison, also in liferent for his liferent use allanarly, and for behoof of the children of my said daughter in said proportions, and subject to such restrictions as she and her said husband or the survivor of them, may appoint by any writing under their, his, or her hands, and failing both of them without having executed such writing, then for behoof of their said children, equally, share and share alike in fee." This clause was followed by certain special provisions in regard to the shares of his estate given to his son's family, after which the deed proceeded:—"And further, I declare that in case of any grandchild having died without having received payment of his or her share, leaving lawful issue, such share shall fall to such issue, if more than one equally among them, share and share alike."

Mar. 20, 1877.
Snell's.
Trustees v.
Morrison, &c.

Mr Morrison died in 1860, Mrs Morrison in 1861, and the truster's widow in 1874. She was predeceased by three of Mrs Morrison's children, two of whom were unmarried, but the third left a widow, who claimed her share of Snell's succession effecting to her husband as his executrix. It was maintained by certain of the claimants that, on a sound construction of Mr Snell's deed of settlement, no right of any kind vested in his grandchildren, the children of his daughter Mrs Morrison, prior to the death of Mrs Snell, the truster's widow, in 1874, or, alternatively, prior to the death of Mrs Morrison in 1861.

The trustees raised a multipoleinding.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that a share of three-fifths of the residue of the trust-estate vested a morte testatoris each of the children of the marriage between the truster's daughter Mrs Snell and Alexander Morrison, writer in Glasgow, alive at that time, subject to the condition only that in the event of any such children predeceasing the term of payment of residue, leaving issue, the share of such children shall belong to such issue."*

* "NOTE.—The question whether any right to a share of the fund vested in the children of the late Mr and Mrs Morrison at the death of their grandfather Mr Snell, in 1849, is not free from difficulty. . . .

"The claimants, who maintain that no vesting to any extent took place at the death of Mrs Snell, rest their argument on three considerations:—

"1. That the fee is destined to children as a class, and not to individual children."
"2. That the right to a share of the residue is given in the form only of a direction to divide and invest the residue on the death of Mrs Snell, and not in words of gift as at an earlier date; and

"3. Much reliance is placed on the provision that in case of a grandchild dying before the term of payment of the residue, leaving issue, such issue should take the parent's share.

"The authorities on which they mainly relied were the cases of Leitch v. Barclay, 20th July 1865, 3 Macph. 1143; and Young v. Robertson, 4 Macph. H. L., 314. The settled rule recognised both in this country and in Eng-that effect should be given to the testator's intention as it is to be gathered from the terms of the deed, and it appears to me in this case that it was not the intention of the testator to postpone the vesting of all right in his grandchildren an interest in his trust-estate until the expiry of the annuity or the liferents which he provided. Had the deed contained a clause of survivorship or destination over in favour of those grandchildren who should survive Mrs Snell, the tenant, or Mr and Mrs Morrison, the liferenters, the case of Young v. Robertson and earlier cases would have applied, and the fee in this case would have longed exclusively to the survivors. The absence of such a clause is in my opinion a material circumstance in favour of the view which, after full consideration, I have adopted, viz., that vesting took place a morte testatoris.

"It should be kept in view that when Mr Snell executed his deed Mrs Morrison's ten children were all in life, and the youngest of them apparently were the age of childhood. It was obviously his intention, subject to the annuity in favour of his widow and the liferent to his daughter and her husband, to give the fee of three-fifths of his estate to his grandchildren in equal shares. Laying out of view for the moment the clause in favour of the issue of any grandchild who might predecease the term of payment, it is, I think, clear, that vesting in the grandchildren must have taken place immediately on the death of the testator. The only circumstance which can be suggested as preventing this was the existence of the provisions of annuity and rent, and it is quite settled that the existence of such rights, while postponing the term of payment, does not affect the vesting of the fee. The general principle has been strongly stated in cases of recent date. In the House of Lords, Watson v. Thomson, 1867, 1 Law Rep. (Scotch Apps.) 235, and multiplepoint-Miller v. Finlay's Trustees, Feb. 25, 1875, ante, vol. ii. H. L., 1. In the series of these cases Lord Colonsay referred with approval to the case of Forbes v. Fisher, Jan. 26, 1838, 16 S. 374, in which the rule was clearly laid down. In the case of Carlton the rule was thus stated,—'The general rule of law as to testaments is that the right of fee given vests a morte testatoris. That rule holds, though a right of liferent is at the same time given to another, and although it is done through the instrumentality of a trust, and whether the fee be given to an individual nominatim or to a class.' In the case of Maxwell v. Macleod, May 25, 1837, 15 S. 1006, which was brought under the notice of the House in the case of Forbes v. Luckie, Lord Corehouse thus stated the law,—'In a legacy is left to one person in liferent and another in fee the substance of the liferent does not prevent the fee from vesting at the death of the donor, and the rule appears to be the same when a fund is conveyed by the donor to trustees, with directions to pay the interest to one person during his life and the capital to another at the liferenter's decease—(See the case of Macdonald v. Macdonald, Jan. 28, 1808, Dic. voce Clause, App. No. 6, which is the leading one on the subject)—at least this is the rule when there is a destination of the fee to an individual simply, and no ulterior substitutions which require the trust to be kept up for the benefit of those substitutions.' The reason of the rule, as has often been explained, is the presumed intention of the truster to give to the children or other legatees all the benefits that a right of fee can give consistent with the securing of the life-interests provided, and such benefits are often of the most importance, though the term of payment be deferred, in enabling the beneficiaries to enter into business or to contract obligations in a marriage-settlement. The rule to which I have thus referred, and the authorities now mentioned, I think, effectually of the argument for postponed vesting, except in so far as it is founded on the special clause which brings in the issue of a grandchild preceding the term of payment in place of their parent. There is, I think, no distinction to be made between the case of a bequest to children as a class and individuals named, and if such a distinction existed I think it would not place here, having regard to the state of Mrs Morrison's family at the time of the settlement. Again, in my opinion, it makes no difference that the fee is given in the form of a direction to pay or to invest at the death of the testator. The result is that the fee is given at the death of the testator, though the payment is postponed so long as the liferenter lives. This was the rule in the leading cases of Wallace, 1808, and in the cases of

No. 108.

Mar. 20, 1877.

Snell's
Trustees v.
Morrison, &c.

No. 108. Maxwell v. Wylie (the first branch of the case), and Forbes v. Luckie, as many others. The provision of residue was in that form in the case of Young v. Robertson, but it was not suggested in the opinions of the learned Judges of the House of Lords that this was at all material, or that vesting would not have been held to have taken place had there been no clause of survivorship. In the case of Miller v. Finlay's Trustees also, where the fund was held to have vested a morte testatoris, the declaration of trust in regard to the fee was introduced by the words, 'after the determination of the foresaid liferents.'

Mar. 20, 1877.

Snell's

Trustees v.

Morrison, &c.

"The question remains whether the clause in regard to the issue of grandchildren taking their parents' share entirely suspended vesting of the whole provisions. It was argued that, looking to the place which this clause holds in the deed, its application was confined to the family of William Snell, and that it had no reference to Mrs Morrison's children, but having regard to the general and comprehensive terms in which it is expressed, and to the circumstance that the reason for such a provision in the mind of the testator would naturally be the same as to both families, I am of opinion the clause must be held to apply to both. On the other hand I cannot think it was the intention of the testator that the clause should suspend vesting of all right, as contended for, nor that a sound construction of the deed it had this effect.

"The claimants, who maintain otherwise, must take the clause as producing the result either of intestacy in regard to the share of any grandchild predeceasing the term of payment without issue, or giving a right of survivorship in favour of the grandchildren then in life. The first of these views, if maintained, goes far to shew that the general contention is unsound, and, in my opinion, shews that the general rule in favour of vesting should receive effect. The clause refers to the term of payment. Although the words used are 'having received payment,' this cannot, I think, be construed so strictly as to require actual payment, but as referring merely to what the trusters regarded as the term of payment. It is not necessary to determine whether this was the death of the longest liver of Mrs Snell and Mrs Morrison and her husband, for Mrs Snell was the survivor, and it was not until her death that the estate was divided, and three-fifths of it invested for behoof of Mr and Mrs Morrison and their children in fee.

"Having provided that the fee should belong to the grandchildren equally, what the testator by the special clause farther provided was, that if, at the time of payment, which may be taken as the death of Mrs Snell, any grandchild died leaving issue, such issue should have right to their parents' share.

"One view which may be taken of this clause is that it strengthens the effect of vesting a morte testatoris, because it shews the intention of the trusters to give each grandchild and his family his own share, and that the true meaning of the clause is that if any grandchild should die without otherwise disposing of his share and leave issue his issue should be substituted to him. That view is taken of a somewhat similar provision by certain of the Judges in the case of Foulis, Feb. 3, 1857, 19 D. 362. I am not, however, disposed so to construe the clause in the present case, for it appears to me to involve the necessity of supplying of words by implication after the words 'without having received payment of his or her share,' such as 'and without having otherwise disposed of such share;' and I do not think there is any warrant for implying such words. On the other hand, if the natural meaning be given to the words actually used, and no more, viz., that in the case of any particular grandchild dying before the term of payment, leaving issue, the issue of such child shall take, this will not affect the case of children predeceasing the term of payment but dying out issue, and the representatives of such children, either legally or by the deeds of conveyance, would take the shares of such children, and there would be no intestacy. This was the view which received effect in the case of Maxwell v. Wylie, where legacies were left subject to a liferent to nephews of the testator, or 'to the child or children of such of them as may have deceased at that time.' In that case, which I regard as a direct authority on the question, it was held that the legacy had vested in Adam Wylie, one of the nephews who predeceased the liferenters leaving no issue. The view that the bequests would lapse in the case of children dying before the term of payment

No. 108.

Mar. 20, 1877.
Snell's
Trustees v.
Morrison, &c.

About leaving issue might, without any extravagant supposition, have involved intestacy as to the whole residue; for it is quite conceivable that, in the interval between 1848 and 1874, when Mrs Snell died, the grandchildren might have died without issue. If the ordinary rule received effect this possible result was excluded, and in determining what was the true intention of the testator that consideration is, in my opinion, of considerable importance.

If, on the other hand, it be maintained not only that no vesting took place at Mrs Snell's death, but that the right to the fee of the whole residue then vested in the children who survived that event, I think the language of the deed does not support this view. There is no clause of survivorship directly implying such a right; there are no words to the same effect, such as have occurred in many cases, as where the direction to pay at the expiry of a life interest is in favour of the then surviving children or grandchildren. The case of Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, 3 Macph. 1143 (38 Scot. Jur. 95), was obviously of this kind. It was clear, taking the deed as a whole, that the provision which was the subject of the decision was in favour of children surviving the death of the life-tenant. It was substantially so expressed in the deed, and this was the ground of judgment. The parties here propose in effect to insert similar words; but their ground for this is the provision in favour of the children of a grandchild who might predecease the term of payment. I cannot give to that clause any such effect. I am of opinion that by the earlier clauses of the deed the testator gave the right of fee to each of the children of Mrs Morrison in life at his death, subject to the annuity and life interests, the term of payment being therefore postponed; but the right so given was not an absolute fee, but was a right which might be defeated in one event, but in one event only, viz. the death of the grandchild before the term of payment, leaving issue. That event did not occur in the case of any of the children, and I therefore hold that the right of fee, although for a time defeasible in the case of each child, in the result became absolute.

This conclusion is, I think, the result of giving to the language of the deed its fair and natural meaning. I see no reason against holding a fee to vest, not an absolute and indefeasible, but subject to the contingency of its being defeated in favour of issue by death before a certain date. A similar result occurs in the case of vesting in children as a class, where it is provided that the first born children shall have a share. A right of fee in the whole provision is in the child first born, subject only to its being partially defeated by the birth of future children, and as each child comes into existence there is a corresponding restriction of the extent of the fee which was previously vested in the first child. So, where it is provided that if any one of a set of beneficiaries should succeed to a certain fortune or estate during the subsistence of a life interest he should lose his right to a testamentary provision, the right which had vested absolutely, but defeasible, and on the event occurring is defeated in favour of others. It has been repeatedly said in the judgments on questions of construction in Scotch cases in the House of Lords that as the expressed intention of the testator is the determining element, where the language used is not technical, the decisions in one part of the kingdom on such questions may often be equally referred to in another. In this view, it is not unimportant to observe that in cases where questions similar to the present have arisen in England, vesting has been held to take place subject only to the right being defeated on the occurrence of the event fixed by the testator—See Gray v. Garman, 2 Hare, 268, and other cases cited in note (m) on p. 1259 of Williams on Executors, 7th ed.; and in re Wilmott's Trusts, 1869, L. R. Equity Cases, vol. vii. p. 532. Indeed, even where a bequest to persons at the expiry of a life interest is preceded by a clause of survivorship or gift over, if there be no person in life at the term of distribution or payment to whom the clause of survivorship or gift applies, the representatives of the original legatees take the legacy on the same principle, and there is nothing in the dicta of the Judges in the case of Roberts v. Robertson which conflicts with this view, which has, in my opinion, been resumed or implied intention of the testator to support it."

SUMMER SESSION.

No. 109. ANTHONY HARRIS AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Guthrie Smith—Kirkpatrick.
HAYWOOD GAS COAL COMPANY, Defenders.—Pearson.

May 12, 1877.
Harris, &c. v.
Haywood Gas
Coal Co.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clerk.
I.

Process—Reclaiming Note—Lodging in Process.—Harris and others, having reclaimed against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, duly boxed their reclaiming note upon the box-day, but owing to a misunderstanding on the part of their agents' clerk the principal copy of the reclaiming note was not lodged in process at the Register House until the day after the box-day.

These facts having been stated to the Court in the Single Bills, and the respondents not objecting, the cause was sent to the roll in the ordinary course.

T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 110. HELEN DUNN WALKER, Pursuer and Appellant.—Mair.
JOHN REID, Respondent.—Lang.

May 12, 1877.
Walker v.
Reid.

Process—Appeal—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71—A. S. 10th March 1870—Omission to lodge Prints in time.—In an appeal from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints within fourteen days after the process had been received by the Clerk of Court, as required by sec. 3, sub-sec. 1, of A. S. March 10, 1870, the agent having by mistake, as the day for lodging fell in vacation, lodged them on the box-day instead. An objection having been taken by the respondent to the competency, the Court, in the circumstances, overruled the objection, and sent the case to the roll.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

HELEN DUNN WALKER appealed against an interlocutor of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 8th March 1877, and the process was transmitted to the Clerk of Court on 12th March.

The prints, which, under the provisions of the Act of Sederunt of 16th March 1870,* were due upon 26th March, were not lodged until 5th April, being the first box-day in the spring vacation. When the case appeared in the Single Bills the respondent objected to the appeal being sent to the roll, upon the ground that as the prints were not lodged in time the appellant must, in terms of the 1st sub-section of section 3 of the Act of Sederunt be held "to have abandoned his appeal." It was contended that the 3d sub-section of section 3 of the Act of Sederunt† provided

* "III. That the course of proceeding prescribed by the 71st section of said statute shall be altered to the following extent and effect:—(1) The appellant shall, during session, within fourteen days after the process has been received by the clerk of Court, print and box the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, unless, within eight days after the process has been received by the clerk, he shall have obtained an interlocutor of the Court dispensing with printing in whole or in part; in which case the appellant shall only print and box, as aforesaid, those papers, the printing of which has been dispensed with; and, if printing has been in whole dispensed with, shall lodge with the Clerk of Court a manuscript copy of the note of appeal, furnishing another copy to the clerk of the Lord President of the Division: And if the appellant shall fail, within the said period of fourteen days, to print and box, and lodge and furnish the papers required as aforesaid, he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal and shall not be entitled to insist therein, except as hereinafter provided."

† "(3) It shall be lawful for the appellant, within eight days after the ap-ans of remedying any mistake which might have been committed in No. 110.

 ing the prints, and the appellant having failed to take advantage of s was precluded from any other recourse. Reference was made to the ^{May 12, 1877.}
 e of Park v. Weir, in the First Division.¹ ^{Walker v.}
^{Reid.}

It was stated for the appellant that as the day for lodging the prints in vacation the appellant's agent had concluded that the box-day was proper day for lodging, and he had acted accordingly.

ORD GIFFORD.—I am always inclined to give the fullest effect to an Act of erunt, and to carry it out and enforce it according to its terms, but its true et must always be looked to. The object of this Act of Sederunt, and of provisions which are now in question, was to put an end in a summary to appeals taken merely for the purpose of delay, and intended only to hang ases, without any intention of seriously trying the questions raised. Accord-y, when it appears that an appeal has been taken not merely to gain time with the true object of obtaining the judgment of this Court on a serious tion, I should be very loath to let a mere accident—the omission of a forty only, through mistake—prevent that judgment being obtained. The er also at stake might be of great value; and it is most undesirable that w should be excluded by an accidental failure to comply with a mere ordinary actions in this Court if a reclaiming note is by some accident not ously lodged a remedy is provided for interlocutors which have become final mistake, and the party is not deprived of his legal right of review. I think ower of giving such relief in cases of accidental failure to comply with the of Sederunt must always inhere in the Court.

um therefore disposed, in this case, to depart from the exact terms of the of Sederunt in order to get at its spirit, and to hold that this appellant has et all right to get this judgment reviewed.

ee a distinction between the case of Park v. Weir, quoted to us, and this

There the process had been retransmitted to the Sheriff Court. It was lly and altogether at an end, and could not well be brought back, and the ly, if any, would probably be by a reduction; but here the case is still e us, though the paper was boxed on the box-day, and it is in consequence it that this question now arises. The case is clearly a special one, and as I think we may exercise our discretion and send it to the roll.

RD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and very clearly so. In the case ich we were referred—Park v. Weir, in the First Division—the Court did e fit in the circumstances, which were no doubt fully before them, to allow arty to proceed with his appeal, and one feature which, I should think, pro-contributed to that result, was the fact that the clerk had retransmitted een held to be abandoned as aforesaid, to move the Court during session, e Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills during vacation, to repon him, to ffect of entitling him to insist in the appeal; which motion shall not be ed by the Court or the Lord Ordinary except upon cause shewn, and upon conditions as to printing, and payment of expenses to the respondent, or wise, as to the Court or the Lord Ordinary shall seem just."

Park v. Weir, Oct. 15, 1874, reported only in 12 Scot. Law Rep. 11; but bservations of the Lord President upon this report in Young v. Brown, Feb.
 875, ante, vol. ii. 456.

No. 110. the process to the inferior Court on the footing that the appeal had been ad-
 — doned and fallen, and that he had done so in time to enable the appellant May 12, 1877. take his remedy on that footing. The exact stage of the cause in which Walker v. Reid. appeal was taken I do not know.

It must always be in the power of the Court to do justice in any case of kind, and relieve a party of so severe a penalty, following on so critical instruction of what, after all, is only a rule of Court laid down by the Court its own guidance, with notice to parties and practitioners. We may, as tateously and wholesomely, make stern regulations in order to check any taken merely for delay or other improper purpose, but it is a strong thing to that, by any words of ours in an Act of Sederunt, we preclude ourselves doing what we think justice in any particular case, and that the accidental harmless delay, it may be of a day or an hour, will make a judgment final is by the law of the land subject to review. The enactment that any however inconsiderable, and unattended with harm or inconvenience, shall deprive a party of the review to which he is entitled by law, and without power in the Court to grant him relief, is legislation as distinguished from rule of Court to govern procedure. I do not so construe this Act of Sederunt.

In this case, where the appeal was lodged and boxed on the box-day, and harm has been done to any one, I think it would be oppressive to throw the appeal on the construction of the Act of Sederunt for which the respondent contends.

If it could be shewn that there was anything wrong behind the omission of this formality I might be prepared to give effect to the penalty. As it have not yet held the appeal to have been departed from, and being now to do so I am not, in the exercise of my discretion, prepared to assent to motion. On the contrary, I agree with Lord Gifford, and think the case be sent to the roll on the appellant's motion.

LORD ORMDALE.—I am not dissatisfied with the result your Lordships arrived at, but, at the same time, I must take leave to say I am not prepared to concur in all the views which have been expressed by Lord Young. On the contrary, I am now, and will always be, ready to give effect to the Act of Sederunt passed by all the Judges in conformity with powers conferred on them by Acts of Parliament. Apart from this, however, I am disposed to think there is sufficient in the circumstances of this case to enable me to get over precedent of Park v. Weir, and the terms of the Act of Sederunt. The present is a peculiar case; the fourteen days allowed for lodging the paper ran past session and partly in vacation, and that circumstance appears to have given not unnaturally, to some misapprehension. Therefore, and as it has not suggested that anything improper was intended, and as the process is now this Court, in place of having been sent back to the Sheriff Court, as it to have been done in Park v. Weir, I feel myself able to concur in the decision at which your Lordships have arrived. The objection to the competency the appeal will therefore be repelled, and the case sent to the roll.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

The case was sent to the roll.

JAMES WILSON, Solicitor.—MACRAE & FLETT, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN FARQUHAR DICKSON AND LORD DALHOUSIE, Petitioners and Appellants.—Kinnear—Mackintosh.

ROBERT GRAHAM, Respondent.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 111.

May 12, 1877.
Dickson, &c. v.
Graham.

Case—Sheriff—Summary Petition—A. S. July 10, 1839, sec. 137.—A tenant bound by his lease to leave his farm buildings, &c. in good repair, or to pay their being put in repair at the sight of a person to be appointed by the sheriff. Three months and a-half after Martinmas 1875, when the lease expired, the landlord presented a petition in the Sheriff Court praying for authority to execute the necessary repairs at the sight of a person to be appointed by the Court. Held that the petition was not incompetent by reason of the delay otherwise.

JOHN FARQUHAR DICKSON as tenant and Lord Dalhousie as proprietor of the farm of Pitskelly, in Forfarshire, presented upon 8th March 1876 a petition in the Sheriff Court against Robert Graham, formerly tenant of the farm of Pitskelly under a lease which expired at Martinmas 1875. The petition set forth that Graham was bound in terms of his lease "to maintain and uphold the whole buildings, fences, gates, and drains on the farm in good order and complete repair during the currency of the lease, and to leave them in that state at the expiry thereof; and if he should fail or delay to do so, then the proprietor should be entitled to execute the necessary repairs himself at the sight of any party to be appointed by the Sheriff. The petition further set forth that Graham had failed to put the house, &c. in repair when he left, and they therefore requested the Sheriff to "authorise the petitioners to execute the work necessary for putting the said buildings, fences, gates, and drains in good order and complete repair, as required by the said lease, at the sight of some person to be appointed by your Lordship, and to decern against the respondent for the expense thereof, together with the expense of this petition, &c.

Graham lodged answers, and a record was made up.

The petitioners stated that upon 5th November 1875 Lord Dalhousie's agents had procured a report from a Mr Maclaren, architect in Dundee, as to the state of the house and other buildings, &c. at that date, and that a copy of this report (which brought out "the total estimated cost of carrying out the stipulations of the lease" as £66) was on 9th November sent to Graham by Lord Dalhousie's agents, with a request that the work should be proceeded with at once; that to this communication Graham had made no reply, and the work was not done.

Graham averred that he had left the farm in a good state of repair, and that any dilapidations now apparent had been caused by the petitioner's neglect in the course of his tenancy. He pleaded, inter alia;—1. The respondent not having been brought tempestivè, it is now incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. 1/2. The petition is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. 2. The action is incompetent, in respect (1) the respondent has fulfilled all obligations incumbent on him; (2) the petitioner's possession of the farm, and the buildings and fences thereon, without objection, and used, and has continued to use, the same without making complaint until nearly four months after he took possession; and (3) the objects referred to in the petition have been dilapidated by the petitioner's neglect since he took possession.

On 5th May 1876 the Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the petition, and decerns, reserving to the petitioner, or either of them, to take such other action in the premises as

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-farshire.
R.

No. 111. may be competent, and to the respondent his defences thereto as cords," &c.*

May 12, 1877.
Dickson, &c. v.
Graham.

The petitioners appealed to the Sheriff (Maitland-Heriot), who, on 1 June, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, reserving all pleas of part and allowed, "before answer, the petitioners to execute the works necessary for putting the buildings, fences (excluding hedges), and gates in good order and complete repair at the sight of Robert Blackadder, architect, Dundee."

Mr Blackadder reported first on 18th September, and finally on 1 November 1876, when the work was completed. The total expenditure was £122, 7s.

The Sheriff-substitute made avizandum with the reports and with process to the Sheriff, who, on 4th December 1876, dismissed the petition, reserving to the petitioners any other action which might be competent, and finding no expenses due.†

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session, and argued:—The landlord's agents having given the outgoing tenant notice of the repairs had procured, and having called upon him to execute the necessary work, were, in the absence of any intimation from him, entitled to expect he would proceed with the repairs, and were bound to give him a reasonable time to complete them. This accounted for the delay in presenting the petition. The farm having been regularly inspected before the tenant left, it would be easy now to ascertain the state it was in then—in very little more than Mr Maclaren's report was required.

* "NOTE.—Of the competency of this summary application, had it been presented at or within a few days after Martinmas, at which term the respondent gave up, and Mr Dickson entered into possession, and by the state of matters which the respondent's liabilities fall of course to be determined, there could not, I think, have been no question, but I am very clearly of opinion that, precisely as it was three and a half months after Martinmas, it came too late, and now the landlord's only remedy is an action of damages. Observe what I am asked to do? I am asked to decern against the respondent for the cost of putting the buildings, &c., as they stand now, in complete repair. quomodo constat that the buildings, &c., are in the same condition now as they were at Martinmas. Unless that could be assumed, or was proved, my decree would obviously be an unjust one; but no such assumption can fairly be made, and, as for proof, it is only necessary to look at the petition to see that the repairs contemplated is of the most summary character, and that my decree, if made, its disposal were intended to be purely ministerial, confined to nominating an inspector and giving decree for the cost of the repairs as reported by him. On this short ground, viz., that in the circumstances it has ceased to be an appropriate remedy, I must dismiss the petition."

† "NOTE.—The Sheriff can find no materials in process for coming to a summary or summary decision. Mr Maclaren reckoned at Martinmas that it would take time to fulfil the respondent's obligations under the tack.

"In August following it has cost double that amount, or upwards of £120, to put things to rights. In such circumstances the Sheriff finds it impossible to decern against the respondent for payment of this £120, when the petitioner's own valuator estimated in November that £66 only would be needed to put the farm in good order, standing, &c. in order. It would rather appear that between November and August about £66 of further damage had been done by the petitioner. But then, it may be said, why not give decree for the £66 as fixed by Mr Maclaren? The petitioners have since departed from part of their demand so far as the fences and ditches were concerned, and the respondent, since Mr Maclaren's report was made up, had executed some repairs. The Sheriff therefore finds it impossible in this process to determine what precise amount should be paid by the respondent."

argued for Graham ;—Although the application was a competent one it is clear that it had been too long delayed, and it was no longer possible to ascertain the true state of the buildings, &c. as at Martinmas 1875.¹

No. 111.
—
May 12, 1877.
Dickson, &c. v.
Graham.

ORD ORMDALE.—I must say I see no difficulty in giving the required ass in the present process. It is true there was a delay of three or four days after the termination of the respondent's lease before the landlord presented his petition, and that may have given rise to some difficulty in ascertaining what the respondent, as outgoing tenant, was to be answerable for in regard to repairs. But I do not think that for this or any other reason legitimately urged in the case we are called on to dismiss a petition which has been dependent for many months in the Sheriff Court. It would be very unfortunate if we were obliged to do so after all the time which has been lost, and the expense which has been incurred.

The delay in presenting the petition should in reality have caused the respondent as outgoing tenant little or no inconvenience, because on the 9th of November, a couple of days before the term of Martinmas 1875, the report by Mr Maclaren was sent to him. No doubt that was an ex parte inquiry on behalf of the landlord and by his man of skill, but the tenant neither objected to it at the time, or, so far as is shewn, took the precaution of employing a man of skill to examine the premises for himself. In these circumstances the tenant was no more to blame than any one else. He had been put upon his inquiry, and he ought to have brought the matter at once to a conclusion, if that in itself had been his object. I can therefore have no sympathy with the tenant in this case, for if he has to suffer he has himself wholly and solely to blame.

It has, however, been argued that it is impossible now to give the necessary ass under the prayer of this petition, as it merely asks for an inspection and by a man of skill. But that is a mistake; the prayer of the petition is to the effect that what may be found requiring repair may be put right at the time by a man of skill, as stipulated in the lease, but it must, of course, be first ascertained whether anything and what, requires repair, a matter which is apparently left to the Court to be done in any way the Court might consider proper. I should think, therefore, very little more will be necessary than the ass of Mr Maclaren, supplemented by his evidence and the evidence of the persons who executed the repairs, and any others who knew the condition of the premises at the term of Martinmas 1875. All this may surely be easily obtained, and will be sufficient to enable the Sheriff to arrive at a satisfactory result. The conclusion, therefore, I have arrived at is, that the interlocutors complained of ought to be recalled, and a remit made to the Sheriff to proceed with a necessary inquiry, failing the parties themselves coming to a settlement without more litigation,—a course I have strongly to recommend them to adopt.

GIFFORD.—I think the Sheriff-principal's first interlocutor is right, inasmuch as he holds that the original application was not incompetent. In other respects he is held, and I think quite rightly held, that the lapse of time after the application did not make the petition to get the houses and fences put in a proper repair too late, and therefore incompetent. Now, if the original petition was proper and competent at the time when it was presented I do not

¹ Baird v. Mount, July 3, 1874, ante, vol. i., 1119.

No. 111. think that anything has happened since that date to make the proceeding incompetent now. It must be competent still. Of course some inquiry may be required to ascertain and fix the state of matters at the date of removal. But this inquiry may be made perfectly well in this process, as well as in any other or any new process, and justice can easily be done in the present action.

May 12, 1877.
Dickson, &c. v.
Graham.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and if I add a few words it is only to express my surprise and regret that a very simple matter should have met with such obstruction in the Sheriff Court.

The respondent was a tenant for nineteen years of a farm on the Panmure estate. The lease terminated at Martinmas 1875, and contained provisions that the tenant should leave the buildings, fences, gates, and drains, in good repair, and that if he failed to do so the proprietor should be entitled to execute the necessary repairs at his expense at the sight of any one appointed by the Sheriff.

On 5th November preceding the term of expiry of the lease the landlord, with foresight and propriety sent a man of skill to inspect the buildings, fences, gates, and report on their condition. He did so, and specified minutely all that was wrong in house, fences, gates, and drains. The landlord sent that report on 9th November to the tenant, who, in answer, simply denied all liability. The matter was then allowed to lie over for three months, which was not a great delay in the circumstances, and then this application was made to the Sheriff.

The Sheriff-substitute, on a view with which I have no sympathy, dismissed the petition, saying that in his opinion an action of damages would have been preferable to a petition to enforce the provisions of the lease.

The Sheriff on appeal sustained the competency of the petition, and allowed the repairs to be executed at the sight of a person named by himself.

The repairs were executed, and cost upwards of £120, a sum, no doubt, greatly in excess of the approximate estimate supplied to the landlord by the man sent to the tenant. Then the Sheriff finds he can do nothing in the process to determine how much of this the tenant is to pay, and dismisses the petition. I cannot appreciate the difficulty. If the petition could be sustained at all, and I think it was properly entertained, it could be ascertained the process following on it how much the tenant was to pay, as well as the process following on a new action.

I am surprised that an application by a landlord to have repairs executed should be the subject of such legal difficulty. It seems to me such an application might be presented, investigated, and concluded in, at longest, a few days and at inconsiderable cost to the parties. I entirely concur in the Sheriff's judgment finding the procedure competent, and recalling the last interlocutor and remitting to the Sheriff to proceed.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Repel the first and second pleas for the respondent in the inferior Court: Remit the Sheriff to direct such inquiry as may be necessary to enable him to ascertain to decern for the expense of the repairs which have been executed, so far as the same were rendered necessary by the state of the buildings at the time of repair in which they were left by the respondent at Martinmas 1875, and to proceed in the case as shall be just: Find the respondent liable in the expenses," &c.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM JOHNSTON AND ANOTHER, Petitioners and Appellants.—

No. 112.

*Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.*JOHN WHITE, Respondent.—*Moncreiff.*May 18, 1877.
Johnston, &c.

v. White.

Property—Common Property—Common Interest.—The proprietor of a dwelling-house consisting of four stories, one of which was a sunk story with area in front, converted the street flat into a shop and the two flats above into separate dwelling-houses. He sold the upper flats to one person, giving right in common with the other proprietors to the area on which the same stands. He afterwards sold to a different person the street and area flats "with right in common with the other proprietors of the tenement, of which the subjects hereby disposed form part, to the solum of the ground on which the same built." Held that the area in front of the shop belonged to the proprietor of the shop, and that the upper proprietor had only a right of common interest in the area, and could not prevent buildings being erected thereon except on the ground of injury to his property.

A dwelling-house bounded on the east by Nicolson Street and on the north by Nicolson Square, Edinburgh, consisting of four stories, one of which was a sunk story with an area in front, was altered by the proprietor about the year 1843 by converting the street flat into a shop and the two upper flats into separate dwelling-houses. The whole tenement continued to be treated as one property till it was acquired by the trustees of William Darling. Darling's trustees, by disposition dated 12th and recorded in the Register of Sasines 15th May 1871, conveyed the two upper flats which had been converted into separate dwelling-houses, "and also a right in common with the other proprietors to the area on which the same stands," to John White. By disposition, dated 24th May and recorded in the Register of Sasines 7th July 1871, Darling's trustees conveyed the shop, &c., to D. S. Reddie (who was the author of William and John Johnston) under the following description:—"All and Whole that shop No. 47 Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, in the parish of Saint Cuthberts and county of Edinburgh, containing of a front shop having an entrance from Nicolson Street and an access from Nicolson Square, with the cellarage below and in the area, other premises attached, presently used as saloons and stores, and all presently occupied by Stephenson Reid, spirit merchant, with right in common with the other proprietors of the tenement of which the subjects hereby disposed form part, to the solum of the ground on which the same built, and whole rights, pertinents, and privileges belonging to the subjects hereby disposed."

William and John Johnston presented a petition to the Magistrates (exercising the jurisdiction of Dean of Guild beyond the royalty) for authority to cover the area by extending their shop as far as the north side of the area, calling as respondents John White, the proprietor of the three stories, and the City Chamberlain, for the public interest. The City Chamberlain did not appear. John White opposed the prayer of the petition, on the ground that he had a right of common property in the area, and was entitled to prevent any building being placed upon it.

The Bailie (Muirhead) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the titles of the two parties, the area in question is common property, and that the petitioners are not entitled to build over it without respondent's consent: Therefore dismisses the petition," &c.

The petitioners appealed.

It was admitted by both parties in the argument that there was a gate or railing of the area from the street, but that the only access to the area was obtained through the kitchen flat, as there was no stair leading from the door in the railing. The petitioners maintained that at

No. 112. one time there had been a stair. The respondent maintained that no such stair ever existed.

May 18, 1877.
Johnston, &c.
v. White.

Argued for the petitioners ;—The right of the petitioners to the area was an absolute right. At all events the right of the respondent was only one of common interest, and in order to prohibit the petitioners' alteration he must prove injury to his property, and no injury was averred¹.

Argued for the respondent ;—He had obtained his disposition from the common author before the disposition of the petitioners, and was entitled to all that the common author had not reserved. In the disposition granted to the respondent a right of common property was given to him in the area, and this referred not only to the ground on which the house was built but to the area in front of it. The rights given were similar, whatever the one had the other had. Therefore the rights were both common property. But even if the respondent's right was only one of common interest the petitioners were not entitled to injure his property by building on the area.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The tenement to which this question refers was originally built as a dwelling-house, and was at the south-east corner of Nicolson Square fronting both Nicolson Square and Nicolson Street. It was converted to other purposes some time ago—at what time does not precisely appear—and the ground floor and the sunk flat came to be occupied as a shop with storage and cellars, and the upper floors as separate dwelling-houses. The petitioners here are proprietors of the shop and sunk floor along with the area and cellars, and the respondent is proprietor of the upper floors. The proposal of the petitioners is to project the shop-front outwards to the wall of the area. To this the respondent objects, and his objection in the Magistrates' Court was based on this, that he was the common proprietor of the area over which the petitioners proposed to build. The magistrates have sustained that plea, and have found that, "according to the titles of the two parties, the area in question is common property, and that the petitioners are not entitled to build over it without the respondent's consent." The question raised before us is whether this is correct in law, or whether the right that the respondent has is a right of common interest and not a common property. I am of opinion that, on the authorities, the decided cases, the respondent has not a right of common property, but merely a common interest. The right of property in this story and the area is in the petitioners, subject to the common interest of the respondent. The question of that will be to recall the operative part of the Magistrates' order dismissing the petition, and it will then be for the Magistrates to proceed on the ground that the right is a right of common interest, and they will still have to determine whether the proposed operations are injurious to the respondent's interest. It is to be ascertained that there must be an investigation, which must be made by the Magistrates, and as there is no averment of injury to the respondent's property, the plea to that effect, in order to lead to investigation the record must be set up and some such averment and plea introduced. That may be done in this Court or it may be remitted to the Magistrates to do so.

LORD DEAS.—The property in dispute is admittedly situated in a town.

¹ Bell's Prin. secs. 1071, 1075, 1086; Ersk. 2, 9, 11; Anderson v. Duff, June 20, 1799, M. 12,831; Murray v. Gullan, March 10, 1825, 3 M. 100; Stewart v. Blackwood, Feb. 3, 1829, 7 S. 362, 1 Scot. Jur. 55; G. Arrol, March 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 592, 35 Scot. Jur. 360; Urquhart v. Macph. 1853, 16 D. 307, 26 Scot. Jur. 137; Taylor v. Dunlop, Nov. 11 Macph. 25, 45 Scot. Jur. 24; Brown v. Boyd, July 13, 1841, 3 D.

the burgh in which there is no Dean of Guild, and in which, consequently, the Magistrates are entitled to exercise the jurisdiction of that officer. It is unfortunate that in the Court below the attention of the Magistrates in exercising that jurisdiction was confined to the question whether the right of the upper proprietor in the front area was one of pro indiviso property without entering into the alternative question whether it was a right of common interest. I think the point at issue, properly speaking, did not relate to the front area separately, but to the area of the whole tenement. Before considering that point, however, it is necessary to attend to the history of that tenement.

It consisted originally from top to bottom of a dwelling-house. Some thirty more years ago the proprietor of the dwelling-house converted the street floor to a shop, and the sunk floor, which had been the kitchen story, into a store for goods. In the course of that occupation, although he left the area gate and ling, he took away the area stair, so that entrance to the area and cellars under pavement could only be got from the interior of what had been the kitchen flat. This state of occupancy still continued when on 12th May 1871 the proprietor of the whole tenement conveyed the two flats or stories above the shop to the author of the respondent, White, who formed an access to them by a common stair in the usual manner. Infestment followed on this conveyance, and was registered 15th May same year. On 24th May 1871 the same proprietor conveyed the shop and sunk story (which he had retained) to the author of the petitioners Johnston, who recorded their conveyance by way of infestment on the 1st of July following. There was nothing special in either conveyance to affect the question as to the front area.

The respondent White's titles convey to him the two upper stories of the tenement, being the corner house on the south-east side of said square, high and back and fore, "and also a right in common with the other proprietors to the area on which the same stands." I do not think it matters much whether we take this to mean the whole area or the front area only. The words do not necessarily nor even prima facie imply a pro indiviso right of property, and there is nothing in the context to authorise us to put upon them that construction as the Magistrates have done. The terms of the respondent's titles are such, I think, as to confer upon him a common interest in the whole area (front area included) along with the other proprietors of the tenement, but nothing more. This, however, does not bring us to the end of the case, for a common interest of a proprietor of one floor of a tenement may be such as to entitle him to oblige alterations materially injurious to him in another floor of the tenement. The question to be decided on the merits will be whether that is so here? We have a full discussion, recently, on a question of this sort in the case of Kemys v. White, where it was proposed to build on the front area of the house No. 9 Castle Street. It appeared to have been by no means unusual for such things to be done in Edinburgh, but no instance was referred to where the party making the alteration had not either been proprietor of the whole tenement or had secured the acquiescence of the proprietors of the upper floors. We remitted twice to the Mr Bryce, architect. He reported, in the first instance, that the proposed alterations of executing the alterations would be attended with danger, and that, when completed, they would deteriorate the value of the upper floors. Under the second remission he reported that various suggestions had been assented to which would mitigate the risk of danger—but he indicated no change of opinion as to the deteriorating effect of the change upon the value of the upper floors. In that state of matters I do not think any of us were prepared to sanction the alteration

No. 112.

May 18, 1877.

Johnston, &c.

v. White.

No. 112. without further consideration, and my own impression certainly was against doing so. The parties, however, settled the case before judgment, and on 13th March last the case was taken out of Court by an interlocutor concerted between them. In that case there was to be a substantial building capable of being continued upwards by the proprietor of the floors above if so inclined. Here the proposed erection is to be chiefly of wood and glass, over which it has not been shewn that any substantial building could be carried up. Such an alteration as this, it is obvious may materially affect the value of the upper flats. I agree with your Lordship that the record as framed does not properly raise the question of deterioration. But I agree at the sametime that the respondent White has a right of common interest in the whole area which entitles him to raise that question, and that the case should therefore be remitted to the Magistrates to deal with it on that footing after the record has been amended either here or in the inferior Court.

May 18, 1877.
Johnston, &c.
v. White.

LORD MURE.—I concur. I am not surprised that the Magistrates should have come to the conclusion that the right of the proprietor of the upper flat was one of common property, as the titles seem to give more than a right of common interest. But I have come to think that their right is only one of common interest, and not of common property.

LORD SHAND.—The result of the authorities is that unless there be something special in the title-deeds the proprietor of the ground story has a right of property in the solum, while the right of the other proprietors of the tenement in the solum is one of common interest. But assuming that to be so it has been intended that the titles of the upper floors here gave a right in the solum of common interest only but of common property. I concur with Lord Macdonald thinking that there was considerable ground for maintaining that the very terms of the deeds gave the upper proprietors the higher right. But I have come to the conclusion that the titles have not the effect of altering the common law rights of the parties. No doubt you have the words "a right in common with the other proprietors to the area on which the same stands." The "right in common" here mentioned is not in terms described as a right of property, and must, I think, be held to refer only to that interest which the upper proprietors usually have in the solum in common with the right of property in the owner of the ground floor.

If the right had been one of common property the appellants would have been precluded from making the proposed alterations on the area without the respondent's consent, on the ground that these involved a direct interference with the right of common property. It does not follow, even though the right of the upper proprietor be one of common interest only, that the appellants cannot make these alterations. It remains to be seen whether the operations would injure the property above, or would materially interfere with its comfort or use. I should be disposed to hold that there would be injury such as will entitle the upper proprietor to prevent what is proposed to be done. I concur in the view that it is desirable to have an amendment in order to bring out this point, and that a plea founded on the common interest of the upper proprietor, and the injury to that right.

The respondent was allowed to put in an amendment to the effect that the proposed alterations would injure his property, and a plea that the parties having a common interest in the area the petitioners should not be allowed to execute operations which would be injurious to the upper

THE COURT then pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Magistrates of 25th August 1876: Find that the area in question is not the common property of the petitioners and the respondent, but that it is the property of the petitioners, subject to a right of common interest in the respondent: Allow the respondent to add to the record the averment and plea in law now proposed; and the same having been made at the bar, hold the same as part of the record, and remit to the Magistrates to proceed farther in the matter of the petition as shall be just and consistent with the above finding: Find the appellants entitled to the expenses incurred by them in this Court; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report."

No. 112.

May 18, 1877.
Johnston, &c.
v. White.

KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—JAMES W. MONCREIFF, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES RANKINE AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Asher—Keir.
RASCHEN AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Scott—Strachan.

No. 113.

May 19, 1877.
Rankine, &c.
v. Raschen, &c.

ip—Reparation—Damages—Limitation of Liability—Collision—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, sec. 54.—Owner of a vessel who is entitled to have his liability for damage caused by collision of his vessel with another restricted under section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, after presenting a petition for such restriction under section 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, is entitled to state a claim as to parties whose claims he has settled extrajudicially before presenting petition, and so limit the ranking of the other claimants.

On 2d November 1874 the steamship "Albicore"—the gross register tonnage of which was 365.20 tons, without deduction on account of crew-room—then on a voyage from Grangemouth to Rotterdam, came in collision with the steamship "Aurora," whereby considerable damage was caused to the "Aurora," and to certain portions of her cargo. No loss was occasioned, and the collision occurred without the actual fault or negligence of the owners of the "Albicore."

Some time after a claim was made upon the owners of the "Albicore" by Anthony George Robinson, as representing the owners of the "Aurora," for a large sum in respect of damage sustained by the steamship "Aurora," and to have been caused by the collision. The owners of the "Albicore," Mr Robinson, by an agreement entered into between them on 30th November 1874, referred the question of liability for the sum claimed to Sir John Dick Arrow. The arbiter, on 17th March 1875, issued his award, by which he decided that the steamship "Albicore" was solely in fault for the collision, and awarded the sum of £2115, 15s. 10d. in full discharge of the damage sustained by the owners of the "Aurora." The owners of "Albicore," on the 22d April, thereafter paid to Mr Robinson the sum of £15, 15s. 10d. in settlement of the damage to the "Aurora." Messrs Rankine and others, Glasgow, owners of the "Albicore," presented a petition for the purpose of restricting their liability in respect of damage caused by the collision to £8 per ton of gross tonnage under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514, and the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, sec. 54. The sections are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President.

The petitioners stated—No claim for damage to cargo was made until nine months after the collision, when claims amounting in all to £10s. 10d. were intimated. Messrs Raschen and Company gave in a claim for £1580, 5s. 7d. for damage to cargo, and they raised action in

No. 113. the Court of Session for payment. The amount already paid, £2115, 15s. 10d., by the petitioners to the owners of the "Aurora," with the claims intimated for damage to cargo, amounted to £4535, 16s. 8d. which exceeded the sum the petitioners were liable for at the rate of £8 per registered ton.

May 19, 1877.
Rankine, &c.
v. Raschen, &c.

On 17th June 1876 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Appoint the respondents and all others having or pretending to have any interest in the matter of the petition to lodge claims within eight days from the date of the last advertisement in the newspapers after mentioned, under certification that if they fail to do so they will be excluded from participation in the fund for division; and appoint this deliverance to be advertised once in the 'Scotsman,' 'Glasgow Herald,' 'Times,' 'Daily Telegraph,' and the 'Shipping and Mercantile Gazette' newspapers."

Messrs Raschen and Company lodged a claim for £1580, 5s. 7d. as damage to part of the cargo of the "Aurora," which belonged to them, and they maintained that the amount of damage done to the "Aurora," which had been fixed by arbitration and paid to the owners, should not be taken into account in distributing the amount of damage as ascertained by the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862. Several other persons who had raised actions against the petitioners as owners lodged similar claims.

The petitioners also lodged a claim to be ranked on the fund along with the owners of cargo for £2115, 15s. 10d., being the amount they had paid to the owners of the "Aurora" under the award, with five per cent interest.

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) The statute was intended to favour the wrongdoing ship, and fixed a sum beyond which no damage was recoverable. The petitioners' claim was good in equity, because they had paid to the owners of the "Aurora" the amount of damage due to that ship and were entitled to deduct that in settling with the owners of cargo. At the time they settled with the owners of the "Aurora" there were no claims "apprehended" from owners of cargo. The owners of cargo could not benefit by their delay in intimating their claims. If the claims for damage done to cargo had been intimated at the proper time the petitioners would not have settled with the owners of the "Aurora," and their claim would have gone to diminish the amount of the fund to be divided. (2) The petitioners were entitled to get the benefit of the restriction of liability given to them by the 54th section of the Act of 1862, although they had not adopted the procedure prescribed by the 514th section of the Act of 1854.¹

Argued for Raschen and Company;—(1) The claim of the petitioners was not good, as they had already settled it by paying the amount to the owners of the "Aurora." The statute merely referred to existing claims while the claim of the petitioners had been extinguished. (2) The money paid under the award in the arbitration could not be taken into account. The 514th section of the Act of 1854 settled a mode of procedure, and in order to get the benefit of the restriction of liability it was necessary to follow that procedure. A petition ought to have been presented for restriction of liability before any payment was made.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts of this case are simple. A collision occurred

¹ Miller v. Powell, July 20, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 976; Leycester v. Leycester, Feb. 18, 1857, 26 L. J. Ch. 306; Burrell v. Simpson and Co., Nov. 24, 1857, supra, p. 177.

1 November 1874, by which the steamship "Albicare" ran down the steam- No. 113.
 ip "Aurora," and did damage both to the vessel and to the cargo. There is no loss of life. There is further no allegation of fault or of privity to the ury sustained as against the petitioners, who are the owners of the "Albicare." May 19, 1877.
 erefore the case falls under section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862. Rankine, &c. e owners of the ship "Aurora" very soon after the collision made a claim v. Raaschen, &c.
 inst the owners of the ship "Albicare," and on 30th December, less than months after the collision, this was referred to Sir Frederick Arrow, one of Elder Brethren and Deputy-Master of the Trinity Corporation of Deptford.
 17th March 1875 he issued his award, by which he found that the ship lbicare" was solely in fault, and he awarded the sum of £2115, 15s. 10d. in of all damage sustained by the owners of the "Aurora." No other claimants ing appeared, the owners of the "Albicare" forthwith paid the amount of award. It was not till the 21st of July 1875 that the owners of the cargo e "Aurora" came forward with their present claim, amounting to £2420.
 raised actions against the owners of the "Albicare" for the purpose of rering that claim, and this led the owners of the "Albicare" to present the ion which is now under consideration.

re question comes to be, whether, in distributing the fund, which has been tained under section 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1862 to be 11, 12s., at the rate of £8 per ton, any effect can be given to the claim of wners of the "Aurora," seeing that it has already been paid and exished. The owners of the cargo maintain that the claim of the owners of "Aurora" is entirely out of the way and cannot be founded on, and that fore they are entitled to full payment, which will not extinguish the avail-und. This depends on a very narrow view of this case. It rests upon the ical plea that the claim being extinguished by payment it cannot now be into account in the present case. That plea seems to be inconsistent with the spirit and the letter of the Merchant Shipping Acts, particularly with ct of 1862, which by section 54 alters the corresponding clause of the Act 54 by limiting the liability of the owner of the ship to £8 per ton, whereas tion 514 of the previous statute the limit of liability was the value of the nd freight. In other respects the second statute makes no alteration in ovisions which authorise a petition to be presented of the kind now before t is obvious therefore that the two sections with which we have to deal, e 54th section of the Act of 1862 and the 514th section of the Act of must be read together as if they were parts of the same statute. Taking, first place, the 54th section of the Act of 1862, we find that its provision
 "the owners of any ship shall not" in certain cases "be answerable in es in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other
 . . . to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of ship's e." The words are very precise and strong, omitting the details and nces to which the conditions are applicable. That is an absolute and uned enactment, and it is expressed in negative and imperative words. The
 'the owners of the cargo of the "Aurora" would make the owners of the ore" liable to a greater amount than £8 per ton, and if we can avoid result we are bound upon a construction of the statute to do so.
 difficulty is raised under section 514 of the Act of 1854, which may be a procedure section. I do not think that section creates any real difficulty.
 it provides is—"In cases where any liability has been or is alleged to

No. 113. have been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, loss of or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery, and in Scotland for the Court of Session, and in any British possession for any competent Court, to entertain proceedings in the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability subject as aforesaid, and for the distribution of such amount rateably among the several claimants, with power for any such Court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other Court in relation to the same subject-matter; and any proceedings entertained by such Court of Chancery or Court of Session or other competent Court may be conducted in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the same, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the Court thinks just." This is what may be called a statutory form of procedure, but it is not provided in this clause or anywhere in the statute that the question raised shall not be tried in any other form. The form provided is a simple one and seems to be equivalent to our well-known process of multiplepoinding where there is a competition among claimants to have a fund distributed. The first thing to be ascertained under the statute here is the amount of the fund which the owner is liable. That is what would be called the fund in need of a multiplepoinding. It seems to me that if there had been no such section in the Act the question would have arisen in a multiplepoinding exactly as it does now. The clause is by no means necessary for the administration of the statute. That could have been done quite well without it so far as this case is concerned.

Therefore section 54 of the Act of 1862 remains to be considered independent of section 514 of the Act of 1854. Reverting to that section, as I have already said, it is expressed in negative and imperative words that the owners shall be answerable for more than £8 per ton. Now, it is impossible to give effect to this enactment if we sustain the plea of the owners of the "Aurora's" cargo. The only difficulty they suggest is that the claim of the owners of the "Aurora" is not properly here, and cannot be given effect to. Technically, perhaps, the claim is not here, and cannot be given effect to, as the money has been paid. But if the owner has satisfied and paid the claim, that will not deprive him of the benefit of section 54 of the Act of 1862, and make him liable to a greater extent than £8 per ton. There is nothing in the statute and nothing in common law to lead to such a result.

If the owner holds the fund, which is insufficient to meet the whole claim, and he pays one claimant in full—it may be in ignorance of the other claims—he may be made answerable for the consequences. What are these? Not that a party who makes a claim after such a payment is thereby to get more than he would have got if the holder had raised a multiplepoinding. On the contrary, it is clear to me that the holder of such a fund if he makes a payment in paying one claimant can only be called on afterwards to pay, not the whole amount of the claim, but only to make the balance available after deducting the amount which the claimant whom he has paid in full would have been entitled to receive along with the others. If that is the common law, is not that the position of the owner of the offending ship here? No doubt the fund is provided by himself, and he is not bound to pay it to the claimants, but to

to the hands of the Court for distribution. He is in the position of the holder No. 113.
of a fund or the real raiser in an action of multipointing.

I am therefore of opinion that in the ranking the claimants, the cargo owners, Rankine, &c. are not entitled to get more than they would have got if the owners of the "Albi-v. Raschen, &c. re" had not rashly, but still in perfect good faith, paid away the money to the owners of the "Aurora."

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

A SCHEME having been lodged by which the amount of damage due to each of the claimants was settled the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the petitioners are liable in respect of the collision mentioned in the petition for the sum of £2921, 12s. sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of four per centum per annum from 2d November 1874, the date of said collision, to 25th July 1876, the date of the consignment, and limit the liability of the petitioners as owners of the steamship 'Albicore' accordingly: Discharge the petitioners of all claims against them in respect of said collision; interdict, prohibit, and discharge the present claimants and all others from following forth or bringing any action or suit against the petitioners, and recall all arrestments used in respect of said collision; rank and prefer the whole claimants pari passu on said consigned fund for the respective amounts of their claims, and appoint the petitioners and claimants, Rankine and others, to lodge in process a scheme of division of said fund shewing the amount due to each claimant in respect of the foregoing finding and ranking and preference: Find the claimants, Raschen and Company, &c., liable jointly and severally to the said James Rankine and others in the expenses of this discussion: Modify the same as adjusted by the parties to the sum of £15, 13s. 10d. sterling, and decern."

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—WALLS & SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS VICKERS AND SONS AND MANDATARY, Pursuers and Respondents. No. 114.
—M'Laren.

WILLIAM ROSE NIBLOE, Defender and Appellant.—Dickson.

May 19, 1877.
Vickers & Sons
v. Nibloe.

Sheriff—Decree by Default—Conditions of Reponing.—An action of count reckoning, failing which, for payment of £90, was raised in the Sheriff Court in November 1875. After protracted delays the defender twice failed to appear at diets for his examination as a haver, whereupon decree by default was nately pronounced in January 1877 for the sum of £90 with expenses.
The defender having appealed to the Court of Session, held that the judgment of the Sheriff was properly pronounced, but the defender reponed upon payment of all expenses subsequent to the first prorogation of the time for lodging pleas.

Observations on the delays in Sheriff Court proceedings.

HIS action was raised on 4th November in the Sheriff Court of Wigtonshire by Thomas Vickers and Sons, manure manufacturers, Manchester, against William R. Nibloe, formerly their agent in Stranraer. The summons concluded for count and reckoning, and, in the event of the defender failing to produce the necessary books and vouchers, for payment of £90.
The defender entered appearance, and on 20th January 1876 the Sheriff-Substitute (Rhind) prorogated the period for lodging defences for six days.
The prorogation was twice renewed in February in respect of the illness of the defender's agent.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.
I.

No. 114. On 6th July 1876 the action, which had fallen asleep, was revived on the pursuers' motion, and the parties were appointed to meet next Court day to adjust the record.

May 19, 1877.
Vickers & Sons
v. Nibloe.

On 13th July both parties obtained a diligence for the recovery of writs before closing the record.

On 23d November 1876 a diet for the examination of havers was adjourned till 7th December, in respect that the defender's agent was unable to attend "from family affliction."

No order appeared on the interlocutor sheet of date 7th December.

On 11th January 1877 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the defender has failed to appear at this diet for examination as a haver in curia, in terms of his citation, adjourns the diet for such examination until next Court day, with certification."

On the same day the defender wrote the pursuers' agent:—"Stranraer 11th January 1877.—Dear Sir,—My solicitor being in Edinburgh, it is impossible for me to produce any papers in Vickers' case until he comes home. I need not, therefore, appear as a witness to-day.—Yours," &c.

On 18th January, the defender having again failed to appear at the diet for examination as a haver, the Sheriff-substitute decerned against him by default, for the sum of £90, with expenses.

On appeal the Sheriff (Mark Napier) adhered, adding the subjoined note.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

It was stated for the defender at the bar that he was unable to attend as a haver in consequence of the documents called for being in the hands of his agent, and that he had since employed a new agent.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There can be no doubt that, while the Sheriff Court confer important benefits on the country, the continual delays which occur to them detract much from their usefulness. We have had occasion again and again to remark on these delays, and this case is only a sample of what we have often seen. The action was brought in November 1875. It drags its slow length along until it reaches what is practically the first stage of the inquiry after the lapse of about a year. The pursuers, who sue for the balance of an account, seems to have no vouchers of their own, and accordingly seek to compel the defender to produce certain books and documents. They obtain a diligence against the defender on the 13th July 1876. Nothing seems to have been done until the 23d November, when the defender's agent was unable to appear "from family affliction," and the diet was adjourned. On 11th January 1877 the defender fails to appear at the adjourned diet, and he evidently thinks it quite enough to write on that day to the pursuers' agent—"My solicitor being in Edinburgh, it is impossible for me to produce any papers in Vickers' case until he comes home. I need not, therefore, appear as a witness to-day." On the 11th January, accordingly, the Sheriff-substitute adjourns the diet till the 18th, under certification. The defender again fails to appear on the 18th, and then, with great propriety, the Sheriff-substitute decerns against the defender for the sum sued for, and the Sheriff adheres. I am clearly of opinion that neither the one nor the other could have acted otherwise than he did. But when the case comes here, and we are not so much reviewing the Sheriff's decision

* "NOTE.—This is a gross case of professional delays and continued disobedience of the orders of the Court, and the Sheriff can see no reason for differing from his Substitute in his treatment of the laches."

considering whether we should repon the defender, and if so, on what conditions. If the pursuers had done all they could to secure despatch I should have been very slow to allow the defender, who occasioned the default by his own personal act, to open up the decree. But when laxity has been once introduced into a case we know that it is likely to infect the other party. When nothing was done between July and November the defender naturally thought that he would be allowed to go on in the same way. In the whole circumstances, I am disposed to shut out the defender from maintaining this defence, but this must be on condition that he pays the whole expenses from the date of his default.

No. 114.
May 19, 1877.
Vickers & Sons
v. Nibloe.

LORD ORMDALE.—I concur, and hope that your Lordship's remarks will be recorded, in order that litigants in all parts of the country may know that this Court is determined to do everything in its power to put an end to unwarrantable delays in Sheriff Courts. The only doubt which has occurred to me is whether we should not simpliciter adhere to the Sheriff's judgment. The Sheriff-substitute could not well have acted otherwise than he did, and I am not surprised that the Sheriff should have adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor. In fact I think he was quite right in doing so; and it ought to be understood that we are not now recalling the Sheriff's judgment as in an ordinary process of law. We are merely reponing the defender upon a certain condition as to expenses against the decree by default which has been pronounced against him. The conditions as to expenses suggested by your Lordship may perhaps be sufficient; but I would suggest that the defender should be made liable in expenses from the 20th January 1876, when his intolerable delay commenced, and that our judgment should be so expressed as to make payment of the expenses subsequently incurred by the pursuers, as well in the Sheriff Court as under the present appeal, the condition of the defender being reponed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I adopt Lord Ormidale's suggestion as to the date from which the defender should be found liable in expenses.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur with your Lordships, and with Lord Ormidale's suggestion as to the terms upon which the defender may be reponed against the decree which has been pronounced against him. I wish to say, as strongly as I can, that we do not recall the Sheriffs' interlocutors because we think them wrong. They were perfectly right, and I should not have been surprised if the Sheriff-substitute had taken the step earlier than he did. We recall the interlocutors, not as reviewing them on the merits, but, on the contrary, assuming them to be right and necessarily pronounced, just like decrees in law. We in the circumstances repon the defender, in the exercise of our discretion, against a decree properly and in due course pronounced. I cannot say whether the defender is right or wrong in blaming his agent. If he is right, he will have a claim of relief against him. The Sheriff-substitute certainly did not err on the side of over strictness, but on the side of indulgence.

His interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal, and repon the appellant against the judgment appealed against, but that only upon payment by the appellant to the respondents of the whole expenses incurred in the Sheriff Court since the 20th of January 1876, together with the expenses of the appeal, and remit," &c.

No. 115.

WILLIAM RAIN, Pursuer and Respondent.—*Scott.*WILLIAM GIBB, Defender and Appellant.—*R. Johnstone—Goudy.*May 19, 1877.
Rain v. Gibb.

Process—Appeal for Jury Trial under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40—Follow Cause—A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5—Leave of Sheriff.—Held that an action a Sheriff Court praying for interdict and £5 of damages was one to which the 5th section of the A. S. 11th July 1828 applied, and could not be appealed to jury trial under 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, without leave of the Sheriff.

Observations (per Lord Ormidale) as to the form of declaration contemplated by A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.
1.

WILLIAM RAIN, tenant of the farm of Corbieton, presented a petition to the Sheriff Court of Kirkcudbrightshire against William Gibb, tenant of the adjoining farm of Milton Park, praying the Court "to interdict the defender from flooding or otherwise damaging the pursuer's fields," and for decree for £5 as damage sustained. The flooding was stated by the pursuer to be caused by the overflow of the defender's dam.

The Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) allowed a proof, upon which the defender, being desirous to appeal to the Court of Session in virtue of the Act 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, and the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 7, presented a petition to the Sheriff under A. S. 11th July 1828, sec. 5,* leave to appeal, in respect that the value of the cause did not appear the face of the original petition, stating that he verily believed that the value to him of the cause was more than £40.

The Sheriff-substitute appointed the defender to appear and make solemn declaration as to the value of the matter in dispute.

The defender was put on oath, examined, cross-examined, and re-examined.

The Sheriff-substitute on considering the declaration refused leave to appeal,† to which deliverance the Sheriff (Mark Napier) adhered.

The defender minuted two notes of appeal, one against the Sheriff's judgment refusing leave, and the other in terms of 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, and Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 73, on the footing that the Sheriff's leave was not necessary.

The pursuer objected that the appeals were incompetent.

The defender argued that the Act of Sederunt did not apply to actions ad factum præstandum.¹ Besides, the declaration was not properly taken, the defender having been put on oath, and subjected to an insidious examination by his opponent.

* Quoted by the Lord Justice-Clerk.

† "NOTE.—The deposition of the petitioner is so distinct and candid as to the subject and the value of the cause in question as to render any cross-examination unnecessary. That action is brought to recover the sum of £5 claimed as damages done by overflow of water from this petitioner's dam last winter. The petitioner admits that the remedy asked for to prevent the recurrence of damage could be effected without the removal of the dam; and he also admits that the removal of the dam, and his loss thereby of his water supply, is the only thing that would cause damage to him. That damage is not only positive, but depends on something being done which the original petition does not ask for, and the petitioner says is not required. To say, therefore, that the value of the cause is above the £5 claimed is an insult to common sense, and to allow the cause to go to the Supreme Court on the ground of its being worth £40 in value might justly be looked on as an unparalleled absurdity."

¹ Cases cited at the debate.—Learmonth v. Morton, Jan. 17, 1829, 7 S. 290; Sands v. Meffan, Jan. 20, 1829, 7 S. 290; Hamilton v. Hamilton, March 1877, supra, p. 688.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that this appeal is not competent. No. 115.
 The application is a petition for interdict, with a conclusion for a specific sum of money. The prayer for interdict is in very general terms, "to interdict the defender from flooding or otherwise damaging the pursuer's fields." As far as the petition has a pecuniary value on the face of it that value is £5. What value of the interdict does not appear. Accordingly, the right to appeal must be regulated by sec. 5 of A. S. 11th July 1828, which enacts,—“That if in such cases the claim shall not be simply pecuniary, so that it cannot appear on the face of the bill that it is above £40 in amount, the party intending to sue shall previously apply, by petition, to the Judge in the inferior Court, for leave to that effect, which application shall be intimated to the opposite party or his agent; and the petitioner shall be bound, if required by the Judge, to give his solemn declaration that the claim is of the true value of £40 and upwards; and on such petition being presented, and on such declaration, if required, being made to the satisfaction of the Judge, leave shall be granted to sue.” That was the course which the appellant took in this case. He gave a declaration. He stated the grounds on which he held that his interest in the action was above £40. The Sheriff is dissatisfied with these grounds, and gives the reasons for his dissatisfaction. Now, in the first place, I think the Sheriff had a good deal to say for his refusal of leave. The value of the cause to the appellant is only above £40 on the assumption that there is no remedy for the flooding except the removal of the dam. In the next place, the Sheriff has refused leave to appeal, and therefore a condition of the right to appeal has not been fulfilled.

I do not think that the provisions of the Act of Sederunt apply only to cases where there is a pecuniary demand, and something more. I think they apply to all cases in which the pecuniary value does not appear on the face of the cause, and I do not think that there is any great hardship in requiring a party who wishes to appeal at this stage to satisfy the Sheriff that the cause is of the value of £40.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same conclusion. I observe that in the case of Hamilton v. Hamilton, to which we were referred, the value of the claim was ascertainable ex facie of the proceeding to be above £40. But here the nature or conclusion of the action is not simply pecuniary, and it is impossible to ascertain ex facie of the proceeding the value of the cause. The appellant was fully and sensibly aware that he could not appeal without leave of the Sheriff, and, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, for such leave, but it was refused.

As I am satisfied that leave of the Sheriff was indispensable as a condition precedent of the right to appeal, and as it has not been obtained, there is no objection, in my opinion, but to dismiss the appeal as incompetent.

It was argued, however, that this Court might review the judgment of the Sheriff refusing leave to appeal and finding that leave ought to have been given, and I cannot think we can do so. Although the procedure under the application was before the Sheriff-substitute was not altogether regular—for example, in putting the appellant under oath and allowing him to be cross-examined in the case of merely receiving his declaration—it must be observed that Mr Gibb in objecting to taking any objection to that mode of procedure was himself a party to it. I do not think, therefore, his objections, which are entirely technical, are competent to be reviewed.

May 19, 1877.
Rain v. Gibb.

No. 115. LORD GIFFORD concurred.

May 19, 1877.
Rain v. Gibb.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appeal is incompetent, in respect it is not shewn that the value of the call amounts to the sum of £40: Therefore dismiss the appeal and remit to the Sheriff to proceed farther in the cause: Find the appellant liable in expenses to the respondent, and modify same to £8, 8s., and decern."

W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—SCOTT, BRUCE, & GLOVER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 116.

May 23, 1877.
Grant v.
Macqueen, &c.

SIR JOHN PETER GRANT, K.C.B., First Party.—Rutherford.
REV. HUGH D. MACQUEEN AND ANOTHER (Caw's Trustees), Second Parties.—Lee.

Testament—Lapsed Legacy—Charity.—A testator bequeathed a sum to trustees, directing them to pay the "clear annual interest or produce to the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in said parish." Some years after the testator's death there ceased to be a schoolmaster answering the description. Held that the legacy had not lapsed.

Nobile officium—Charity.—Observed that there would not be any difficulty in framing a scheme for applying the fund for some useful and beneficial purpose within the intention of the trustor.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

THE late John Caw, Edinburgh, died without issue on or about the day of May 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated June 1867, by which he disposed of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, and which contained, inter alia, the following bequest:—"I direct and appoint my said trustees to pay and make over the sum of £2000 sterling to the clerk of the presbytery of Abernethy for the behoof of the said parish, and to the minister of the Established Church at Rothiemurchus to be invested at the sight and under the direction of my said trustees and to be held by the said clerk and minister, and their respective successors in office, in all time thereafter, in trust, for the purposes following, viz.:—For payment of one-half of the clear annual interest or produce of the said sum to the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in said parish; . . . and I direct and authorize my trustees to make and execute, at the expense of my estate, any and all deeds which they may consider necessary for giving permanency to the said investment, and full effect to the three several purposes above expressed in all time coming."

At the time Mr Caw made his settlement there was no parochial school in the parish, but several years before Mr Grant, the late proprietor of Rothiemurchus, had built a schoolhouse and schoolmaster's house in the parish, and paid the teacher's salary himself. The school had been maintained in connection with the Established Church, the proprietor having been a member of that Church, and had been under the supervision and dependence of the presbytery until the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.

On the death of Mr Caw his trustees made over the legacy of £2000 (under deduction of legacy-duty) to the minister of the Established Church of Rothiemurchus and the clerk of the presbytery of Abernethy, and regularly paid one-fourth of the income to the teacher of the school as mentioned.

Upon the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the school ceased to be supported by the proprietor of Rothiemurchus.

school buildings were leased by the school board of Duthill and Rothiemurchus from him, and the school was wholly supported from the rates. No. 116.
 The former teacher was, however, continued as teacher in the school until May 23, 1877.
 Martinmas 1873, when he left on being informed by the late proprietor Grant v.
 his commissioner that his services were no longer required, and a new Macqueen, &c. teacher was appointed by the school board, who paid him his salary. A successor to this teacher had recently been appointed by the board, and in like manner received his salary from the board. He was a member of the Established Church.

There was no other school in the parish of Rothiemurchus in any way connection with the Established Church except a Sunday school under the charge of the minister and kirk-session of the parish.

This special case was presented by Sir John Peter Grant of Rothiemurchus, K.C.B., as residuary legatee named in the trust-disposition of Mr Caw, of the first part, and the Rev. H. D. Macqueen, clerk of the presbyterian congregation of Abernethy, and the Rev. Donald M'Dougall, minister of the quoad sacra parish of Rothiemurchus, the trustees under the bequest contained in the trust-disposition of Mr Caw, of the second part. The school board of the schoolmaster of the united parishes declined to become parties to the special case.

The following were the questions:—" (1) Whether the bequest in favour of the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in the parish of Rothiemurchus has lapsed, and if not, whether the first party hereto, as residuary legatee, has thus right to one-fourth of the said sum of £1800? (2) Whether the said second parties are entitled to retain the administration of said fourth part, and to continue to pay the clear annual interest thereof to the person officiating as schoolmaster of the united parishes of Duthill and Rothiemurchus, under the provisions of the ' Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' so long as the church continues to belong to the Established Church?"

It was argued for the first party;—There was no one now answering to the description of the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church, and therefore the bequest fell into abeyance.

It was argued for the second parties;—A school in connection with the Established Church might be instituted at any time in the parish, and there would be a schoolmaster entitled to payment of the bequest.
 The Court might frame a scheme for the application of the bequest to the purpose within the intention of the trust.¹
 The parties withdrew the second question.

ORD PRESIDENT.—I do not entertain any difficulty. The residuary legatee of Mr Caw's settlement claims one-fourth of the fund of £2000 as having fallen into residue, on the ground that the object of the bequest which the testator had in view has failed. The way in which the trustees are to dispose of part of the fund is to pay " one-fourth part of the clear annual interest or income to the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in said parish," by which I understand the quoad sacra parish of Rothiemurchus. The person who answered to that description at the ¹ Incorporated Trades of Edinburgh v. Governors of Heriot's Hospital, June 1836, 14 S. 873, 8 Scot. Jur. 384; Burnett v. King's College, Aberdeen, 23, 1844, 6 D. 731, 16 Scot. Jur. 349, Aug. 28, 1846, 5 Bell's Appeals, 18 Scot. Jur. 637; 1 M'Laren on Trusts, 457 and 462; Murdoch v. Magistrates of Glasgow, Nov. 30, 1827, 6 S. 186.

No. 116. time Mr Caw made his settlement, and also at the time of Mr Caw's death, was the teacher of a private school voluntarily established by the late Mr Grant Rothiemurchus in connection with the Established Church. Subsequent to the time Mr Grant thought fit to discontinue that school and to dispense with the services of the teacher. It is said that this was done in consequence of the Education Act of 1872, but that point does not appear to me to affect the question. In point of fact he did discontinue the school in the year 1873, as he had a right to do, as he had mortified no buildings or ground for the purpose of keeping it up. In consequence of this there is now no one answering to the precise description of the schoolmaster for whom the benefit was intended. Accordingly the object of the testator has failed, and the consequence is said to be that the legacy lapses into residue. I am not prepared to accept that result, and no authority in the law of Scotland has been quoted in support of it. I think, on a fair consideration of Mr Caw's settlement, the application of the money may be required at some future date when there may be some one answering to the description of a schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church. There is nothing to prevent this, and the schoolmaster may occupy a great variety of positions. The bequest is not confined to the old parish schoolmaster. It is quite clear that it was not the testator's view so to confine it, as there was no parochial school in the parish. Although at present there may be any schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church, I see no reason for supposing that the object of the charity has permanently failed, and if it has there is no ground for the contention of the first party. I am therefore answering the first question in the negative.

I only desire to add, that if any application be made to us in a different case for power to appropriate the income of the fund it will call for the exercise of a different species of jurisdiction. We should then be exercising that species of jurisdiction which we exercise in framing schemes when a testator has not sufficiently stated his intention in making a charitable bequest. I do not think in existing circumstances, there would be any difficulty in framing such a scheme for applying this fund to some useful and beneficial purpose within the intention of the trustor.

LORD DEAS.—There is no question here raised upon the footing of the bequest being void for uncertainty. There was no uncertainty here at all. The fund was to be put in the hands of trustees, and the manner in which it is to be applied is distinctly stated. One-fourth of the income is to go to the schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church of the parish, and that for all time coming. From the bequest taking effect the money was handed over to the trustees, and invested apparently without any difficulty.

But afterwards the late Mr Grant, who had built the schoolhouse and tenement house, determined to give up the school. It would be very odd if the result should be to put the money into the pocket of his successor. I know of no authority, and none was quoted, which countenances such a contention. It is posing that the money could no longer be applied to the trustor's purpose, and that the trustee has a desiderate authority for the proposition that it must in that case go to the residuary legatee.

But there is no reason for saying that the purpose has failed, even taking the deed in its literal construction. There are many ways in which there might be a schoolmaster "in connection with the Established Church." I do not suggest what these are, but if an application is made to us to prepare a scheme No. 116.

 carrying out this bequest I do not see that our duty would be to do anything give effect to it. Whatever may be the law when the purpose has failed I our in holding that the money cannot here be paid over to the residuary atee.

May 23, 1877.
 Grant v.
 Macqueen, &c.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. Even if it could be shewn that particular purpose of the truster in making the bequest had absolutely failed n not prepared to say that the residuary legatee would be entitled to obtain funds. On the contrary, I think that the fund having been placed under a ial trust in official persons, for a particular purpose, tending to the general object promoting education, the trustees might, in that event, obtain the authority he Court to apply the funds in some other way towards the same general ct, in terms of a scheme presented and approved of.

ut here it cannot be said that the purpose of the truster has failed. If the ose has failed it is only a failure of a temporary character. There may be y time within the parish a person entitled to draw the income of this pron from year to year. Such a person, if not now in existence, may come existence immediately. That being so, the residuary legatee cannot success-claim the fund.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Find, decern, and declare that the bequest in favour of the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in the parish of Rothiemurchus, in the trust-disposition and settlement in the case mentioned, has not lapsed ; and the first party, as residuary legatee, has no right to one-fourth part of the sum of £1800 in the case mentioned : Find the first party liable in expenses to the second parties, and remit," &c.

ACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—MENZIES, COVENTRY, & SOOTE, W.S.—Agents.

CHIAL BOARD OF GREENOCK, Petitioners and Respondents.—M' Laren. No. 117.
 MILLER AND BROWN, Respondents and Appellants.—Trayner.

cess—Appeal from Sheriff Court—Whole subject-matter of the Cause—Court sion Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 53.—Held that an appeal in interlocutor of a Sheriff was not competent, in respect that the whole had not been decided, the question of expenses having been reserved.

May 25, 1877.
 Parochial Board of Greenock v.
 Miller and Brown.

Parochial Board of Greenock presented a petition in the Sheriff of Renfrewshire against Miller and Brown, builders, praying that they be ordained to execute certain works for which they had contracted, n their failing to do so, for authority to employ men to do the work ir expense, and in that event to interdict the respondents from in-ng with the works.

Sheriff (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor :—" And in respect is admitted by the defenders that they have withdrawn their men he works since the 7th instant, the Sheriff authorises the pursuers ploy men, and procure additional material and plant, and to carry mselves the work contracted for by the defenders, until the work npleted, or, in the option of the pursuers, of new to contract for id work, or any part of it, with other tradesmen ; and, with a view

1st DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Renfrewshire.
 M.

- No. 117. to ascertain the quantity of work already done by the defenders, remit to James Barr, measurer in Glasgow, to measure the said work, and report; meantime reserves all questions of accounting and damages between the parties; and reserves the question of expenses; and decerns."
- May 25, 1877.
Parochial Board of Greenock v. Miller and Brown.

When the case was called in the Single Bills no objection was taken by the respondents, but the Court directed attention to the question of the competency of the appeal under section 53 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, which enacts that "it shall be held that the whole cause has been decided in the Sheriff Court when an interlocutor has been pronounced by the Sheriff which, either by itself or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, disposes of the whole subject-matter of the cause, or of the competition between the parties in a process of competition, although judgment shall not have been pronounced upon all questions of law or fact raised in the cause; but it shall not prevent the cause from being held as so decided that the expenses if found due shall not be taxed, modified, or decerned for."

The appellants maintained (1) that practically the whole question raised by the prayer of the petition was decided by the Sheriff's interlocutor (2) that a finding of expenses was no part of the subject-matter of the cause.¹

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent, on the ground that the Sheriff's interlocutor did not dispose of the question of expenses.

DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

- No. 118. HENRIETTA GORDON OR FERRIER AND ANOTHER (Walter Ferrier's Trustees) Pursuers.—D.-F. Horn—Campbell Smith.
GEORGE BAYLEY, Defender.—Fraser—Balfour.
- May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley.

Superior and Vassal—Non-entry—Casualty.—Conveyancing Act, 1874.—Held (diss. Lord Gifford) that the implied entry given by sec. 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, to a person holding an infestment on an a me vel de me precept unconfirmed, had the feudal effect of extinguishing the mid-superior so that it was no longer competent for him to demand an entry in the charter (which he possessed) of heir to the mid-superior, although this resulted in the heir being subjected in a higher casualty than if the Act had not been passed.

- 2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.
- THE late Walter Ferrier, W.S., in the year 1811, became proprietor of the superiority of the lands of Manuel Mill, in which he stood in the date of his death in 1856. He was succeeded in the superiority of these lands by his testamentary trustees.

Prior to 1832 the Very Reverend Principal Baird was proprietor of the dominium utile of the lands of Manuel Mill, and was infeft therein as superior to the late Walter Ferrier as his superior. In 1832 Principal Baird disposed of the lands of Manuel Mill to his son-in-law, the late Isaac Bayley, by disposition, containing an obligation to infeft a me vel de me, and a procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine. Upon this precept Isaac Bayley was infeft on 18th May 1832.

Isaac Bayley never entered with Walter Ferrier or his trustees as superiors of the lands of Manuel Mill. When the lands became vacant by the death of Principal Baird, Isaac Bayley, instead of taking entry himself, offered as vassal Mr Thomas Elder Baird, Principal Baird's eldest son and heir-at-law, and accordingly Mr Thomas Elder Baird n 1868 entered by Walter Ferrier's trustees, by writ of clare constat, as their vassal in the lands, on which writ Mr Thomas Elder Baird was infeft. No. 118.

¹ Duke of Roxburghe, May 26, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 715.

May 26, 1877.

Isaac Bayley died in 1873, and his trustees completed a title to the lands of Manuel Mill by notarial instrument in their favour, dated 15th December 1873. They thereafter disposed the lands to George Bayley, Esq., Isaac Bayley's son and heir-at-law. George Bayley was infeft by recording the disposition on 19th January 1874. Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley.

Thomas Elder Baird died in 1876, when the lands fell again in non-entry.

George Bayley, who had been base infeft in 1874, was heir-at-law of his uncle, Thomas Elder Baird.

On the death of Thomas Elder Baird, Walter Ferrier's trustees demanded from Mr George Bayley a composition of one year's rent, on the ground that, under the "Conveyancing Act, 1874" * (which came into operation on 1st October 1874), he became, as of the date of his infeftment, by implied entry, the vassal of the said trustees as the nearest lawfully superiors, whose estate of superiority was, prior to the 1st October 1874, not defeasible at his will, and so became liable to pay to them a composition of one year's rent upon the death of Mr Thomas Elder Baird, the last vassal who was entered under the law as it stood prior to the passing of the "Conveyancing Act, 1874."

This demand Mr George Bayley answered by offering himself for an entry as heir-at-law of his uncle, Mr Thomas Elder Baird, the last entered vassal, and requiring Walter Ferrier's trustees to grant a writ of clare constat in his favour on his paying the duty exigible on the entry of an entry.

Walter Ferrier's trustees accordingly raised an action of declarator and payment of composition against Mr George Bayley.

On 21st November 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interdictor:—" Finds, decerns, and declares that, in consequence of the death

The Conveyancing Act, 1874, 37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, enacts, sec. 4:—" When lands have been feued, whether before or after the commencement of this

. . . (2) every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or after shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be as at date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of deeds, duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in the lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of the Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, to the effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to existing law and practice. . . . (3) Such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or rents of feu-duties, which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or to the date of such entry; . . . but provided always that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could, by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have demanded the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering. Lands shall after the commencement of this Act be deemed to be in non-entry, but a superior who would but for this Act be entitled to sue an action of declarator or payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action, . . . and the provisions in such action may be in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule A. to annexed."

No. 118. of Thomas Elder Baird, Esquire, who was the vassal last entered and infeft under the operation of the law as it stood prior to the passing of the May 26, 1877. 'Conveyancing Act, 1874,' in All and Whole the mill of Manuel, Ferrier's casualty, being one year's rent, became due to the pursuers, as the late Mr Walter Ferrier's trustees, as superiors of the said lands, upon the 18th day of January in the year 1876, being the date of the death of the said Thomas Elder Baird, and that the said casualty is still unpaid and that the full rents, mails, and duties of the said lands of Manuel Mill, and others above described, after the date of this interlocutor, do belong to the pursuers, as superiors thereof, until the said casualty and the expenses of this process be otherwise paid to the pursuers, and decerns; and before farther answer as to the petitory conclusions of the summons appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the amount of one year's rent of said lands may be ascertained, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—This action raises a question of very general interest and importance as to the construction of the 4th section of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874. The question is whether a proprietor of lands, who is a singular successor of a former vassal, and who was infeft in the lands, but not entered with the superior at the commencement of the Act, such infeftment being declared by the statute to be equivalent to an entry with the superior by confirmation, can defeat the demand of the superior for payment of the casualty composition due by a singular successor by offering the heir of the original vassal for entry by writ of clare constat, or by infeftment on a special service heir, on payment of the relief-duty alone. There are some specialties in the case which may require particular consideration, but I think that the general question, as I have stated it, is fairly raised, and must be decided."

(After stating the circumstances under which the question arose)—"On the death of Thomas Elder Baird, which took place in January 1876, his nephew, Mr George Bayley, the defender, who, as has been mentioned, had been infeft in January 1874 in the dominium utile of the lands as the singular successor of Principal Baird, his grandfather, happened also to be the heir-at-law of his uncle, Mr Thomas E. Baird, i.e., heir under the original investiture in favour of Principal Baird. But I do not think that the accident by which the defender held this double character at all affects the position of the parties; because the estates to which he would (prior to the commencement of the Conveyancing Act of 1874) have had a right in these two characters would have been entirely different. As to the estate to which he has right as the singular successor of Principal Baird in the dominium utile or the true property of the lands which he holds in virtue of the settlement of his father, who purchased them from Principal Baird, whereas the only estate which he could have taken as heir of his uncle, T. E. Baird, was a barren unsubstantial estate of mid-superiority created by Mr Isaac Bayley on the disposition from Principal Baird, which contained a double manner of holding, and a procuratory of resignation, and a procuration of sasine, which infeftment had never been confirmed. The defender's position as regards the pursuers' demand that he should enter with them as their singular successor of Principal Baird, would have been substantially the same if, instead of the defender himself, a third party had been the heir of T. E. Baird.

"Now, if the Conveyancing Act of 1874 had not passed, the following would have been the position of the rights and liabilities of the pursuers and defender. In the first place, the barren estate of mid-superiority, which remained in Principal Baird after the sale to Mr Isaac Bayley, and which was taken by Thomas Elder Baird as heir of his father in 1868, would have been defeated at any time at the pleasure of Mr Isaac Bayley, or his trustees, or the defender, and might have been evacuated by any of them obtaining their respective infeftments confirmed by the pursuers as the proper superiors, or by their reliance on the procuratory in Principal Baird's conveyance, notwithstanding

The defender reclaimed.

At advising,—

No. 118.

May 26, 1877.

Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

LORD ORMTDALE.—The Lord Ordinary has correctly stated that the question intermediate entry given by the pursuers to Mr T. E. Baird as heir of his father.—(Fullarton, Nov. 22, 1833, 12 S. 117).

“In the second place, the pursuers, as superiors, would now have been entitled to call upon the defender to enter with them as their vassal, and to pay the composition of a year's rent, as being the singular successor of Principal laird, and to enforce that claim by a declarator of non-entry against him; and this is the fair and necessary deduction from the case of Fullarton, that the intermediate entry of T. E. Baird would have formed no bar against such an action.

“But, in the third place, so long as the estate of mid-superiority referred to was not evacuated, the defender would have been entitled to meet the superior's demand by putting forward the heir of the original disponer, that is, the heir of the original investiture, to enter in that character, although the superiors would not have compelled the heir to enter. It is hardly necessary to refer to authorities in support of these propositions; but as this case may go elsewhere think it right to notice that they are distinctly affirmed as being the recognised rules of law by Professor Bell in his Principles on the authority of the cases of The Magistrates of Musselburgh, Feb. 21, 1804, Mor., p. 15,038; Hill Mackay, Feb. 5, 1824, 2 Sh. 681; Piggot v. Colville, Dec. 9, 1829, 8 Sh. 3, 2 Scot. Jur. 93; and Dundas v. Drummond, Feb. 10, 1769, Mor., p. 1035. Professor Menzies, p. 814, and Professor Montgomerie Bell, 1st ed., 1055, state the law in similar terms; and although Mr Duff, p. 217 (who, however, does not notice the cases of Hill or of Piggot), indicates a somewhat different opinion, the law as stated by Professor Bell was fully recognised in the case of Hyslop v. Shaw, May 13, 1863, 1 Macph. 535, 35 Scot. Jur. 326, which was decided by the whole Court. For, although the point there decided was a majority of nine to four of the whole Judges was, that where a party had conveyed lands to a purchaser by a conveyance, with an a me vel de me holding, which the purchaser was infeft, who, without being confirmed, paid the feu-ties for some years to the superior, the disponer was not by that unconfirmed interference of the feu liberated from liability for the prestations of the feu-tie, and that the superior was not, by accepting payment from the purchaser, precluded from claiming against the disponer. Six of the Judges in the majority, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis), and Lords Cowan, Deas, Benholme, James, and Mackenzie, and one of the Judges in the minority, viz., Lord Riehill, expressly stated the law applicable to the point now under discussion to be, that the heir of a disponer who had granted a disposition with a double manner of holding was entitled to enter with the superior so as to save the disponee from the payment of the composition of a year's rent. None of the other Judges indicated any dissent from the proposition so laid down; and the majority of the Court plainly considered that state of the law to be an important element in their judgment. It is thus quite clear that if an action of declarator of non-entry had been now brought against him by the pursuers, the defender, George Bayley, but for the provisions of the Conveyancing Act of 1861, would have obtained absolvitor from the conclusions of such action, by being entitled to enter as heir of his uncle Thomas Elder Baird, and the pursuers did not have insisted upon his entering as a singular successor, or paying the composition of a year's rent.

This being so, the general question to be solved is, whether the Act of 1861 has made any, and if so, what alteration upon the respective rights and liabilities of parties in the position of the present pursuers and defender? The question turns entirely upon the construction of sec. 4 of the statute, and of Rule B appended to the statute. Section 4 is divided into four sub-sections. Sub-section (1) abolishes renewal of investiture, and declares it to be incompetent for the superior to grant any writ by progress, with an exception in favour of certain writs, and, inter alia, writs of clare constat. Sub-section (2) provides

No. 118. to be determined in this case is whether, having regard to the provisions of the "Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874," the demand of a superior for the casualty

May 26, 1877.

Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

that 'every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of sasines duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in such land would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice.'

"Now, before considering the remainder of this enactment, it is desirable to see what the effect would have been according to the then existing law and practice, if on the 1st of October 1874 the pursuers had granted in favour of the defender, George Bayley, a writ of confirmation of his infeftment which had been recorded in January 1874. That confirmation would, in the first place, have confirmed the defender's own base infeftment, and all the prior base infeftments in the property of the lands up to and including the infeftment taken by Mr Isaac Bayley on the precept in Principal Baird's disposition. In the second place, it would farther have evacuated the estate of barren mid-superiority, which had remained with Principal Baird after his sale of the lands to Mr Isaac Bayley, and which was afterwards taken up by Mr T. E. Baird, virtue of his entry in 1868, but which had all along been defeasible at the will of Mr Isaac Bayley, afterwards of his trustees, and finally of the defender, George Bayley. In the third place, it would have entirely liberated and absolved Principal Baird and his heirs from all liability for the feu-duties and prestations contained in the original feu-right, and would have transferred to Mr George Bayley the sole and undivided liability for these feu-duties and prestations. And, in the fourth place, it would have operated as a complete discharge of all casualties and arrears of feu-duties and other prestations due and payable at and prior to the date of the confirmation, unless in so far as they were expressly reserved in the charter.

"In so far as regards the first and second of these effects, viz., the confirmation of all the base infeftments and the evacuation of the defeasible estate of mid-superiority which then existed in the person of Thomas Elder Baird, I think there is nothing in any part of the statute to prevent these effects from following the confirmation which the statute implies in every registered infeftment. But as regards the other two effects of confirmation the statute contains express provisions and qualifications. Thus in a subsequent part of sub-section (2) it is provided 'that notwithstanding such implied entry the proprietor entered in the lands and his heirs and representatives shall continue personally liable to the superior for payment of the whole duties affecting the said lands and for performance of the whole obligations of the feu, until notice of change of ownership of the feu shall be given to the superior.' And in sub-section (3) it is enacted that 'the implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of duties which may be exigible from the lands at and prior to the date of entry . . . but provided always that such implied entry shall not entitle the superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to the Act or by the conditions of the feu-right have required the vassal to enter and pay such casualty irrespective of his entry.' And in sub-section (4) it is declared that such implied entry shall not be pleadable in defence against the superior's action for a casualty. The meaning of these sub-sections, when taken together, is, in my opinion, that the entry by confirmation which the statute declares shall be implied in the infeftment of every proprietor infeft in lands after the commencement of the Act, shall have the effect of for ever extinguishing the defeasible estate of mid-superiority created by the original conveyance from the former vassal with a double manner of holding, that notwithstanding the implied entry the superior is not to be deprived of his right to the casualty which he would have been entitled to demand had he actually granted of composition from a singular successor, infest in lands as proprietor at the commencement of the Act, can be defeated by his offering for an entry the heir of

No. 118.

May 26, 1877.

rit of confirmation, but that in the event of any person holding the position of an entered vassal, being in life, whether he were the original disponee, or his heir, or a liferenter, or in any other position, the superior's right to demand payment of a casualty should be postponed until the death of such entered vassal.

Now, had the Act stopped there I should have had little hesitation in holding that the defeasible estate of mid-superiority which stood in the person of T. E. Baird was, from and after 1st October 1874, so completely evacuated at, on his death in 1876, nothing remained in his person which could be taken up by his heir, either by service or by precept of clare constat, from the superior, and that the defender, George Bayley, would have had no good defence against the pursuers' demand for payment of a casualty as the singular successor of the original vassal in the lands. The defender, however, maintains that in the present case this result is excluded by the language of sub-section (4), which must therefore be carefully and critically examined.

"That sub-section provides that 'no lands shall, after the commencement of the Act, be deemed to be in the non-entry; but a superior who would, but for the Act, be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance, may raise in the Court of Session, against such successor, whether he shall infest or not, an action of declarator, and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence of such action.' . . . 'And the summons in such action may be in as nearly as may be in the form of schedule B hereto annexed.' In the schedule the person who stands as pursuer is 'A (design him), immediate lawful superior of the lands (or subjects) afterwards described (or referred to), and duly infest therein;' and the defender is simply mentioned as 'B (design him), defender.' From the terms of sub-section (4), already cited, it is clear that the defender 'B' is to be the 'successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance,' against whom the pursuer, as superior, would, but for the Act, have been entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry. The conclusions, as given in the schedule, are, first, for declarator 'that, in consequence of the death of C (or otherwise, as the case may be), who was vassal last vest and seised in All and Whole the lands of X,' . . . 'a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, became due to the said A, as superior of the said lands, upon the day of . . . , being the date of the death of the said C (or) the date of the infestment of the said B in the lands of X (or otherwise, as the case may be), and that the said casualty is unpaid,' and then follow conclusions as to the rents during non-payment of casualty, and a petitory conclusion for payment of a year's rent.

Now, the first observation which occurs upon the language of the schedule, the enacting words of sub-section (4), after the declaration that no lands, after the commencement of the Act, be in non-entry, is that the person is to be entitled to raise an action of declarator, and for payment of the casualty, is a superior who would but for the Act be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the 'vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance.' But if the explanation which I have given in a former part of this note as to the relative positions and rights of the pursuers and defender, according to the law and practice prior to 1st October 1874, be correct, it does not admit of doubt that the pursuers, but for the passing of the Act, would have been entitled, on the death of Thomas Elder, to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the 'successor of the vassal in the lands,' i.e. against the defender as the singular successor of Pringle Baird, the former vassal. The defender, however, maintains that, according to the sound construction of sub-section (4), read in connection with the words of schedule B, the person there referred to as 'the vassal in the lands,' the successor might have been sued in a declarator of non-entry, and who is the defender in the new action, substituted therefor by the statute, is the

Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

"On the whole matter, then, I am of opinion that the effect of the said reference to the present case is—(1) That the defeasible mid-superiority held by Mr T. E. Baird was absolutely and for ever extinguished; (2) that from and after 1st October 1874 the lands were held by Mr George Bayley, the defendant, as the pursuers as his immediate lawful superiors, as the singular successor of the Principal Baird, the former vassal, in virtue of the implied confirmation by him of his infestment, which flowed from the precept of sasine contained in the original disposition granted by Principal Baird; (3) that owing to an intervening entry having been given by the pursuers in 1868 to T. E. Baird, as heir of Principal Baird, the said entry was null and void, and the said lands remained in the hands of the defendant as the singular successor of the Principal Baird, the former vassal, in virtue of the implied confirmation by him of his infestment, which flowed from the precept of sasine contained in the original disposition granted by Principal Baird."

ning Act was passed for the purpose of dispensing with much useless procedure which was previously necessary, and thereby simplifying and facilitating the transfer of the land. No. 118.

May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

It is unnecessary to enter into a review of the state of the law and practice relating to the disputed question prior to the passing of the recent Act, as it was acknowledged by both parties at the debate that the Lord Ordinary has done so satisfactorily and correctly in the note to his interlocutor. I assume, therefore, with the Lord Ordinary, that prior to the passing of the recent Act the offer which the defender in this case has made, in order to meet the pursuers' demand for payment of the casualty of composition as on the entry of a singular successor in the lands in question, would have been sufficient. At the same time, however, it can scarcely be denied, I think, that in truth such an offer would have been more of the nature of a technical manoeuvre or device than anything else, resorted to for no other purpose than to evade payment of a casualty otherwise lawfully due to the superior. Neither can it, I think, be disputed that such a mode of meeting the superior's claim was calculated in its results to complicate and obstruct rather than facilitate the transfer of land. But although all this may be so, it does not necessarily follow that the defender may not be right in holding the pursuers wrong in the present controversy. This depends upon what ought to be held to be the true import and effect of the recent Conveyancing Act, and particularly of the provisions in its 4th section.

In examining the terms of that section of the Act, including its sub-divisions, bearing on the present case, it is important to keep in view that the mid-superiority left with Principal Baird when he disposed the lands in question to the defender's father, the late Mr Isaac Bayley, was such as might be put an end at any time by the party in right of the dominium directum, or, in other words, at the will of the defender, as now the proprietor of the lands. The defender's father, in the first instance, became proprietor by disposition from Principal Baird, containing a double or alternative manner of holding—a holding à vel de me. So long as this was allowed to continue unchanged the holding was to be considered a base one, that is, a holding of the mid-superior, Principal Baird, and after his death of his son and heir, Mr Thomas Elder Baird. Such was the state of matters at and prior to the Conveyancing Act of 1874 coming into operation. But it is undoubted, and was not questioned at the debate, that the vassal or proprietor of the lands, that is, Mr Isaac Bayley, who was Principal Baird, by precept of clare constat, their right as superiors to demand a casualty of a year's rent from the defender, as singular successor of the Principal, postponed until the death of T. E. Baird; and (4) that the pursuers, who, in accordance with the law as it existed prior to 1874, would have been entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry against the present defender, as the singular successor of the vassal in the lands, are now entitled to raise against him the same action of declarator and for payment of the casualty due by a singular successor, and to prevail. But as the question is a novel one, and has not been previously litigated by the defender, I think that the rents should not be held to belong to the pursuers from the date of citation, but only from the date of this interlocutor.

It will be observed that my opinion has been very much influenced by the consideration that in consequence of Mr Bayley being infeft in the lands, the right of redemption implied in his infeftment extinguished the mid-superiority which existed in Mr T. E. Baird. Whether I might have arrived at the same result if Mr Bayley had not been infeft is a question on which I express no opinion."

No. 118. Principal Baird's dispoonee in the first instance, and on his death the defender.

May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

Mr George Bayley, his son and heir, in the second instance, would, according to the general rule, and supposing there was no interposed bar, have been entitled to put an end to the mid-superiority, which was successively in Principal Baird and his son, at any time he pleased, by entering with the over-superior, who in the present case was Mr Ferrier, and after him his trustees, the pursuers. And whether this has not been done by the operation of the Conveyancing Act will be immediately seen, and is really the question which has to be decided.

But before taking up that question, it is proper I should notice the defender's argument to the effect that, in the circumstances of the present case, there is an interposed bar, which, before the recent Act came into operation, would have prevented the vassal entering with the over-superior, and therefore must be held also to prevent the implied statutory entry taking effect. It was assumed in the argument for the defender that in consequence of the vassal or proprietor of the lands for the time getting Mr Thomas Elder Baird, after the death of his father, the Principal, to enter with the over-superior, he and his successors were and are barred ex contractu from thereafter entering themselves with the over-superior, or, in other words, converting their private or base holding into a public one. It appears to me that there is no foundation for this assumption, and I am the more emboldened to say so, considering that it does not seem to be covered, either in fact or law, by anything in the record. It is not even averred in the record that Mr Thomas Elder Baird, although after his father's death he entered with the over-superior, did so at the request of or in implement of any contract or arrangement with the vassal or proprietor of the lands. I am quite unable, therefore, to see how any bar or impediment was interposed to prevent the true vassal or proprietor himself entering with the over-superior whenever he pleased, seeing that he always continued to have right to his alternative or public manner of holding, and that his changing his base holding into a public one would not possibly prejudice Mr Thomas Elder Baird or any one else. Neither Principal Baird, nor Mr Thomas Elder Baird, nor any other party, had an interest to object to the true vassal or proprietor entering with the over-superior at any time he pleased, and so putting an end to the mid-superiority. Whether this has not been done by operation of the recent Conveyancing Act depends upon the view that may be taken of its provisions, which will now be examined.

Sub-division 2 of section 4 of the Act contains the first provision of any importance touching this matter. It enacts that the proprietor who at the date of the Act is infeft in the lands shall be held to be, as at the date of the registration of his infeftment, duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in such lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of the Act, have not been defeasible at the will of the proprietor or infeft, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice. Applying this enactment to the present case, and in particular to the facts (1) that the defender, Mr George Bayley, was the proprietor of the lands, having his infeftment duly registered at and prior to the recent Act coming into operation, and (2) that his nearest superiors, whose estate of superiority would not, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of the Act, have been defeasible by the defender or proprietor infeft, are the pursuers, it necessarily follows that he must be held to be entered with them as the over-superiors, and, consequently, that the mid-superiority was thereby evacuated and put an end to. And if this be so, it will necessarily follows that there is now no longer any room or opportunity for the defender tendering himself or any one else as heir to a mid-superior whose right and title are entirely gone. Nor am I able to find anything in other parts of the Act repugnant to the views I have now expressed.

No. 118.
May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

It was no doubt maintained that the pursuers' present claim is inconsistent with the concluding portion of sub-division 3 of section 4 of the Act, whereby it is provided that the implied entry referred to in the preceding sub-division shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by law prior to this Act." Founding on this provision it was argued for the defender that because by the law prior to the Act it would have been competent to tender for an entry the heir of the deceased mid-superior, and so meet the pursuers' demand for payment of a composition, to give effect to the demand it would be contrary to that provision. It appears to me that this argument is fallacious, and proceeds on a misapprehension of the true object of the provision, which was not that suggested, but merely to prevent the over-superioring, in virtue of the statutory implied entry, on payment of a composition after the death of the mid-superior, who had, prior to the Act, been held to fill the fee. Accordingly, if the pursuers had, in respect of the implied statutory entry of the defender, Mr George Bayley, on 19th January 1874, the date of the registration of his infeftment, demanded payment of a composition on the passing of the Act, the answer to such a demand that, prior to the Act, it would not be sooner than the death of Mr Thomas Elder Baird, which did not happen till January 1876, would have been irresistible under the provision referred to. Such an answer, it appears to me, was alone the object of the provision referred to, and as it has been duly observed in the present instance the argument of the defender cannot avail him. In any other view, and were the provision interpreted as the defender says it ought, the enactment relating to an implied entry might be in part, at least, in measure, if not entirely, frustrated.

The only other point in the argument for the defender which has not been met and sufficiently met in the note of the Lord Ordinary is the suggestion that I understood his counsel to make, that the implied entry in the present case must be held to relate, not to the true owner of the lands or dominium utile, but to the heir succeeding or entitled to succeed to the mid-superiority. But it could not possibly be so, for the statute expressly enacts (sub-division 2 of section 2), that it is the proprietor "who is at the commencement of this Act, or after shall be, duly infeft in the lands," who "shall be deemed and held to be as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superior in such lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice." Now, it is too obvious to admit of mistake. I think, that the true owner here referred to is the owner or proprietor duly infeft in the lands, and not any mid-superior having no right at all to the lands, and whose right of superiority is so worthless as to be altogether nugatory. Besides, there are, in the same sub-division of section 2 of the Act, provisions in such a way to "superior" and "over-superior," as to shew, if any were necessary beyond what has been already stated, that by "proprietor" was exclusively meant the verus dominus of the lands, or party in right of the dominium utile.

No. 118.
 May 26, 1877.
 Ferrier's
 Trustees v.
 Bayley.

On the whole, and chiefly for the reasons now adverted to, I have no hesitation in concurring with the Lord Ordinary in the result at which he has arrived and am therefore of opinion that his interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have found this case to be attended with great difficulty and after the opinion which Lord Ormidale has just delivered, and which is in accordance with the view of the Lord Ordinary, it is with some hesitation that I venture to differ from the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary and Lord Ormidale have arrived.

I have ultimately come to be of opinion, however, that the mode in which the title of the defender has been made up in the present case does not, under the provisions of the recent statute, render him liable in a greater or different casualty to the superior than would have been legally exigible under the old law, or than would have been exigible had he made up his title under the provisions of any other legal and competent form; and as I think—indeed, I have no doubt whatever—that he could have legally completed his title so as to be only liable to the superior in relief-duty, that is, in a duplicand of the full year's rent, I do not think that the superior is entitled to exact a full year's rent of the subject, being the composition exigible under the old law, on the entry of a singular successor. In a single word, the ground of my opinion is, that the provisions of "The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874," were only intended to shorten and simplify the modes of making up titles of proprietors, and were not intended in any degree to enlarge the rights of superiors, or to enable superiors to demand from their vassals, in whatever mode the vassal's title was completed, any other or different casualty than such superior could have exacted under the Act in question never been passed. The Act is a mere conveyancing Act, intended only to simplify titles and not to affect the pecuniary rights of superiors or vassals. The only exception is that in certain cases the vassal is empowered to purchase the superior's casualties. In other words, I think the true question in the present case and in all similar cases under these statutes (which mean in questions with superiors) is not in what mode has the vassal completed his title? but what duties or casualties or payments could the superior have exacted under the old law, supposing the vassal to have made up his title at all? It appears to me that the true construction of the statute is, that on the one hand the superior's rights are in no way to be prejudiced or injured by reason of the vassal availing himself of the new statutory facilities for transferring land and of completing titles to land, so, on the other hand, the superior's rights should not be enlarged or the vassal put in a worse condition with the statute than he was by reason of the use of the statutory privileges.

I shall explain in a few words the view which I take of the relative positions and rights of the parties in the present case. The pursuers, Ferrier's Trustees, are the undoubted superiors, proprietors of the permanent dominium utile in the land, and the defender and his authors are the proprietors of the dominium utile. The subjects are held in feu, the entry of singular successors being tantamount to the property or dominium utile belonged prior to 1832 to the Rev. Dr. James Principal of the University of Edinburgh, who was then the entered vassal. In 1832 Principal Baird conveyed the lands to the late Isaac Bayley, who was his son-in-law, having married the daughter of Principal Baird, and Mr. Baird had based infeft in the usual way on a disposition which contained a double bond of holding. Isaac Bayley did not enter in any way with the superior, al Baird, the disponent, continuing sole entered vassal. On the death of Principal Baird the superior appears to have demanded an entry, and instead of Isaac Bayley entering as vassal a precept of clare constat was granted on the 26th December 1868 by the superiors, Ferrier's trustees, in favour of Thomas Elder Baird, advocate, the only son and heir-at-law of Principal Baird, and upon precept Thomas Elder Baird was infeft, and thus became the full entered vassal in the subjects under the present pursuers.

No. 118.
May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

Now, it is undoubted that this mode of filling the fee was perfectly legal and valid. The superior could ask no more, and although Isaac Bayley and not Thomas Elder Baird was the real proprietor of the dominium utile, and Mr Baird only a bare and nominal mid-superiority, with this the superiors had no concern. The fee was full in Mr Baird's person.

When Isaac Bayley died on 17th April 1873, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement conveying, inter alia, the subjects in question to his trustees, and the trustees, in terms of the settlement, conveyed the property to the present defender, George Bayley, who is Isaac Bayley's only son and heir-at-law, by disposition dated 27th December 1873. On this deed the defender, George Bayley, was infeft by registration on 19th January 1874. At the date of this infestment the Conveyancing Act of 1874 had not passed, and as the law then in force the infestment in favour of George Bayley was merely a base infestment, nominal superior being Thomas Elder Baird, who was then still alive, and was the only entered vassal with the pursuers. Neither the infestment of George Bayley nor that of the present defender, George Bayley, was ever considered or in any way whatever recognised by the pursuers as superiors. So matters till 1st October 1874, when the Conveyancing Act of that year came into operation, and I think it can hardly be said that at that date, the date of commencement of the Act, any right whatever thereby emerged to the defender. Thomas Elder Baird was then alive, and during his life the fee was in the hands of Thomas Elder Baird, however, the sole entered vassal, died on 18th January 1874, and thereupon, according to the old law, the subjects would have been demanded on entry, and the pursuers, as superiors, would have been entitled to demand an entry in common form. Now, I think it important to consider what would have been the position and rights of the defender, George Bayley, under the old law, that is, if the Conveyancing Act of 1874 had not passed. George Bayley was not only the son and heir-at-law of Isaac Bayley, but he was also grandson and heir-at-law of Principal Baird, and the nephew and heir-at-law of Thomas Elder Baird, the last entered vassal. What were his rights as under the old law, it was admitted, and it could not be disputed for a moment, that under the old law the defender, George Bayley, would have been entitled to enter with the pursuers as heir-at-law of his uncle, Thomas Elder Baird, and that upon payment of a simple duplicand of the feu-duty. The form of entry would have been by precept of clare constat, which is the usual way, or by special precept, but in either case the superior could have demanded and exacted no more than a duplicand of the feu-duty. All this is too clear for argument, and conceded at the bar. It is also established by many cases, some of which are referred to by the Lord Ordinary. But if this be so, I think it follows that what would have been competent under the old law is competent still under the present existing law. I can see nothing incompetent in Mr George Bayley

No. 118. now obtaining a precept of clare constat from the superior as heir-at-law of his uncle, Thomas Elder Baird, in the subjects in question, and infeftment on that precept would make the defender full entered vassal as his uncle's heir, or if the superiors declined to grant such precept George Bayley may now serve his in special to his uncle in the subjects, and infeftment by registration of the decree of service will have the same effect. There is nothing in the statute of 1874 which makes this course unlawful or incompetent, and no ground of incompetency has ever been suggested. No doubt such title would be a double or a cumulative title, but there is nothing incompetent in making up double titles, which are often both necessary and expedient, and it will surely not be maintained that the Conveyancing Act of 1874 prohibits cumulative or corroborative titles. It would be a very serious matter indeed if it were held that the Conveyancing Act of 1874 made it illegal or impossible for a purchaser of land to make up a corroborative title through the heir of the seller. It is out of the question to hold this, and such a view was not even suggested. Now, suppose George Bayley to have made up such title. He offers to do so, and although I think he should have done so by this time it is still competent. In these circumstances, what are the rights of the superiors? I am of opinion that they can only demand from him relief-duty, that is, a duplicand of the feu-duty, and nothing more. For George Bayley is not, either in law, in reason, or in fact, singular successor in the subject. He is the heir of the last entered vassal, and he is entitled to take up the subject as such, and he is also heir-at-law of Prince Baird, the immediately preceding, or, as I may say, without going further back, the original vassal. Isaac Bayley was never an entered vassal at all, never in any way recognised by or known to the superior, and yet it is only by considering him as the vassal that the pursuers have any colour for demanding compensation on the entry of a singular successor. No doubt it is true that Isaac Bayley had a conveyance to the subject, and that the defender mediately has a conveyance from him; but with this separate title the superiors have no concern, and they cannot compel the defender to produce it or to found upon it unless he chooses to do so; and if the defender has another and independent title, which he undoubtedly has, why should he not be allowed to use it. In a question with the superior the defender may plead any legal and sufficient title which he pleases, and which he really possesses. He may if he chooses take his stand upon his title as heir, and if that is a good and sufficient title, which I think it is, the superior cannot compel him to part with it or renounce it, and to set forward some other title of a totally different kind. The very object of double or cumulative titles is to enable the holder of them to plead upon any one of them which may be sufficient for the purpose. Nor do I think it is of any consequence which of two or more independent titles, all equally legal and competent, happen to be made up first.

Supposing that the defender and Isaac Bayley's trustees had not taken infeftment since Isaac Bayley's death, but that their right had remained dependent upon Isaac Bayley's settlement not followed by infeftment of any kind, I suppose it can hardly be doubted that in such a state of matters the pursuers as superiors, could not have succeeded in their present demand. They could not have compelled the defender to take infeftment on his father's deed, or, if he had done so, to register it in the Register of Sasines. Nor could the defender have been compelled to register the trustees' conveyance to him of the present subject. He was entitled to disregard both his father's deed and the disposition he trustees altogether, and to make up his sole and only title as heir-at-law of his uncle, Thomas Elder Baird. In that case it seems to me clear that the pursuers' present demand would have been absolutely unfounded. The defender would have been the pure heir of the last entered vassal, and nothing else, and as such liable to the superior in relief-duty only. I do not think the case is different from the mere circumstance that a base title was made up through Isaac Bayley's trust-deed. That base title was not made up for behoof of the superiors, and the benefit of it cannot be claimed by them.

No doubt it is true, and of course it is upon this circumstance that the pursuers' whole case rests, that the Conveyancing Act of 1874 declares, sec. 4, subsection 2, that every infeftment, even when expedited before the Act passed, shall imply an entry with the superior to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation; but surely this is a provision for the benefit of the vassal and not for the benefit of the superior. It is to aid the vassal in making up his title, and not in any way to benefit or advantage the superior. Accordingly, the same sub-section reserves the superior's rights notwithstanding the implied entry, and the next sub-section (sub-section 3) expressly declares that "such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands," and by the following sub-section (sub-section 4) the whole superior's rights as on non-entry are reserved and provided for, although the technical state of non-entry is abolished.

I humbly think, in accordance with what seems to me to be both the words and the spirit of the statute, that the superior's rights are neither to be better nor worse by the provision which the statute makes for "implied entry." The implied entry "shall not prejudice or affect" his rights. If it does not prejudice him, neither can it benefit him, for that would be "affecting" his rights. There is a peculiar hardship in the present case, for at the date when the decision in the defender's favour was recorded it could have no effect such as is contended for by the pursuers. The Act of 1874, and its supposed effect, could not have been anticipated, and I really have some confidence in thinking that the effect contended for by the pursuers could not possibly have been contemplated by the Legislature. In future cases it will generally be easy to defeat the pursuers' claims like the present by avoiding infeftment, or by taking infeftment only base de me, and thus rendering it incapable of being confirmed or made public, and thus preventing entry from being implied. Of course a base title gives exactly the same security to the purchaser as a public one. But I should deeply regret such a result, for I think it would introduce considerations of difficulties and devices in making up titles which it was the very object of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 to remove for ever from the sphere of conveyancing. I am for giving the superiors in the present case merely the relief-duty of the public and feu, the defender of course instantly completing his title as Thomas Elder Baird's heir, which, as already mentioned, I think he should have already

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My views on this difficult and important question have been expressed, both during the discussion of it and in the course of the consideration which it has since received. But I have ultimately come to coincide in opinion with Lord Ormisdale, and I shall shortly state the reasons which have led me to do so.

No. 118.

May 26, 1877.

Ferrier's

Trustees v.

Bayley.

No. 118.

May 26, 1877.
 Ferrier's
 Trustees v.
 Bayley.

The real question which is presented to us seems to be, whether the provision of the 4th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, in the opening enactment of its 2d sub-section, were intended merely to confer a benefit on persons entitled to the dominium utile of lands which they might use or not use as they thought fit; or whether they were intended to establish and determine, for all purposes and effects, the feudal relation between superior and vassal, excepting in so far as a special provision is otherwise made in this statute.

I have come to be of opinion that, whatever may be the ulterior or collateral effects of the enactment, this section provides absolutely for the effect which is to be given to any infeftment in lands, proceeding on a disposition containing double or alternative holding, and this not at the will or option of the person infeft, but to all intents and purposes.

The facts to which our opinions apply are, so far as they are material to the present question, simple enough, but they require to be accurately appreciated. The defender is the disponee under a disposition containing a double manner of holding granted by the trustees of the deceased Mr Isaac Bayley, dated the 2d day of December 1873.

He recorded this disposition in the Register of Sasines on the 19th day of January 1874.

Mr Isaac Bayley's author held under the pursuer as his immediate superior, and, of course, prior to the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, his interest created in his person a base fee only, held of the grantor as his superior, and could only become a public holding under the a me alternative of the conveyance by the disponee obtaining a charter from the over-superior. In the interval the said mid-superiority remained feudally in full force, and if the vassal had become by inheritance entitled to the said mid-superiority he must have extinguished the base fee created by his recorded disposition, and held the property absolutely under his title as heir of the last entered vassal.

The mid-superior died after the passing of the Conveyancing Act, and but for the provisions of that statute the fee would then have been in non-entry. The defender is not only disponee but is the heir of the party in right of the mid-superiority; and, under the law as it formerly stood, he might either have taken up his title as heir, paying the ordinary duties, or have obtained a charter of confirmation from the superior, in which case he must have paid a composition as a singular successor. He has himself made up no title at all, but the pursuer maintains, in this action, that, by virtue of the sub-section of the statute in question, the defender has already entered as a singular successor, that the mid-superiority has been extinguished ever since the death of the last vassal, that the singular successor must now pay the appropriate composition. I have said, I think this contention is well founded, and a very short comment on the provisions of this 4th section of the statute will indicate the ground on which I come to that conclusion.

There can be no doubt that the primary object of the 4th section of the statute, on which the question turns, was to confer a benefit on persons holding the substantial interest in the property of lands by abolishing some, at all events, of the cumbrous and expensive writs by progress which were previously necessary in the completion of a feudal title. The 1st sub-section of this 4th section abolishes absolutely the necessity for obtaining from any superior a writ by progress; and, excepting charters of novodamus, precepts or writs from Chancery or of clare constat, or of acknowledgment, prohibits superiors from granting the

The ground being thus cleared by this very comprehensive enactment, the 2d section proceeds to supply the place of the abolished writs, and the sub-section commences with these words :—"Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in such lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so as to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice."

No. 118.
May 26, 1877.
Ferrier's
Trustees v.
Bayley.

It is perhaps to be regretted that the definition of the "superior" in this clause should have been expressed in this negative form. But the meaning is not doubtful; it means, I apprehend, that any infeftment, such as that on which the defender possesses, which previously required, in order to render the right complete and public, confirmation from a superior, shall be held to imply such confirmation without the necessity of any charter or other writ being granted. It is not disputed that the pursuer stands in the position described in the statute, namely that the defender could not have passed him over in completing his title under the law as it previously stood. The defender, therefore, is an entered vassal, as much so as if a charter of confirmation had been granted at the date recording the disposition. Neither the pursuer nor the defender have any objection in the matter, and nothing either of them can do can alter the constitution of this feudal relation.

It is hardly understood that this was disputed by the defender, and if it were I should not have been able to appreciate the counter proposition maintained by him. It is not to be questioned that if the defender had obtained a charter of confirmation he would have been the vassal of the pursuer, liable in all the obligations and entitled to all the privileges of that character from the period at which his right took effect. The fee was not at any time in non-entry, because the superior himself had a vassal in the lands, and the superior had all the rights against the defender as vassal which a charter of confirmation would have given him, except in so far as these are specially provided for in the statute.

The remainder of this sub-section relates to matters which are not material to the present question. But there were two results which might have been considered for had the section not been qualified. On one hand it might have been maintained that as the entry by this implied confirmation required no act of the superior, his right to casualties necessarily fell. On the other hand, it might have been maintained by the superior that he was entitled to his casualty at the time when the confirmation was assumed to have been granted. These two questions are dealt with in the 3d sub-section, in which it is provided in sub-sections, 1st, that the superior should retain all rights to casualties which he formerly had; and 2d, that he shall not claim these sooner than he could have done under the former law. But it is not, I imagine, a logical deduction from these provisions that a vassal whom the statute says is entered with the superior shall be held, in this matter of composition, not to be entered, because, before the statute passed, he would not have been held to be so. The meaning of the provision is, that the superior shall have the same right against his vassal on his death as he would have had if he had granted a charter of confirmation, and the defender being entered as a singular successor must pay as such. No doubt I said that the superior's right to his casualties is not to be "affected" by

No. 118.

May 26, 1877.
 Ferrier's
 Trustees v.
 Bayley.

the statute; and it has been urged, with great force, that no greater change could be made on the superior's right than to give him a right to a composition as from a singular successor, when by the former law he would or might have been compelled to accept the heir of the last entered vassal, and could only have recovered the duties payable by an heir. But there seems to be a fallacy in this view. The defender is a singular successor entered with the superior, and the superior must have all the rights which in this respect he would have had against a singular successor entering, or proposing to enter, by obtaining a charter of confirmation. He cannot, however, enforce his right until the period at which the fee would have been vacant under the former law had the statute not passed. The opposite view would lead to very anomalous results, for the defender maintains that he is entitled to all the rights of a singular successor already entered with the superior, without paying any composition, while the superior's claim is said to lie against one who might be a third party, and who is not and never can be the superior's vassal. This would hardly be to leave the law as it was.

The 4th section simply abolishes the declarator of non-entry, and substitutes such an action as the present to enable the superior to recover his casualties.

Such are the provisions of this section of the statute. I am by no means insensible to the many perplexing questions which may arise from holding sasine on an indefinite precept to be equivalent to a charter of confirmation. How far a dispositive so infeft, who succeeds his author by a title of inheritance, can make his right as heir available to any extent, I forbear to inquire. It would certainly seem that a person in the position of the defender could consolidate the property title with the mid-superiority which is extinguished, nor have I been able altogether to appreciate the effect which might be attributed on this head to the 6th clause of the Conveyancing Act, consistent with the construction which I attribute to the 2d sub-section of section 1. But I am of opinion that in this matter of the superior's claim to composition the defender is a singular successor, that he was entered as such at the death of the last entered vassal, and that he became liable to pay composition as such at the death of the last entered vassal.

THE COURT adhered.

T. H. FERRIER, W.S.—MACRITCHIE, BAYLEY, & HENDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 119.

ISAAC BUCHANAN AND OTHERS (Peter Buchanan's Trustees),
 Pursuers and Real Raisers.

May 26, 1877.
 Buchanan's
 Trustees v.
 Buchanan.

JANE MILLIGAN BUCHANAN AND OTHERS (Isaac Buchanan's Children), ISAAC BUCHANAN, their Father, as their Administrator-at-law, Defenders and Claimants.—McLaren—Jameson.

CALEDONIAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Defenders and Claimants.—Kinnear—Mackintosh.

ISAAC BUCHANAN AND OTHERS (Peter Buchanan's Trustees), Defenders and Claimants.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

Succession—Testament—Vesting—Nati et nascituri.—A testator by his will settled a sum of £20,000 on his wife for life, and upon her death to pay the interest of £20,000 to his daughter during her life, and upon her death to pay over the said interest, to the amount of £300 a-year, to his sister's husband, in the event of his surviving her. Further, upon the decease of his sister (but subject to the annuity of £300 provided to her husband), he directed his trustees "to hold and apply the said principal sum of £20,000 and the income" thereof, for behoof of the children of his brother B, "procreated or to be procreated," in equal shares, "payable, the several children's shares, to the sons on their attaining twenty-five years of age." Lower was given to the trustees to expend the children's shares of income and to advance part of their shares of capital during minority. There was also a clause substituting the issue of children predeceasing the life-rentrix to their parents, and a survivorship clause.

The truster's sister died in 1875, survived by her husband. At that time the truster's brother B was alive, and two of his children had attained the age of twenty-five.

Held (1) that no right vested in any child of B before the death of the life-rentrix, or until his share became payable by his attaining the age of twenty-five; (2) that on that event the trustees were not entitled to withhold payment on the ground that other children might be born to B; (3) that the subsistence of the annuity of £300 did not prevent a partial payment to account of capital those children whose shares had vested, £10,000 being reserved to secure the annuity; (4) (diss. Lord Ormidale) that such interim payment should be made without caution.

Opinion (per Lord Ormidale) that though each child's share became vested and payable on his attaining the age fixed by the deed, it was under the condition that children subsequently born would be entitled also to share, and that therefore interim payment could only be made on caution to repeat if necessary.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Gifford) that the number of children to participate in the fund was fixed by the vesting of the share of any one of them, and that children subsequently born were excluded.

PETER BUCHANAN, merchant, Glasgow, by his trust-settlement left his whole estate to his brother, Isaac Buchanan, and others, as trustees for the following purposes, inter alia :—"In the fourth place, I direct my trustees to set aside, or invest in their own names, the sum of £20,000 sterling, to pay the interest or annual proceeds thereof to the said Jane Buchanan or Douglas" (the truster's sister, wife of Major George Douglas, one of the trustees), . . . "and upon the death of the said Jane Buchanan or Douglas I direct that my trustees shall pay over said interest or annual proceeds to the extent of £300 sterling to the said George Douglas in the event of his surviving his said wife :

Further, upon the decease of the said Jane Buchanan or Douglas subject to the burden of the said annuity provided to her husband if she shall survive her), I direct that the trustees shall hold and apply the principal sum of £20,000, and the income or annual proceeds thereof, for behoof of all the lawful children of my brother, the said Isaac Buchanan, procreated or to be procreated (other than his eldest son, Peter Buchanan, hereinafter provided for), equally among them, share and share alike, payable, the several children's shares, to the sons on their attaining twenty-five years, and to the daughters on their attaining that age or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen, with power to my trustees during the minority of the several children to expend their shares of the annual interest or income of the said principal sum for their behoof, and also to advance a part of the principal of the said shares, in establishing them in a business or profession respectively, and a part of the principal of the daughters' shares in their outfit on the occasion of their being married; . . . declaring that the parts of the principal which may be so advanced to the sons and daughters shall not be repayable from the executors of such of them as may die after receiving the same, but before the term of payment of their provisions; declaring also that in the event of the decease of any one or more of the children, whether before or after their aunt, the said Jane Buchanan

No. 119.

May 26, 1877.

Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.2d DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
R.

No. 119. or Douglas, leaving issue, such issue shall receive equally among them the share to which their respective parents would have been entitled had they survived, and that the shares of one or more of the children dying after their said aunt without issue shall accrue to and be equally divided among the survivors."

May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

Peter Buchanan, the truster, died in 1860.

Mrs Jane Buchanan or Douglas died in May 1875, having, from the date of the truster's death, received the interest of the £20,000 set apart and invested by the trustees under the directions contained in the fourth purpose of the truster's settlement narrated above.

Mrs Douglas was survived by her husband, Major George Douglas, and by her brother, Isaac Buchanan.

At the date of Mrs Douglas' death there were nine children of Isaac Buchanan alive, exclusive of the eldest son, Peter Toronto Buchanan. Of these, two daughters, Jane Milligan and Margaret Douglas Buchanan, had attained the age of twenty-five at the date of the death of the liferentrix, Mrs Douglas, and were unmarried. Two sons, Harris Buchanan, who was twenty-four, and James Isaac Buchanan, who was twenty-two, had assigned their rights under their uncle Peter Buchanan's will to the Caledonian Insurance Company. None of the remaining children of Isaac Buchanan had attained the age of twenty-five.

A demand having been made by Jane and Margaret Buchanan, two unmarried daughters, by the Caledonian Insurance Company, and Isaac Buchanan on behalf of his younger children, on the trustees that they should make a partial division of the £20,000, and accrued interest in their hands, after sufficiently securing Major Douglas' annuity of £300, the trustees raised this multiplepinding, in which they called themselves and those parties as claimants.

Jane Milligan Buchanan and the other younger children of Isaac Buchanan claimed payment to each of them of one-ninth part of the annual income arising from the fund in medio after deduction of Major Douglas' annuity of £300.

The Caledonian Insurance Company claimed payment of one-ninth share of the surplus capital of the fund in medio, after setting aside sufficient to secure Major Douglas' annuity, on account of each of Harris and James Isaac Buchanan in respect of their assignation so soon as these two beneficiaries should respectively attain the age of twenty-five.

The trustees claimed to hold the fund in medio until the death of Major Douglas, or until the death of Isaac Buchanan, whichever of these should last happen, on the ground that they were bound to hold the whole fund in medio until the expiry of the annuity to Major Douglas, and until it should be no longer possible that more children of Isaac Buchanan should come into existence.

The Lord Ordinary, on 21st July 1876, pronounced this interlocutor: "Finds that the only persons entitled to participate in the sum of £20,000 settled by the truster are the children of Isaac Buchanan alive at the death of Mrs Jane Buchanan Douglas, other than Peter Toronto Buchanan, but that no right vests in any such child until it reaches the age of twenty-five: Finds that, at the death of the liferenter, a ninth part was vested in each of Jane Milligan Buchanan and Margaret Douglas Buchanan, who were then twenty-five years of age: Finds that one-ninth share vested in Harris Buchanan, when he attained twenty-five, on 10th April 1876: Finds that, after payment of the annual £300 to Major Douglas, each of the said Jane Milligan Buchanan, Margaret Douglas Buchanan, and Harris Buchanan, is entitled to one-ninth part of the surplus interest arising on their respective shares."

the same became vested as aforesaid: Finds that, until their shares rest in them, the other children are not entitled to demand payment of any interest thereon, but, without prejudice to the power of the trustees, to expend the interest of said shares for their behoof, until they attain the age of twenty-five; and with these findings appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure.”*

No. 119.
May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

Peter Buchanan's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The subsistence of Major Douglas' annuity postponed the date of payment of capital till its expiry by his death. (2) The bequest being to a class payment was postponed until the whole members of the class were ascertained;¹ and therefore (3) if an interim payment was to be made it could only be on

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has found a good deal of difficulty in construing this deed.

“No right could vest till the death of the liferenter, inasmuch as the trust of the children did not come into existence till that event. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the annuity does not prevent vesting, and accordingly he is of opinion that on the death of the liferenter each child takes a vested interest as it reaches twenty-five. No right, it is thought, can vest before the occurrence of the events, because there is an express clause in favour of survivors in the case of children dying after the liferenter, without leaving issue; but this clause does not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, apply after the period of payment has arrived. Consequently, he holds that each child takes a vested interest when it reaches twenty-five. It was argued that such children as might be yet unborn to Isaac Buchanan were entitled to participate, but the Lord Ordinary has decided in the negative, because he thinks that the interest of a child reaching twenty-five is definitely ascertained, and that the interest of all is to be equal. Equality could not be preserved, if children subsequently born were held to be beneficiaries, for nothing could be withdrawn from the child who had actually received payment.

“It is true that no final distribution can be made till the death of the annuitant, but, in the view of the Lord Ordinary, that circumstance cannot determine the rights of the beneficiaries. The annuity is a mere burden, and, it may be, is the annuitant a security over the whole fund; but the surplus interest, it is thought, be divided, and it cannot be divided until a share vests, and without the ascertainment of the amount of the share. Further, the trustees are empowered to advance a part of the sons' and daughters' shares to establish them in business or provide an outfit on marriage. This not only enables the trustees to encroach on the capital so as to reduce the security of the annuitant, also assumes that the share is known.

The payment of the capital, except in the exercise of the special power given to the trustees, may be deferred until the death of the annuitant. But there is no direction to accumulate interest; and, in consequence, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the children who possess a vested right are entitled to a corresponding proportion of the surplus interest. The remainder is subject to the discretion of the trustees; and with respect to the discretion which is given to them, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the word ‘minority,’ as it occurs in the deed, may be read as equivalent to ‘under 25;’ or, in other words, to the artificial minority created by the deed. It is not easy to see why the powers of the trustees are to cease when there is no direction to accumulate, and when no legal right to interest can arise until vesting.

The interlocutor which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced disposes of all the questions which are raised in this case, other than the immediate payment of the shares which have vested. He doubts whether, without the consent of the annuitant, any payment can be made. But the only reason to the contrary is that the annuitant is entitled to the security of the whole fund.”

Carleton v. Thomson, Feb. 11, 1865, 3 Macph. 514, 37 Scot. Jur. 257; 30, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 151, 39 Scot. Jur. 640, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 232.

No. 119. caution to repeat in the event of further members of the class coming into existence.¹

May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

Argued for Isaac Buchanan's children and for the Caledonian Insurance Company;—(1) The intention of the testator was merely that Major Douglas' annuity should be sufficiently secured by the retention of a portion of the capital, not that the whole £20,000 should be held for an indefinite period to secure an annuity of £300; a partial distribution might therefore be made.² (2) The bequest of capital vested in the children alive at the date of the liferentrix, though the term of payment was postponed; children born subsequently to the death of the liferentrix would have no right to share.³ (3) There was therefore no ground for requiring caution if an interim payment were to be made.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two questions in this case arising on the interpretation of the fourth purpose of the will of a Mr Peter Buchanan.—1st, whether, supposing the period of division of the trust-funds to have arrived, the division of the surplus capital is to be postponed during the subsistence of an annuity secured upon the annual produce of the funds; 2d, whether the trust-funds being given on the expiry of the intervening liferent to the children procreated or to be procreated of the truster's brother, who is still in life, payment of the bequest or of any part of it can be made until it be seen whether other members of the class come into existence. The first of these questions is an important one, and one on which it was said that there is no specific authority for our guidance; but looking to the whole of the settlement I think it is in conformity with the will of the testator that if there is any surplus it should be divided on the arrival of the period of division, after sufficient provision has been made for the payment of the annuity. A sum of £20,000 was to be set aside, and the interest was to be paid during her life to Jane Buchanan Douglas, the truster's sister, and on her death the interest to the extent of £300 was to be paid to her husband, George Douglas. There is no direction that payment should be made over the whole interest, nor to keep up the whole capital as a security for the annuity. I cannot suppose that it was the testator's intention that until the death of the annuitant no part of this fund should be divided. The trustees were to pay over the interest to the extent of £300, and apply the principal in behoof of the beneficiaries on their majority or marriage. I take that to be simply equivalent to this, that so much of the capital as would produce £300 a year was to be retained, and the rest distributed as it vested. I do not think that it was ever intended that the whole £20,000 was to be kept up as a security for £300 a-year. Had the discrepancy been much greater there might have been a doubt as to the testator's intention. Nor do I think that there can be any reasonable doubt in the present case, where the testator left with a fund more than double what is required to secure the annuity. There are, no doubt, many cases in which a security for a provision has been ¹ Scheniman v. Wilson, June 25, 1828, 6 S. 1019; Shaw v. Shaw, note, 6 S. 1149.

² Kinmond's Trustees v. Kinmond, Feb. 5, 1873, 11 Macph. 381, 45 S. Jur. 255; Birch v. Shirratt, 1867, L. R., 2 Ch. App. 644.

³ Wood v. Wood, Jan. 18, 1861, 23 D. 338, 33 Scot. Jur. 177; Paterson Gray, 1868, L. R., 6 Eq. 215; Gimblet v. Purton, 1871, L. R., 12 Eq. 4; Jarman on Wills, 3d ed., vol. ii. p. 141, et seq.; Whitbread v. Lord St. John, 1804, 10 Ves. 152.

stituted over the corpus of an estate, but where no real prejudice to the creditor could occur the Court have over and over again interfered to settle the rights of parties on equitable principles. On this point of the case therefore I would suggest that the trustees retain a sum of £10,000 to meet the annuity, and be retained to pay over what remains.

No. 119.
May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

The second question is one which has given rise to a vast amount of discussion both in England and here. But the result has always depended upon the particular terms of the settlement as disclosing the intention of the testator. The provision of the deed with which we are dealing is—(reads clause quoted supra. 755). Now, the events on which payment is contingent have happened, for Mrs Douglas, the life-rentrix, has died, and of Isaac Buchanan's children at least three have attained the age of twenty-five. Are they, then, entitled to immediate payment of their shares of the fund so far as presently divisible? I can find nothing in the deed to the contrary. It is said that the bequest is to a class; and so it is; but these children are members of that class. They have fulfilled the condition of the testament. Whatever may be the right of others, and whether or not the members of the class may be subsequently increased in number, there can be no doubt that a right to their shares has indefeasibly vested in these particular children. But then it is said there is a possibility of the birth of other children, who, as members of the class, would be entitled to a share. All I have to say on this point is, that there are no other children here except those who are entitled to payment, and that the testator's direction to pay cannot be suspended on a mere hypothesis.

It is unnecessary for us to decide whether there must be any divestiture and payment in the event of other children coming into existence. It will be time enough to determine that question when other children are born. But I must say I am strongly of opinion that no children except those actually in existence at the death of the life-rentrix are entitled to participate in this fund. There are cases on both sides. There are cases in which presumptive issue have been held to be eligible beneficiaries. And there are other cases in which children subsequently born have been held excluded. On the one hand, we have the well-known case of Scheniman v. Wilson, June 25, 1828, 6 S. 1019, and Shaw v. Shaw, 1841, in note 6 S. 1149. On the other hand, we have the case of Wood v. Wood, 1861, Jan. 18, 1861, 23 D. 338 (33 Scot. Jur. 177), in which Lord Cowan, delivering the opinion of the Court, reviews some of the previous authorities. I am of opinion that the present case falls within the latter class, and I am therefore confirmed in this view that I find that had the case occurred in England it must have been decided in the way which I have indicated—See Jarman on Wills, 3d ed. ii. 141, et seq. At the death of the life-rentrix there were two children here who had attained the age of twenty-five. According to the law of England the effect of that reflected back on those who had not attained the age, but at the same time fixed the number of the class who were to take the fund. Now, without saying that this case necessarily falls under the rule of law understood in England, I think that there is so much force in what is said by the Vice-Chancellor (Malins) in Gimblet v. Purton, 1871, L. R. 12 Eq. 427, that I should readily adopt it as the ratio of my judgment if I required to give “Experience has shewn me,” he says, “the sound sense of the rule, and the object of the law is to make property vest as early as possible, so that the persons to whom it is given may know what they have to expect, and so that the fund available at the earliest period.” In this case it would be a

No. 119. grievous hardship to this family, looking to the age of the father, and to the circumstances of the children, if the trustees were to be compelled to hold the fund for ten, fifteen, or it might be even twenty years, until the impossibility of other children being born was determined by the father's death.

May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

Holding these views, I am not prepared to follow the case of Scheniman v. Wilson and require the parties to find caution before receiving payment of their shares.

LORD ORMDALE.—It appears to me that there is raised in this case a question of nicety and difficulty. In order to arrive at its true solution the intention of the testator, which is the governing rule in this as in all such cases, must be ascertained so far as it has been expressed in, or can be inferred from, his deed of settlement, and be given effect to.

According to his deed of settlement £20,000 forms the subject of its first purpose. He there directs that upon the death of his sister Mrs Douglas (reads the direction in the fourth purpose, quoted supra, p. 755). Nothing could be well be plainer or more explicit than this bequest. It is not made to certain children specifically named, nor is it made to the children who may be born at a particular marriage, but generally to "all the children of my brother Isaac Buchanan, procreated or to be procreated." Why, therefore, should that be limited, contrary to the ordinary meaning of the words employed, to be limited to children alive or born prior to the attainment by one of them, if a son, of the age of twenty-five, or the attainment of that age or marriage of one of them, if a daughter? The testator has attached no such restrictive condition to his bequest, but, on the contrary, expressly destines it to all the children of his brother, whether created or to be procreated.

But, then, he provides that the several children's shares should be payable to the sons on their attaining twenty-five years of age, and to the daughters on their attaining that age or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and, founding on this provision, it was argued for the respondents that the testator must have intended to restrict his bequest to the children of his brother procreated before the attainment by any of them of the age of twenty-five if sons, or of that age or being married if daughters. But why this should be so I have not been able to see. It would not be correct to say that other children no share of the bequest can vest or be payable to any of the children intended to be benefited so long as the testator's brother Isaac Buchanan is alive, although not only some but all of his existing children might in the meantime be greatly more than twenty-five years of age, and in the case of daughters be either married or more than that age; for this need not be so except in a sense which it is unnecessary, as it would, I think, be erroneous, to attribute to the testator. The shares of Isaac Buchanan's children may in another sense be thought the true, sense be held to vest in and be payable to the children as they respectively reach the age of twenty-five in the case of sons, or that age or being married in the case of daughters, and yet there need be no exclusion of their participation along with them in the £20,000 of any children the testator's brother Isaac Buchanan may subsequently have. There is such a thing in the law as the vesting of provisions or legacies in children as a class, on their arriving at a certain age, subject to the amount of the benefit being diminished by the coming subsequently into existence of other children entitled to participate along with them. Such a mode of vesting has been frequently given effect to, and was distinctly recognised and assumed to be indisputable, but this Court and the House of Lords, in the case of Carleton v. Thomson, 11th Feb. No. 119. 1865, and 30th July 1867, 3 Macph. 514, and 5 Macph. H. of L. 151. There could, therefore, be no inconsistency in holding that the shares of the £20,000 in question accruing to the existing children of the testator's brother Isaac Buchanan will vest as the sons reach the age of twenty-five, and the daughters at age or are married, subject to the contingency of a divestiture to some extent in the event of there being more children of Mr Isaac Buchanan.

May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

And just as little need any difficulty be supposed to arise in regard to the shares of the existing children being payable and paid when and as they become vested rights, for that could quite well be effected by the children, on receiving payment of their shares, finding caution to repeat so much as might be necessary to satisfy the claims of other children, if any, that might thereafter come to exist and be entitled to participate in the £20,000. This was the course directed by the Court to be followed in the cases of Shaw v. Shaw, 6 Sh. 1149, and Beniman v. Wilson, 6 Sh. 1019, the circumstances of which were in all essential respects, so far as they bear on the question now under consideration, the same as those of the present case; and the cases referred to are all the more valuable as precedents for the present case, considering that they were cited and recognised as authorities, both in this Court and the House of Lords, in the subsequent and comparatively recent case of Carleton v. Thomson, to which reference has already been made. They, as well as the principles they embody, are also recognised with approval in the case of Blackwood v. Dykes and Others, 11 February 1833, 11 Sh. 443 (5 Scot. Jur. 269), and June 11, 1833, 11 S. 9 (5 Scot. Jur. 425).

Nor am I satisfied that any of the other cases, Scotch or English, which were cited and apparently relied on by the respondents at the debate, are of an adverse description. The case of Wood and others v. Wood, 23 D. 338, is certainly not so, for there the bequest was, not to children "procreated or to be procreated," but generally to nephews and nieces, the children of two brothers of the testator, which, in the circumstances which there occurred, was held to denote children existing at the death of the liferentrix of the fund, and not children subsequently born. But it is clear, I think, judging from the observations and reasoning of the learned Judges in that case as reported, that the judgment would have been different if the bequest had been, as here, to children "procreated or to be procreated." Thus, the Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) takes care to say that, while he decided, as he did, in favour of the children existing at the death of liferentrix, "it is open in every case to gather from the deed evidence of a different purpose, and to hold, if the deed affords sufficient warrant for the conclusion, that it was not the children at a particular date, but the whole children born or to be born during their father's lifetime, who were intended to be included." Lord Cowan, again, who delivered the judgment of the Court, remarking that of Lord Kinloch under a reclaiming note, made observations to the same effect; and, in particular, he observed that the cases cited as being adverse to that judgment "had mostly reference to questions under settlements which contained clear destinations to children born or to be born, or were so expressed as to lead to that inference." In place, therefore, of the case of Wood v. Wood being an authority against, it rather appears to me to be one favourable to the view which I have adopted in the present case, where the bequest is expressly to children "procreated or to be procreated," or, to use the words of Lord Kinloch and Cowan, "born or to be born."

No. 119.

May 26, 1877.
 Buchanan's
 Trustees v.
 Buchanan.

Neither am I satisfied that the English authorities on which the respondent founded can be held to be clearly or conclusively favourable to them. Take, for example, the case of Whitbread v. Lord St John, 1804, 10 Vesey, 152, which was that chiefly relied upon by the respondents. It is not stated in the report that Lady St John, in favour of whose children the bequest was made, was dead, although this may be inferred as well from the statement of the case given in the report, as from the circumstance that Lord St John alone, and not his wife, appears to have been a party to the discussion; and, if so, the decision which was pronounced cannot be said to be adverse to the view I have adopted in the present case. But, assuming that Lady St John was alive, as possibly she was, still I would hesitate to say that the case is conclusive of the present question. I find that Mr Jarman in his treatise on Wills (p. 165 of 2d vol. 3d ed.) makes remarks in reference to the question which has here arisen—"We are now to consider how the construction is affected by the words 'to be born' or 'to be begotten,' annexed to a devise or bequest to children; with respect to which the established rule is that if the gift be immediate, so that it would, but for the words in question, have been confined to children, if any, existing at the testator's death, they will have the effect of extending it to all the children who shall ever come into existence, since, in order to give to the words in question some operation, the gift is necessarily made to comprehend the whole;" and the case of Mogg v. Mogg, 1 Mer. 654, to which reference is made in support of this passage, seems to bear it out. Mr M'Laren also, in his book on Wills (vol. i. p. 654-5), while he notices all the cases bearing on the point, as well English as Scotch, states the law, as I read his remarks, to the same effect. But independently of the text writers, either English or Scotch, I should feel myself bound by the decisions of our own Court in the cases of Shaw v. Shaw and Scheniman v. Wilson, the authority of which has not, so far as I am aware, been ever impugned.

As to the date when the shares of the £20,000, including any surplus interest arising therefrom after satisfying Major Douglas' annuity, vested, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it must be held to be on the children, whenever born, of Mr Isaac Buchanan respectively reaching the age of twenty in the case of sons, or on their attaining that age or being married, whichever of these events should happen first, in the case of daughters. Nor do I very much see how, in opposition to this view, it can be held, as was contended for by some of the parties, that vesting took place on the death of the life-rentrix Mrs Buchanan or Douglas, when it is borne in mind that it is expressly declared by the testator that "in the event of the decease of any one or more of the children, whether before or after their aunt, the said Jane Buchanan or Douglas leaving issue, such issue shall receive equally among them the share to which their respective parents would have been entitled had they survived; and the shares of one or more of the children dying after their said aunt without issue shall accrue to and be equally divided among the survivors." There is here a destination over and also a survivorship clause, both of which might be defeated, and, at any rate, could not with certainty be carried into effect on the footing of vesting taking place sooner than on the children attaining twenty years of age in the case of sons, or, in the case of daughters, attaining that age or being married.

The remaining question, whether the whole of the £20,000, capital as well as income, must remain intact as long as Major Douglas lives, in order to see ment of his annuity, is not, I think, attended with any real difficulty, except, No. 119.

 rhaps, in regard to the precise amount of capital that ought to be retained by : trustees to meet the annuity. But to hold that the whole of the £20,000 May 26, 1877.
 st be so retained would be as unreasonable as it would be obviously unneces- Buchanan's
 y. The object of the testator as regards Major Douglas' annuity will be en- Trustees v.
 dly satisfied by the retention, not of the whole £20,000, but merely of so Buchanan.
 ch of that sum as will be sufficient to secure payment of the annuity.
 0,000 was suggested as sufficient, and as I cannot see any reason for thinking ould not, that may be held to be the sum which the trustees should be orised to retain, power being reserved to them, as the Lord Ordinary has rved it, to expend any surplus income arising on the £20,000 for behoof of c Buchanan's children respectively till they attain twenty-five years of age he case of sons, or that age or are married in the case of daughters.

ORD GIFFORD.—The Lord Ordinary says that he has found a good deal of culty in construing the trust-settlement of the late Peter Buchanan, and in rmining its exact effect. I have felt the same difficulty, and although I : ultimately come to agree substantially in the result which the Lord Ord-
 : has reached—I mean in the mode in which the trustees are bound to dis-te the fund in medio—there is one question upon which I have great culty in agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, and as to which I am disposed, can be done, to reserve any rights which may hereafter emerge, that is, the is which may possibly arise to future children of Mr Isaac Buchanan in case such children should hereafter be born.

the first place, I am of opinion that no right to any part of the £20,000
 l vest in any of the children of Isaac Buchanan until the death of Mrs glas, who was the liferentrix of the whole sum, because the deed directs it is not till that event that the trustees are to hold and apply the said sum 20,000 and the income and proceeds thereof to and for behoof of the child-of Isaac Buchanan (excluding his eldest son Peter). If any of Isaac anan's children had predeceased Mrs Douglas, who died on 9th May 1875, nk such predeceasing children would have taken no share of the £20,000, ough their issue, if any, would have taken under the express words of the the second place, I do not think that the subsistence of the annuity to r George Douglas of itself prevents either the vesting or the payment of rovision in favour of Isaac Buchanan's children. The deed expressly profor the payment or application of the provision subject to the burden of annuity. This can only mean that provision shall be made for the annuithat is, that such sum shall be retained as is sufficient to meet the ty. It goes no further than that. Therefore, I am of opinion that making due and reasonable provision for this annuity (and I agree if £10,000 is retained to meet the annuity this will be more sufficient to secure the annuitant) the provision of the deed shall take t although the annuity to Major Douglas will not of itself prevent either ig or payment, to a reasonable extent, of the £20,000, I am of opinion that as to the children of Isaac Buchanan who survived Mrs Douglas, no could vest in any of them until they respectively attained the age of y-five, or in the case of daughters until they attained that age or were

No. 119. married, for not only are the shares not payable before these dates or events, but there is a declaration that in the event of the decease of any of the children after Mrs Douglas, and without issue, the shares of such deceasers shall be equally divided among the survivors. I think this conditional clause of survivorship prevents the vesting until the age of twenty-five or the marriage in the case of the daughters. In all cases, however, the trustees have power to expend the interest of the shares or to advance even before the vesting, in terms of the deed.

May 26, 1877.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan.

As I have already said, the main point upon which I have found difficulty the question, who are the ultimate beneficiaries embraced under the words "the lawful children of my brother, the said Isaac Buchanan, procreated or to be procreated" ? and the question is, whether these words will not include children who may yet be born to Mr Isaac Buchanan either of his present or of a future marriage. Mr Isaac Buchanan, I understand, is a gentleman sixty-six or sixty-seven years of age.

It seems to have been ruled in England that in bequests to the children of a living person the legacy is restricted to the children only who are born at the time of payment of the bequest, and will not include children who may be born after the date of payment or distribution, and this even where the bequest is to the children of a living person. It seems also to have been held that where a bequest is payable to such children at different dates, for example, at the respective majorities, it is the date of the first payment which will fix the number of legatees so as to exclude children born after that date. I feel the weight of these authorities, and although the words of the will in the present case are not precisely the same as those which occurred in any of the cases which I have observed, I am not prepared to take the present case out of the general rule so established.

At the same time, I am not prepared to say that the rule will override the expressed intention of the testator, wherever that will is so expressed as to make it clear and unambiguous that he intended children born even after the date of payment or distribution to participate in the bequest, for example, by having a claim of repetition from those who had already received payment. Indeed, I think such will must receive effect, so that if the will in the present case, instead of merely saying children to be procreated, which may mean children procreated before the term of payment, had said children to be procreated at any time during the life of Isaac Buchanan although after the term of payment, I could not have denied effect to an intention so expressed. The present case, however, seems to fall under the English authorities, and, therefore, though not without hesitation, I agree in the finding of the Lord Ordinary that "the only persons entitled to participate in the sum of £20,000 settled by the truster are the children of Isaac Buchanan alive at the death of Mrs Jane Buchanan or Douglas other than James Toronto Buchanan."

I am not sure, however, whether in the present process it is necessary to decide this question, or to pronounce an express finding excluding the right of the, as yet, unborn children. I think it would be enough in this present process of distribution of the fund in medio to find that the pursuers, Peter Buchanan and the trustees, are bound to distribute and pay the fund in medio (subject to the claims of the children to and among the children of Isaac Buchanan now existing, and that the children respectively attain the age of twenty-five, and are not bound and are not entitled to withhold payment or to set apart or retain any sum in respect of the possibility that Mr Isaac Buchanan may yet have other or additional children.

ould meet the necessities of the present case, and avoid deciding absolutely No. 119.
 ainst unborn children who cannot of course appear and claim in this process, May 26, 1877.
 d who can only be represented by the trustees as holders of the fund. With Buchanan's is suggested variation, and also with the variation that no more need be re- Trustees v.
 ned to meet the annuity than £10,000, I am for adhering to the interlocu- Buchanan.
 of the Lord Ordinary. I do not think that the existing children of Isaac chanan who have attained twenty-five or those in their right are bound, as a addition of instant payment, to find security or caution of any kind or to any ent to meet the possible case of additional children being hereafter born to ac Buchanan. I think to require such caution would be to deny effect to the ress direction of the truster, who appoints payment to be made at dates which y be long before the death of Mr Isaac Buchanan.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—" Find that the said trustees are bound to pay and divide the sum of £20,000, settled by the trus-ter, to and among the children of Isaac Buchanan now alive, excepting Peter Toronto Buchanan, and that at the terms of payment fixed by the deed, and are not entitled to retain or withhold any sum in respect that the said Isaac Buchanan may yet have other or additional children either of his present or of any future marriage; and find that no right vests in any such child until it reaches the age of twenty-five: Find that at the death of the defender a ninth vested in each of Jane Milligan Buchanan and Margaret Douglas Buchanan, who were then twenty-five years of age: Find that another one-ninth share vested in Harris Buchanan when he attained twenty-five on 10th April 1876: Find that after setting aside the sum of £10,000 in order to secure the annual sum of £300 per annum to Major Douglas, payment must be made to such of the children as have attained the age of twenty-five of one-ninth part of such proportion of the sum of £20,000 as may be available for division; and that until the other children respectively attain the age of twenty-five they are not entitled to demand payment of any interest thereon, but without prejudice to the power of the trustees to expend the interest of said shares for their behoof until they attain the age of twenty-five: Find all the parties to the cause entitled to their expenses out of the sum of £10,000 available for division," &c.

ERSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—T. & R. B. RANKEN, W.S.—JOHN MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND, Pursuer.—Balfour—Mackintosh—Darling. No. 120.
 SIR CHARLES WILLIAM AUGUSTUS ROSS, Bart., Defender.—
Asher—H. Johnston.

May 26, 1877.
 Duke of
 Sutherland v.
 Ross.

Salmon Fishery Acts—Obstruction to the Passage of Salmon—River Fishings—Property.—Part of a barony consisted of a long narrow island in the estuary, between which and the shore there existed a side channel dry at low water. Prior to 1857 a long stretch of foreshore extended down the estuary to the seaward end of the island, forming a bank which prevented the water from the main channel of the river at low tide from spreading over a large stretch of low ground called the bay of K. A breach having been made in this foreshore by the stream and tide, in consequence of the erection of a weir on the opposite side of the estuary, the proprietor of the barony and salmon-fishings, in 1862, raised the foreshore by an artificial embankment which, in 1868, he raised to a height of sixteen inches above the original level of the foreshore. The embankment was found to afford him additional facilities for salmon-fishing.
 The proprietor of salmon-fishings on the river having in 1875 objected to the

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

embankment as an illegal obstruction to salmon passing up the river, but that the proprietor was entitled to restore the foreshore; and (2) that the bankment, whether regarded by itself or as affording to the proprietor great facilities for the capture of salmon, was not in fact an obstruction in the sense of the Salmon Fishery Acts.

Observed that even if the operations had been made in alveo the upper heritors would have had no title to object to them except in so far as they were obstructions to salmon.

Opinion (per Lord Gifford), that the proprietor was entitled to gain land from his own foreshore and use it for the purposes of salmon-fishing.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.
R.

THIS action was raised by the Duke of Sutherland, as proprietor of salmon-fishings on the river Shinn and others of the upper waters that flow into the kyle of Oykel or Sutherland, against Sir Charles W. A. Ross Balnagown, Baronet, an inferior heritor, proprietor of the lands of Bonar and fishings ex adverso thereof in the kyle of Sutherland, to have it declared that certain artificial works erected by the defender within the limits of the estuary of the kyle of Sutherland were "fixed obstructions to the passage of salmon and other fish of the salmon kind," or others, and that they were erections made and maintained by the defender with a view of unduly facilitating the capture of salmon by him at his fishing stations at Bonar to the prejudice of the pursuer. The summons further concluded that the erections in question should be removed.

Messrs Pourie and Pitcaithley, tenants of the Bonar fishings, were called as defenders, but did not appear.

The river Oykel, which divides the counties of Ross and Sutherland, receives as it flows from west to east the Cassley, the Shinn, and other streams. Its estuary is known as the kyle of Oykel or Sutherland or Dornoch Firth. The kyle is navigable for vessels of 150 to 200 tons as far as Bonar Bridge, and for smaller craft for some distance farther. It runs for ten miles above Bonar Bridge.

At Bonar Bridge the kyle narrows to a width of about 100 yards. Below Bonar Bridge on the Sutherland shore, which belongs to the estate of Skibo, the banks of the kyle are abrupt and rocky, and have a natural tendency to throw the stream somewhat on the opposite shore. On the Ross-shire shore, which belongs to the defender's estate of Bonar, the kyle is low-lying and the banks of a soft alluvial nature. On this side, at a point about 150 yards below Bonar Bridge, a long narrow strip of land known to the fishermen as the "green island," and extending to about 100 yards in length, and varying from 10 to 50 yards in breadth, has, by the action of the tide and of winter spates from the upper waters, been gradually separated from the mainland. At a point a little below the lower end of this island the kyle on the Bonar side spreads out into a wide and very shallow bay called Kincardine Bay. By the separation of the "green island" from the Bonar shore a narrow channel or gullet has been formed 20 to 30 yards wide leading from the upper end of Kincardine Bay into the main channel of the kyle just below Bonar Bridge. This side channel is dry at low water, and at its upper end a raised beach from 1 to 2 feet above low-water mark in the main channel joins the upper end of the island to the mainland. This beach, which is always covered in ordinary states of the tide within little more than an hour of the tide beginning to flow, is often covered even at low tide when the upper waters are in flood. After the tide has risen above the raised beach the upper end of this side channel forms a passage for fish from Kincardine Bay into the main channel of the kyle, and so to the upper waters.

The main and navigable channel of the kyle at low water runs close to the Sutherland shore.

The erections objected to by the pursuer were :—First, An embankment marked A B on the plan referred to in the action, erected on the raised beach joining the upper end of the “green island” to the mainland. It consisted of a row of piles driven into this beach and supported on both sides by laid stones. It rose about four feet from the surface of the beach and to within about one foot of high water of ordinary spring tides; second, an embankment, marked F H on the plan, about 25 yards in length, commencing at the lower end of the “green island,” and continuing seawards along the edge of the low-water channel of the kyle. This embankment consisted of two parallel rows of piles, about five feet apart, joined together by cross ties, the intervening space being filled with stones, and both sides being pitched with laid stones at a slope of one in three. The top of this embankment formed a raised pathway two feet four inches above low-water mark, and at two places landing-stages for hauling nets had been formed. The pursuer averred that both these structures constituted obstructions in the sense of the Salmon Fisheries Acts¹ to the free passage of salmon up the kyle. And particularly that, by the lower erection F H salmon coming up the kyle were turned aside into the bay of Kincardine, and thereafter, being stopped by the upper erection, A B, were compelled to turn back and seek a way into the main channel to the seaward of the lower end of F H, from which point, if they went up the main channel, they had to run the gauntlet of the defender’s nets at his station on the “green island” and the embankment F H, and of those of the Skibo fishers on the opposite shore.

No. 120.
May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

The pursuer further averred that the embankment F H supplied and was intended to supply means for the defender taking additional shots of salmon at a place where, but for its erection, he could not take such shots, or, at any rate, could not take such shots so effectually or for such long period at each tide.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The erections complained of being of the character of obstructions prohibited by the statutes, and being within a river and its estuary, and in a locality falling within the prohibitions of the statutes, are illegal, and ought to be removed. (2) Separatim, the structures or erections are illegal, and ought to be removed, in respect that they are fitted and designed unduly, and by artificial means, to facilitate the capture of salmon by the defender and his tenants.

The defender maintained (1) that what was known as the “green island” was, within the years of prescription, been joined to the mainland by a low ridge at its upper end, which had only recently been broken through by the action of the tide and of floods, and that in building the embankment A B, which he had done to assist in preserving the “green island” from further encroachments, he had only replaced what was there before. (2) That formerly a continuous bank of shingle ran from the lower end of the island as far as the Black Scaup point, a distance of more than a mile down the river. That this bank, which was dry at low water, separated the main low-water channel of the kyle from Kincardine Bay; and in consequence of the erection in 1837 and extension in 1857 of a dyke on the Skibo side running obliquely into the kyle for some distance across of the lower end of the island the main stream of the kyle, which had a natural tendency to strike against the Bonar shore, and needed this bank to retain it in its proper channel, had been deflected on to the Skibo bank, and had ultimately about the year 1862 burst through and forced ¹ 424, c. 11; 1427, c. 6; 1469, c. 38; 1477, c. 73; 1488, c. 16; 1489, c. 1563, c. 68; 1579, c. 89; 1581, c. 3; 1685, c. 20; 1705, c. 2; 25 and 26 c. 97; and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 123.

No. 120. its way into Kincardine Bay; that the result of this deflection of the water and threatened formation of a new channel of the kyle through Kincardine Bay was most detrimental to the defender's fishings, both at the "green island" and at the Black Scaup, and that accordingly he had proceeded to make up the breach formed in the natural bank, which was part of his own foreshore, and to which he had right under his titles.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

The defender pleaded that the erections complained of did not come within the prohibitions of the salmon fisheries statutes, and were a lawful exercise of his rights of property, and necessary for the protection of his property and fishings.

A proof was led, in which the defender failed to establish his averments as to the erection A B.

With regard to the erection F H, it was established that the Skibo weir was erected in 1837, and strengthened and extended in 1857; that prior to 1857 a firm bank of shingle had extended from the end of the "green island" as far as the Black Scaup; that, though in no place more than one foot above low-water mark in the main channel, and in some places probably less, it was sufficient to confine the main channel in its proper course so as to cause it to run in a sort of canal and to prevent its breaking into Kincardine Bay, which was always dry for a considerable time both before and after low water, notwithstanding that the bottom of the bay was three feet below the low-water level in the main channel; that the bank was burst through shortly before 1862 near the end of the "green island;" that this breach was attributable to the deflection of the water by the Skibo weir; that in 1862 this breach was made up by the defender, care being taken not to raise the artificial work above the level of the former natural beach; that further breaches occurred in subsequent years, and were made up in 1864 and 1866 and 1868 by an extension of the embankment; and that in 1868, the first embankment being thought insufficient, it was strengthened and raised about sixteen inches to give it greater stability.

It was further proved that, though not made for the purpose of facilitating the shooting of the nets at the Bonar station, and not used for that purpose for some time after its completion, it was at the date of the action and had been for some years so used with beneficial results to the defender's fishings; that no objection was taken by the pursuer to the erection of F H until after the erection of A B, which was not till the summer of 1874. The first objection was intimated in the autumn of 1875.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d December 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the bulwark, first mentioned in the summons, erected at or near Bonar Bridge, and marked A B on the plan produced along with the summons and referred to in the condescendence, is a sufficient obstruction to the passage of salmon and other fish of the salmon kind, and is situated within the limits of the river Oykel and its tributary streams, including the estuary thereof, and is illegal, and ought to be removed; and decerns and ordains the defender to remove the same within six months from the date hereof: Quoad ultra assoilizes the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds nevertheless the party entitled to expenses." *

* "OPINION.—With regard to the erection between the north end of the island and the bank, marked A B on the plan, I think the result of the evidence is that this erection operates, or may, and probably does, operate as an obstruction to the passage of salmon; and as it was recently made and immediately objected to by the pursuer, whose title to complain of it is clear, I have no difficulty in giving decree for its removal.

"With regard to the erection at the south end of the island, marked F H

The pursuer reclaimed.

The defender intimated his acquiescence in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, so far as relating to the erection A B.

Argued for the pursuer;—There could be no doubt that the erections

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

a plan, I think the pursuer's case has not been established. This erection no doubt facilitates the capture of fish by affording standing ground to the fishermen, and it probably extends and improves the natural standing ground which existed in the same locality before the change in the current caused by the embankment on the Skibo bank. But except by facilitating the capture of fish, by a mode of fishing which is in itself unobjectionable, I do not think it is proved that the erection is an obstruction to the passage of fish. In considering the defence, the long period during which the erection was allowed to stand without objection has not been without influence on my mind. The first erection was made fourteen years ago, and the latest change upon it, which is, I think, upon reasonable evidence, to have been rendered necessary by the variation of the current, was made eight years ago. I do not say that the acquiescence thence inferable would have been sufficient to bar the pursuer from objecting, after such lapse of time, to an erection clearly proved to be a considerable obstruction to the passage of fish. But in considering conflicting evidence with regard to the probable operation of such an erection as that in question, and made under the circumstances which existed, and which undoubtedly, in my opinion, warranted some such erection for the conservation or correction of what the current had recently carried, and was continuing to carry, by lapse of time, without complaint stated, is, I think, an important topic which affects the initial presumption and onus, and warrants some leaning in favour of what exists, and against the objection stated to it after what may be reasonably termed a settled state of possession had been established. It is serious, and it appears from the evidence in this case that although the erection immediately in question may be, and probably is, of an unusually substantial description, erections of a similar character, and for a similar purpose, are usual in the estuaries of rivers. Now, when the proprietor of a fishing has erected such an erection without objection, and no complaint has been made against its existence or use for a considerable number of years, it is, I think, reasonable to assume that he on his part may have made arrangements with the fishermen, and that they on their part have arranged their business on the footing of its continuance, and so that much inconvenience and substantial hardship would result to them from its removal. I do not say or think that this consideration ought to weigh more heavily, or to be pressed further against an objector who tardily urges his complaint than this—that it raises a more or less strong presumption against the objection to begin with, and to a corresponding extent increases the onus upon the objector to overcome the presumption, which presumption has been raised or strengthened, by evidence to establish the validity of the objection. I do not forget that the objection, though the statement of it may be prompted by private interest, itself rests on public grounds; but I am nevertheless of opinion that the evidence in support of such an objection ought to be considered with reference to any considerable delay in bringing it forward, and that if the objector was from the first and all along in a position to urge it if founded. For the objection, although of a quasi public character, is nevertheless such as the law leaves to be stated and enforced by private persons on the prompting of private interest, the assertion of which is, if not the only, certainly the most obvious and satisfactory criterion of its existence, at least in such a case as that which we have here to consider. These considerations are, I think, more forcible when the question raised by the objection is one of alleged nuisance, as, for example, whether a particular erection is some inches higher or some feet longer than it ought to have been, or generally of such a character as to give rise to a reasonable difference of opinion.

Considering and weighing (in the spirit which I have endeavoured to maintain) the evidence respecting the erection at the tail of the island, and where it is proved that a natural embankment or ridge of sand and gravel of

No. 120. A B and F H together constituted an obstruction in point of fact to the passage of salmon from Kincardine Bay to the upper waters, and so came within the prohibitions of the statutes. But even if A B were removed F H remained such an obstruction, though to a lesser extent. For the whole of its length, until the tide rose above it, it blocked the passage of fish from Kincardine Bay into the main channel. Being turned by the tide they would run up the channel behind the island, and finding not sufficient water to carry them over the beach at its upper end would have to return and find a way into the channel at the lower end of F H. and thereafter be exposed to the nets on both sides instead of escaping them. There could be no doubt that whatever might be said about a fortification on a natural bank, F H was truly erected for the purpose of improving the fishing, and for nothing else. And the defender was not entitled to make erections which could impede the passage of fish, however slightly, for that purpose.¹ A tow-path had been already expressly pronounced an illegal erection.²

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

Argued for the defender;—Now that A B was removed there was no pretence for calling F H, taken separately, an obstruction within the scope of the statutes. The pursuer was forced to put his case as high as that that anything whatever placed in the water which could by any possibility even deflect the course of a salmon was illegal. But there was no authority for such a stretch of the statutes. If the cases cited in support of the pursuer's argument were examined it would be found that they all related either to fixed engines for the direct capture of fish, or to weirs or weirs placed in rivers to prevent the passage of fish with the purpose of obstructing them in order that they might be caught by other means. But the present case did not come within either category. It was an erection on the foreshore, and in no way prevented the passage of fish from the upper water. The way for them was just as clear on either side as it was when the island stood there alone. Much stress was laid on the case of Forbes v. Smith,³ as establishing that a tow-path or gangway in the alveus of a river was illegal. But (1) F H was not in the alveus; and (2) the case of Forbes v. Smith only found that a proprietor of salmonings on a private river, who had no right of property in the bank or alveus, was not entitled to erect a tow-path in the alveus with the effect of deflecting the water and injuring the banks of an ex adverso riparian owner. The case was not between rival proprietors of fishings, but purely and simply like the case of Jackson v. Marshall,⁴ the case of appreciable size and utility for fishing purposes formerly existed, I am of opinion that I ought not to pronounce it to be an illegal obstruction to the passage of fish, as distinguished from a facility for capture by legitimate fishing. In respect to this erection, therefore, I shall hold that the pursuer has not discharged the onus which was upon him, and assoilzie the defender. Regarding the result of the whole case as one of divided success, I shall not give expression to either party.

¹ Duke of Queensberry v. Marquis of Annandale, 1771, M. 14,279; Duke of v. Littles, 1797, M. 14,282; Kinnoul v. Hunter, 1802, M. 14,301; Gair v. M'William, 1846, Lord Corehouse's opinion, 10 D. 666, note.

² Forbes v. Smith, Feb. 19, 1824, 2 S. 721, June 28, 1825, 1 W. and 3 J. 113; Hay v. Magistrates of Perth, Dec. 20, 1861, 24 D. 230, 34 Scot. Jur. 118; May 12, 1863, 1 Macph. H. of L. 41, 35 Scot. Jur. 463, 4 Macq. 535, and Chancellor's opinion, ad fin.; Jackson v. Marshall, July 4, 1872, 10 Macph. 44 Scot. Jur. 506; Morris v. Bicket, May 20, 1864, 2 Macph. 1082, 36 Jur. 529, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. H. of L. 44, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 47, 38 Jur. 547; Colquhoun v. Orr Ewing, Jan. 26, 1877, supra, p. 344.

³ Supra, note 2.

⁴ Supra, note 2.

riparian proprietor objecting to an erection in alveo ex adverso of his property to its detriment. Here, however, the pursuer's only title was that he was proprietor of fishings higher up the kyle. What the defender really had done was not to erect an obstruction, but to restore his foreshore to the condition in which it was prior to the breaches in it caused by the deflection of the current by the Skibo embankment. This he was entitled to do. If he had done more than restore the natural bank it was only because his first work was insufficient for the purpose of resisting the weight of water which now came against it.¹ The pursuer could not now be heard to object to this small addition to the original embankment after having remained silent since 1868.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My Lords, this case raises some interesting questions to the views of law applicable to the rights of proprietors of salmon-fishings.

Originally presented, it was a case of very considerable difficulty; but now that the parties have agreed that one of the two alleged obstructions shall be removed it does not appear to me that the question in regard to the lower obstruction is really, when it is looked at with attention, attended with much perplexity or doubt. I need not go into a long detail of the locality, which is familiar to your Lordships and the parties. It seems that this ground of Sir Charles Ross is opposite property belonging, or which did belong, to Mr Dempster of Skibo. It is situated on the river Oykel, and the salmon-fishing there, as is well known, is a very valuable property. It is below Bonar Bridge. The Duke of Sutherland has the salmon-fishing some miles up, and is entitled, of course, to all the rights of a proprietor of salmon-fishing in respect of his property above; but he is not a riparian ex adverso proprietor, and any right which he has, therefore, apart altogether from any direct injury which he can qualify, is the right of a proprietor of salmon-fishing, and therefore having an interest in the free passage of the salmon as far as the law provides for and protects it. What he says is substantially this,—that there is a portion of the stream of the Oykel which breaks into two channels, one going round the west side of a small island in the river, and the main channel, going up on the east or north side along the Skibo bank; and he complains of two things,—first, that at the upper end of the island Sir Charles Ross, or those acting for him, had made a barrier preventing the salmon from getting up by the end of the island to the main channel of the Oykel, and that thereby the fish were scared or turned back for the reason of their not having that ordinary mode of access to the channel. Secondly, he says that in order to make that effectual Sir Charles Ross had also made a barrier along the sandbank at the lower end of the island, which had the effect that at a certain period of the tide the fish which came up that channel were obstructed from getting into the main channel of the Oykel. Now, these two things seem to be quite true. I may mention that generally the whole of this portion of the river is under water at high tide. At low tide flows over the whole of it. The operations in question affect the river only at certain periods of the tide, and these periods are very material for salmon-fishing. Now, there seems no doubt at all that the first of these obstructions at A B had the effect of turning back the fish at certain periods of the

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

¹ Mather v. Macbraire, March 14, 1873, 11 Macph. 522, 45 Scot. Jur. 337; and of Nairn v. Brodie, 1738, M. 12,779; West v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Dec. 8, 1876, supra, p. 207.

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

tide, and the effect of that obstruction and the other barrier below the island was to throw the fish back into a portion of the stream from which they had no access to the main stream without returning upon their path, and, accordingly, they were there captured by the nets of Sir Charles Ross at the point marked on the plan. If the case had stood there I do not think there is any doubt, and I concur with the Lord Ordinary entirely that this was a device altogether contrary to the rights of the upper heritors. It prevented the salmon from having a free run, according to the ordinary mode in which they were accustomed to reach the main channel; and, moreover, it was an obstruction directly struck at by the terms of the statutes relating to salmon-fishings placed within the tide and reflux of the tide, which is the very locality to which these Acts of Parliament apply. But the case has been entirely altered by Sir Charles Ross undertaking to do away with the first of these barriers, and to leave the channel at the head of the island as free as it was before. And now the question is, whether that which has been constructed at the other end of the island, above the sandbank, should be allowed to remain? According to Sir Charles Ross, this erection or bulwark—I suppose it is made of loose stones—has no other object but to counteract the effect of the stream being thrown back from an embankment made many years ago upon the Skibo side. Whether that was the sole object of the erection may possibly be doubted, but there can be no question that the effect of that embankment which was made on the Skibo side was to carry away the previous bank which had existed in the locality where this erection has been made; and Sir Charles Ross says, and says with great deal of force, that he was entitled to remedy that operation, seeing that the ex adverso proprietor had no right to injure his bank,—that he was entitled, as in a question with him, at all events, to protect his own bank, and to raise this barrier, which should have the effect of the previous bank before it was carried away. It has been said that that is not his remedy, and that he should have required the opposite proprietor to take away the embankment. Now, I greatly doubt whether the Duke of Sutherland has any interest to say that. I do not think that that is a matter with which he has any concern. If this is an illegal obstruction in the sense of the statutes then that will be quite sufficient for his purpose, whatever the object it was; but if, on the other hand, it is not, he is not in a position to object to the structure of this kind on any ground which might be competent to parties, either lower or ex adverso heritors. But, in the second place, I do not think that this plea would be sound if pleaded for an inferior heritor. There was a case referred to—the case of Jackson v. Marshall, I think,—where we prevented a proprietor from building an embankment in the alveus of the river, although it was for the purpose of preventing the washing away of his bank, in consequence of some operations which had taken place above; but there seems no doubt at all that this is on the foreshore, and not in the alveus. It is a construction which rests on ground on which the proprietor is entitled to build,—at least, in any question with a merely upper proprietor. And therefore I hold that prima facie Sir Charles Ross was entitled to do what he did for the purpose of protecting his bank; and, moreover, that if he made the structure where the bank had been previously, and made it stronger, he was entitled to do so, seeing that the bank had not proved strong enough to resist the action of the water. But then it is said that it has been raised too high—that it is a foot and a half higher than the bank ever was, &c.

result of which is that, as the tide only makes some eight or ten inches in the course of the hour, at least a couple of hours are added to the period when the salmon are unable to get across the barrier, and the result is that these salmon are kept waiting there, and fall a prey to the fishers of Sir Charles Ross. That that is the effect I think we may assume; and if Sir Charles Ross made that erection with the purpose of making a better fishing station the question is whether he was entitled to do it? I do not think it at all unlikely that he did, but then I do not think this is an obstruction in any sense contemplated by the statute. It is a mistake to suppose that everything which is erected on the foreshore, which may have the effect of altering the course of the salmon, is an obstruction of which an upper heritor is entitled to complain. That is not the meaning of the statute. An obstruction must be something which prevents a fish from getting up. If all that can be said is, that while the fish have the choice of the two channels going up, by the right or west bank, or the left or east bank, there is an intermediate place where a fish might have gone across, which has now been shut up by the operations of the defender, I do not think that is an obstruction. That the fish has to go two or three yards round in order to get to a stream is certainly not an obstruction to the passage of salmon in the sense of the statute; and it is wholly immaterial whether the result is to improve the fishing of Sir Charles Ross, seeing that if it be not an obstruction in the sense of the statute the Duke of Sutherland has no title and no interest to object to what has been done; and, subject to the provisions of the statute, Sir Charles Ross is perfectly entitled, in a question with him, by anything he pleases to put there, to improve his own chance of catching salmon. I am therefore of opinion, that there was a good and reasonable ground for, at all events, a portion of the erection complained of; but, in the second place, that, as it stands, no part of it seems to me to come up to what is necessary in order to constitute an obstruction to the passage of salmon in the sense of the salmon statutes, and that, consequently, the Duke of Sutherland has no title to complain of what has been done upon ground belonging to the defender. I should not have thought it of consequence here that this was on the foreshore, if it had been an obstruction; because, as I have already said, it is to obstructions to the passage of salmon by means of artificial erections within the flux and reflux of the tide, or in rivers, that the statutes refer; and nothing can prove that more clearly than the fact that the commissioners under the Salmon Act were instructed to fix, and have fixed, the places where the tide ebbs and flows, so as to save the necessity of the long and expensive inquiries which used to proceed between the proprietors of the salmon-fishings in such rivers. Now, the boundary of the estuary where the sea is fixed, and that is the place above which no obstruction can be erected to the passage of salmon. My Lords, these are the views, generally, which I take of this case, and they substantially coincide with those of the Lord Ordinary. I think that, with the removal of the upper obstruction, this erection is not an obstruction in the sense of the statutes, and that Sir Charles Ross is entitled to keep it there.

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.

Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

HARD ORMDALE.—The object of the action in this case is to enforce the decree by the defender of, 1st, what is called a “bulwark,” on the line marked on the plan referred to by the pursuer in article 8 of his condescendence, erected by the defender across the west channel of the river Oykel; and of, 2d, what is called a jetty or embankment, erected on the line marked, on the same

No. 120. plan, F G H, at a lower part of the river. And the pursuer concludes in his summons for declarator to the effect that these erections are fixed obstructions to the passage of salmon, and other fish of the salmon kind, and are situated within the limits of the river Oykel and its tributary streams, including the estuary thereof; or, otherwise, that the same are erections made or material enlarged and maintained by the defender, with the view of unduly facilitating the capture of salmon by him at his fishing stations at or near Bonar Bridge, to the prejudice of the pursuer and other parties possessing salmon-fishings in the river Oykel and its tributaries above Bonar Bridge.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

The Lord Ordinary has, by his interlocutor under review, decided in favour of the pursuer in regard to the first of these alleged obstructions, and against him in regard to the second. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has decided rightly.

It was not, indeed, disputed by the defender that to some, if not the whole, of its extent, the bulwark A B was erected by him, and that it operated as an obstruction to the passage of salmon as complained of by the pursuer: but, as he ultimately, in the course of the discussion, intimated that he did not object to the removal of that obstruction, it is unnecessary to say more on the subject of it. The mode of removal and the extent to which it ought to be carried may, I think, be safely left to the man of skill to be appointed by the Court, under whose immediate charge and directions the removal will be made.

In regard to the other alleged obstruction the defender makes no concession. But, if I am not greatly mistaken, the removal which is to take place of the obstruction A B has a very material bearing upon the question whether the pursuer is entitled to prevail in regard to the second obstruction F G H. As I understand his averments on record, and as I understood his arguments in the debate, the latter obstruction operated to his prejudice chiefly in consequence of the obstruction A B, so that if the latter is removed the injurious sequences alleged to result from the former will be, in a great measure, if not entirely, obviated. In accordance with this view, the pursuer says that the means of the obstruction A B, "salmon coming up the river and into the bay of Kincardine, in place of passing up by the said channel into the Oykel, close to Bonar Bridge, are compelled to turn back and go up the main channel, where they run the gauntlet not only of the nets belonging to the salmon fishery of the said Sir Charles William Augustus Ross, but also of the salmon fishery opposite on the north or east side of the kyle, belonging to Mr Sutherland Walker of Sutherland and also let to the defenders Messrs Pourie and Pitcaithley. By these means Messrs Pourie and Pitcaithley capture a larger number of salmon than they would do if the said channel were not obstructed." And again, in the second article of his condescendence, the pursuer says that "salmon coming up the kyle are turned aside into the bay of Kincardine, and thereafter, being stopped by the first obstruction before mentioned, are compelled to turn back and go up the main channel, and particularly that portion of it ex adverso of the jetty, where they are exposed to be caught by the nets on both sides of the water as aforesaid." It thus appears, on the shewing of the pursuer's plea, that the injurious effects of the second of the alleged obstructions depend much upon the first.

But, it is true, that the pursuer, after the statements which have now been quoted from article 8 of his condescendence, goes on to say,—“Further, the jetty supplies, and was intended to supply, means for the said Messrs Pourie and Pitcaithley taking two additional shots for salmon at a place where, without any artificial erection, no shot could be taken for salmon at all, or at all events, such shots could not be taken so effectually or for so long a period at each place." I doubt, however, whether this is an averment sufficiently relevant to sustain the pursuer's conclusions against the defender. It will not do for the pursuer merely to say that the defender has improved the banks of his own property so as to be better able to catch the salmon in passing, or, in the pursuer's own words, to give him the additional shots, it not being alleged that this mode of fishing is in itself illegal or objectionable. I can, therefore, very well understand how the pursuer should have allowed a period of fourteen years to elapse since the greater part of the second of the alleged obstructions was erected by the defender before bringing his action, and that it was only after the effect of the first came to be observed and felt that it occurred to him to insist for removal of the second. In this view I should have little or no hesitation in thinking, with the Lord Ordinary, that, after the lapse of time which the pursuer allowed to occur before raising the present or any action, his conclusions as regards the second alleged obstruction cannot be sustained, especially if it is not even said or proved that any complaint was in any form made on the subject until the present action was raised. It would be unfair to the defender now to compel him to restore matters to the condition in which they were before his operations commenced. The defender was entitled to believe that what he did in regard to the second alleged obstruction was not objectionable, or, at any rate, was not so objectionable as to call for any action or complaint on the part of the pursuer. He may, accordingly, in this belief, have entered into contracts and engagements with others, against the consequences of which he could not now be restored. It would be inequitable, therefore, and unfair to the defender in such circumstances, to sustain the action so far as the second of the alleged obstructions is concerned.

Nor am I satisfied on the proof that, independently of these considerations, the pursuer has succeeded in establishing his grounds of action in regard to the first and alleged obstruction. The proof is certainly not conclusively in his favour, whether the defender's object in extending the embankment F G H, or the alleged injurious effect of it on the pursuer's salmon-fishing, is considered. It nevertheless appears to me that the proof goes to shew that the object of the defender was to preserve his banks and fishing-station from being destroyed by the action of the sea, aggravated by the operations on the Skibo side, rather than to desire, or illegal attempt, to interrupt the passage of the salmon; and, if so, I am not prepared to say that this was an object which the defender was not entitled to carry into effect, the more especially as the pursuer did not interfere to prevent him, or, so far as appears, give any intimation of his disapproval. It must not be overlooked that while the pursuer had a right to salmon-fishing in the upper waters, the defender had not only a similar right at the place in question,—that is, the place where the second of the alleged obstructions was erected by him,—but also, and this, as it appears to me, is a very important consideration, a right of property in the solum or ground upon which the obstruction was erected. And, at any rate, it was expressly admitted at the debate that the erection was on the foreshore and not in the alveus of the river. It may be true that when the erection of the alleged second obstruction was commenced in 1862 the sea had encroached on, and partly submerged, the ground, but that was no reason, but the contrary, why the defender should not recover

No. 120.

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

No. 120. his property and protect it from further dilapidation. That the defender did no more than this is, I think, sufficiently established by the proof, and I would refer in particular to the evidence of the defender's witnesses, Mr Adie, Mr Lipscomb, John Ross, and George Pitcaithley, and to the pursuer's own witnesses Donald Urquhart and John Urquhart. Having regard to the statements made by these witnesses, as well as to the other evidence in the case, I must take to be proved, in point of fact, that the second alleged obstruction is substantially nothing more than a restoration de recenti of the status quo, and a necessary protection against future inroads of the sea. And if this be so I can not doubt that in point of law the defenders did not exceed their legitimate rights as illustrated by the cases of the Town of Nairn v. Brodie, Mor. 12,777 Forbes v. Smith, as decided in the House of Lords, 1 W. and S. 583, and Math and Young v. Macbraire, decided 14th March 1873, 11 Macpherson, p. 522.

There is, no doubt, some evidence to the effect that the height of the jetty or bulwark founded on by the pursuer as forming the second of the alleged obstructions complained of by him is about eighteen or twenty inches higher than the old weir, but I cannot hold this to be, in the circumstances, a sufficient reason for now interfering with it. The pursuer has not proved, and there is nothing in the proof to indicate, that these eighteen or twenty inches are in themselves injurious to the pursuer, and I do not think they can be so. Besides, it is to be presumed that it was necessary, in order to render the bulwark efficient and capable of resisting the inroads of the sea, to make it, especially at first, somewhat higher than it originally was. It has in all probability consolidated and subsided so much as to remove all ground of complaint now on the score of undue height, if indeed it could have previously been made the subject of complaint.

These are the grounds, shortly stated, upon which I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right and ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to be of the same opinion. I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be adhered to; and I will state the ground of my opinion in one or two sentences. The pursuer of this action, His Grace the Duke of Sutherland, is proprietor of certain salmon-fishings in the upper parts of the river Oykel, a good many miles from the sea. The defender is proprietor of salmon-fishings at the mouth of the Oykel and of his lands on the kyle of Sutherland or kyle of Oykel, which is the name of the estuary of the river. The tide flows several miles above Bonar Bridge. The pursuer complains that the defender has made two embankments in the kyle of the estuary below high-water mark, which embankments, the pursuer says, do obstruct the passage of salmon up and down the Oykel to and from the sea. The first of these embankments or bulwarks is described on the plan as the bank A B, and it connects the shore or mainland with the north end of a tidal island in the estuary of the Oykel. The effect of that embankment is to convert the island into a peninsula or long strip of land running down the estuary, and it is said that that is an obstruction, because, when fish ascend on the hand of the island in going up, instead of getting up the river they find themselves met by the embankment, and being obstructed in ascending they have to return, and are exposed to the nets of Sir Charles Ross' fishermen, and thus caught. The second embankment, which, however, must be taken as having a mutual relation and mutual action with the first, is at the other end of the island, and extends in the direction of the island down towards the sea. It is described on the plan as the embankment F H. Now, these two embankments, although they have a mutual relation and a mutual action, must, I think, be taken separately. The Lord Ordinary has done so, and has found that the first, the embankment A B, is illegal, and must be removed, but that the second embankment, F H, is not illegal, and that the defender is entitled to maintain it. I agree with that result. I need say very little as to the first, because the finding of the Lord Ordinary in favour of the pursuer has been acquiesced in by the defender, and that first embankment is to be removed and matters restored to their original condition at the sight of a man of skill to be named by the Court, and the result of that will be that what was formerly will be again an island in the estuary, upon both sides of which the tide will flow, and salmon will be able to ascend the Oykel on either side of the tidal island. This, of course, removes the objection that fish coming up between the island and the mainland will be met and prevented from reaching the river to a greater extent than they were by the natural inequality of the bottom or natural ridge which always existed there. And that brings me to the second question, whether the embankment at the south end of the island, stretching down the estuary, is or is not, in the sense of the statutes, as they have been interpreted by decision, an illegal obstruction to the passage of salmon. Now, I am of opinion that that second embankment, the first being removed, is not an illegal obstruction. In the first place, I think, upon the evidence and upon the common sense of the thing, it is not an obstruction in any reasonable meaning of that word. The island was always there, and, to the same extent of course, the island is an obstruction, for the fish must take either the right hand or the left, and go round the island in order to ascend the river; and the lengthening of the island, which is practically done by building this embankment on the foreshore at the south end of it, does not make the island a greater obstruction to their ascending than it was before. The amount of water that flows up or down with the tide is exactly the same; the breadth of passage which the fish have to swim in on the right hand or left is exactly the same. The only difference is that they have to pass a somewhat longer island in ascending, and I do not think that this circumstance constitutes, on any fair construction of the statutes, an obstruction to the passage of fish. As many fish may pass the river with the island lengthened as could pass on either side of the island shortened; and if Sir Charles Ross had not the salmon-fishings, or if no salmon-fishings existed at the mouth of the river, it would have been impossible for the Duke of Sutherland to say that the mere lengthening of the estuary island kept salmon from ascending to the higher reaches of the river. But then it is said that although it will not prevent salmon from swimming up on either side, it actually gives Sir Charles Ross an additional shot, or, in another view, two additional shots, at the salmon as they pass, and that is true; and that brings me to consider whether the mere arranging the foreshore or arranging the estuary and so as to have better or more shots with the net and coble than could be taken before is an illegal obstruction in the sense of the statutes. Now, I do not think it is. Suppose that the foreshore of Sir Charles Ross' land had been rough,—so covered with rocks or boulders as to prevent nets from being easily drawn there, it would be quite within his power, and perfectly legal for him, to remove these rocks or boulders from his own foreshore, and to dress the foreshore so as to make it possible to draw salmon nets upon it, with net and coble, in the usual way. There would be no obstruction to fish by removing the

No. 120.
May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

No. 120. rocks, though the effect would be that more shots were made and more fish caught, and in that sense obstructed, because you cannot obstruct fish more effectually than by catching them ; but then catching fish by the net and cobb is a legal mode of obstructing, so that this is not an obstruction in the sense of the statutes. The lengthening of the island does not stop the salmon, but merely affords a facility for salmon-fishing by net and cobb in a legal and ordinary way. But, in the second place, and even supposing that the lengthening the tide island seawards were to be held an obstruction, I am of opinion that it is proved on the evidence that substantially the so-called pier or bulwark lengthening the island is nothing more than a restoration of an old bank that was there before and I cannot help attaching great importance to the real evidence, for such appears to me, of the levels of the tide and ground here. It is not disputed that Kincardine Bay is at a lower level than the proper channels of the river Oyne so that in the flow and ebb of the tide there will always be a tendency for the water to flow, if it can get an opening at all, into the lower level of Kincardine Bay. And thus there will necessarily be a tendency to eat away, so to speak, the long bank which forms the tail of this tidal island. I think that presumption, which we can reach by the nature of the ground, is corroborated by the witnesses to whom Lord Ormidale has referred. But still further, I think it is proved that that tendency is increased by what is called the Skibo embankment on the other side ; and, on the whole, I have very little doubt that during good many years back there has been a gradual tendency of the tide and of the water of the river to get over this ridge, which originally kept it in its main channel, and to wear away the ridge, and thus abolish and take away more and more the bank or division between that main channel and Kincardine Bay. Now, I take it to be quite legal for a proprietor of the foreshore, in circumstances of this kind, to restore timeously a bank that is in the course of being eaten away, and the eating away of which is to his detriment. On the evidence I think Sir Charles Ross has not done more than fairly to restore to that extent. I agree with Lord Ormidale that the excess of eighteen inches at part—for it only applies to part—is not more than may be fairly said to strengthen the bank against a force which was found too strong for it. But then, in the third place, even though there had been no bank there before, I am of opinion that it is a legal operation of a defender with an island of this kind to lengthen seawards upon the foreshore. The island and the foreshore are both Sir Charles Ross' own property. The embankment F H is all, I think, within the proper foreshore. It is all marked as uncovered at dead low water. Now, I think it is legal for him to do that. Even if it were in the alveus I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the Duke of Sutherland, who is not an ex vires proprietor, but at some considerable distance up the river, would not be able to any title to challenge it. But we are freed from any delicacy as to operations in alveo, for the operations are on the foreshore. Now, why should not the proprietor of the foreshore, and this is a barony, gain land from his own shore ? I do not see any reason why he may not, excepting that it is alleged that so gaining land will give him an additional shot as a salmon-fishing proprietor. But what does that matter ? A man may get as many shots as he can by an erection on his own land if he does not obstruct the passage of the fish or infringe any of the laws enacted for the preservation of salmon. And therefore on all these grounds, I think the embankment F H is a legal embankment. If the Lord Ordinary puts it, it is little more than giving him additional standing

May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

and to draw his nets upon, and I see nothing illegal in smoothing the ground making it fit for standing upon when the net is being drawn. And, therefore, these three main grounds, I think the embankment F H is legal, and that it is not an illegal obstruction in terms of the statutes. These statutes have been interpreted very widely in favour of salmon rights, and things have been held to be obstructions which, in common language, could hardly be considered as such—the rattling of bones under a bridge for instance; but I do not think the statutes, in their widest possible application, apply to a case like the present.

No. 120.
May 26, 1877.
Duke of
Sutherland v.
Ross.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced :—“ Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Duke of Sutherland against Lord Young’s interlocutor of 22d December 1876, adhere to the said interlocutor; but further, remit to Mr Allan Stewart, civil engineer, to examine the bulwark marked A B on the plan No. of process, and see the same removed, in terms of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor,” &c.

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—MACLACHLAN & RODGER, W.S.—Agents.

KERR, ANDERSON, AND COMPANY, Complainers.—Fraser—Gloag.
JOHN LANG, Respondent.—Guthrie Smith—Lang.

No. 121.

June 1, 1877.
Kerr, Anderson,
& Co. v.
Lang.

See—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii. sec. 384—Objection to Fence River—Right of Way.—The Glasgow Police Act authorises the Master of Works to call upon “any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritable fence the same, or repair any chimney-stalk, . . . or any rhone, sign-board, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous.” Held (reversed judgment of Lord Rutherford, dis. Lord Deas), that this did not authorise him to call upon the proprietor of lands, bounded by a public navigable and tidal river along the bank of which the public had acquired a right of footpath by prescription, to erect a fence between the path and the river.

On 23d February 1875 the Master of Works appointed under the Glasgow Police Act* gave notice to Messrs Kerr, Anderson, and Company, as agents for Mr Monteith of Carstairs, that the north bank of the Clyde, in connection with the lands and heritages of which they were “proprietors” within the meaning of said Act, situated at or near Rutherglen Bridge eastward as far as their property extended, was in an insecure and dangerous condition, and not protected, and required them within ten days thereafter to put up a fence along the north bank of the river Clyde as far as their property extended. Kerr, Anderson, and Company objected to this notice on the grounds, inter alia, that they disputed the power of the Master of Works to make it, and that the fence required was unnecessary.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

John Lang, the procurator-fiscal for the public interest, on 19th August

Section 384 of the Glasgow Police Act provides, that “the Master of Works by notice given in manner hereinafter provided, require any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same or repair any chimney-stalk or chimney-head or can, or any rhone, signboard, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous, to his entire satisfaction.”

No. 121. 1875, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow, in which he narrated the notice and requisition by the Master of Works and objection by Kerr, Anderson, and Company, and prayed the said Dean of Guild inquire into, try, and determine the questions competently raised in the objections by Kerr, Anderson, and Company, with respect to the necessity and reasonableness of the work required to be executed, and the liability of the said proprietors for the cost thereof.

June 1, 1877.
Kerr, Anderson, & Co. v. Lang.

The Dean of Guild pronounced a decision whereby he disallowed the objections of Kerr, Anderson, and Company, and found that the notice had been competently issued, and that the work required to be done by the said notice, and specified therein, was necessary and reasonable, and that he found Kerr, Anderson, and Company, liable in the expenses of the process.

Messrs Kerr, Anderson, and Company brought the present suspension of the decision of the Dean of Guild.

The complainers averred ;—"The complainers' property is not in a dangerous condition, and is not in the said requisition or petition to the Dean of Guild alleged to be so. Further, the complainers' said property is already sufficiently fenced, and neither the river bank nor the road are, in the said petition, of the 384th section of the statute, lands or heritages of which the complainers are proprietors or occupiers. The notice and requisition by the Master of Works were ultra vires of him, and not in pursuance of the statute."

The complainers pleaded ;—1. The notice and requisition libelled, and the interlocutor libelled following thereon, are incompetent, ultra vires, and not in pursuance of the statute, in respect (1) the statute contains no warrant for requiring the complainers to fence the river Clyde ; (2) neither the river bank nor the road mentioned in the statement of facts are in the sense of the statute lands and heritages of which the complainers are proprietors or in possession ; (3) the complainers' property is not in a dangerous condition, nor said to be so in said notice or petition ; and (4) the complainers' property is already fenced. 4. The fence ordered not to be required for the safety of the public, and the complainers being under no obligation to erect it, decree of suspension and interdict falls to be pronounced as prayed for.

Answers were lodged for John Lang, procurator-fiscal.

The respondent pleaded ;—1. No record having been made up in the Dean of Guild Court the present suspension is excluded by the statute and is incompetent.* 3. The proceedings in the Dean of Guild Court having been in all respects regular, and in conformity with the statutory requirements, the note should be refused, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Refuse the note of suspension, and decerns : Finds the complainers liable to the respondent in expenses, of which allows an account," &c.†

* The 277th section of the Glasgow Police Act provides,—“Every proceeding before the Dean of Guild in pursuance of this Act shall be subject to the following rules and regulations :— Where a record is not made, the decision given by the Dean of Guild shall be final and not subject to review, objection, advocacy, or appeal, or any other form of review or stay of execution.”

† “NOTE.— The decision of the Court in the case of Bruce v. Macph. 377 (45 Scot. Jur. 257), settles that the statute applies to all lands and heritages situated within the municipal boundaries. But as the case related to a mill-lade it is not conclusive on the present, where the dam does not exist by reason of an artificial structure.

“The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the purpose of the Act was to secure

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—"Lands and heritages" did not include rivers. The kind of fencing referred to in the Act was temporary fencing round buildings in the course of construction. The fencing was not intended to be between two public places, but between a public and a private place. The public had acquired a right to use the road, but that could not entail any further obligation on the proprietor of the ground. The case of Bruce, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, was very different, as there the source of danger was a mill-lade, which was the property of the owner. The source of the danger was the river, which did not belong to the complainer but to the Crown.

Argued for the respondent;—The road, which was the property of the complainers, was dangerous, and they were bound to fence it. The case Bruce decided that the custodiers of a public road were not bound to fence it, and here the river Clyde was in the same position as a public road.

During the discussion in the Inner-House a minute was lodged adding the following facts:—The lands of Barrowfield, lying along the north side of the river Clyde, bear in the title-deeds thereof to be bounded on the south by the river Clyde. A river-wall at one time extended continuously along the whole river frontage of the complainers' property, but has been to a great extent destroyed by the current of the river, although at some places it is still tolerably entire. There is a public right of way along the river on the north side thereof by a footpath. Along the north side of this path there is a stone wall which extends for a distance of 270 yards, and there is a wooden fence along the south side of said road from the end of said wall to the eastern extremity of the said lands. The space lying between the footpath and the river is of varying steepness and breadth, supported by a retaining or a wall of varying height. The greatest breadth of the said bank between the footpath and the river is 26 feet. The least breadth is 11 feet. The complainers draw water from the river Clyde by means of pipes laid along the said bank and running out to the middle of the river. The road is used only by foot passengers. The Clyde opposite the complainers' property, and for some miles above the same, is capable of being navigated, and is in point of fact used by sand barges and rowing boats, ships built at Rutherglen are floated down to the harbour at spring tides. A weir which extends across the river upwards of a mile below the western boundary of the complainers' property renders the river incapable of being continuously navigated to the sea. At ordinary high tides the water does not come to the top of the said weir, but at spring tides there is a depth of about 3 feet 3 inches over the same. At such times the tidal water affects the river for a considerable distance above the complainers' property.

It advising,—

ORD PRESIDENT.—This is a suspension brought for the purpose of quashing the order of the Dean of Guild of Glasgow. The jurisdiction of the Dean of public from danger in the exercise of the rights belonging to them, and he decides that the property of the complainers is dangerous within the meaning of the Act. It is dangerous, because one of the uses to which it is subject cannot be enjoyed with safety in its present condition. It appears to the Lord Ordinary it would be a too limited construction of the statute to restrict it to cases where the danger arises from artificial causes.

The complainers did not press any technical objections, as they were desirous to obtain a judgment as to the effect of the statute, on the assumption that in the present state of things there is danger to the public."

No. 121.

June 1, 1877.
Kerr, Anderson, & Co. v. Lang.

No. 121.

June 1, 1877.
Kerr, Anderson,
& Co. v.
Lang.

Guild under the Glasgow Police Act is privative and not subject to review, therefore unless this order is in excess of that jurisdiction we cannot touch it. The question is, whether the Dean of Guild was in fair exercise of his jurisdiction in making the order to erect this fence, which he has done.

The complainers are the representatives of the proprietor of the property at Barrowfield, which bears in the titles to be bounded on the south by the river Clyde. The lands in question extend from Rutherglen Bridge eastwards for 100 yards, and are occupied by manufacturing premises, which are enclosed by a wall from the river. On the outside of the wall there is a public footpath running parallel to the Clyde, acquired by the public, not by grant but by prescription. In some places the path runs close to the river and at some places above it, and is supported by a retaining or river wall. At other places there is a strip of ground interposed between the path and the river. This strip is undoubtedly the property of the proprietor of Barrowfield, and it is also clear that the same proprietor is the owner of the solum of the footpath, and accordingly the whole ground outside the wall is the property of the complainers' constituents but subject to the right of way. Now, the path being above the river and close to it, the police authorities think that its use is attended with danger, and indeed nobody can doubt that it is desirable that it should be fenced in order to protect the people that use it. The question is, whether the proprietor of the ground over which the footpath runs can be compelled to erect such a fence under the Glasgow Police Act. Under the 384th section of that Act the Master of Works is empowered to require the owners of property to fence their property. To the particular terms of that clause I shall return immediately. The Master of Works called on the proprietors of Barrowfield "to put up a wooden fence along said north bank of the river Clyde as far as their property extended less than 4 feet 6 inches high, with double railing on top, and fastened to the wall in accordance with instructions given by him, and that to the satisfaction of said Master of Works." The complainers objected, and in terms of the Act the Master of Works presented an application to the Dean of Guild, in which he sets out "that the north bank of the river Clyde, in connection with the lands and heritages of which they then were 'proprietors' within the meaning of said Act, situated at or near and extending from Rutherglen Bridge eastwards as far as their property extended, was in an insecure and dangerous condition and not properly fenced;" that he had required them to fence it to his satisfaction, and that they had refused. He accordingly asks the Dean of Guild to order the parties, and "to inquire into, try, and decide the questions competently raised in said objections with respect to the necessity or reasonableness of the work required to be executed, and the liability of the said proprietors for the cost thereof, and to award the expenses of this application and subsequent proceedings against the said Kerr, Anderson, and Company, all in terms of and to the effect provided for in the said Glasgow Police Act, 1866." And upon this the Dean of Guild, on the 9th December 1875, issued this interlocutor:—"Disallow said objections, and find that the said notice has been competently issued, and that the work required to be done by said notice, and specified therein, is necessary and reasonable." The question really is, whether the original notice was competently issued—whether it was authorised by the terms of the Act of 1866. The clause of the statute on which the whole question depends is the 384th, which provides that "the Master of Works may, by notice in the manner hereinafter provided, require any proprietor or occupier of a

No. 121.

June 1, 1877.

Kerr, Anderson, & Co. v. Lang.

eritage to fence the same, or repair any chimney-stalk or flue, or any chimney-head or can, or any rhone, signboard, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous, to his entire satisfaction." We had some discussion whether the words "which appears to be dangerous" apply to all that goes before, and that therefore the Master of Works can only call on proprietors to fence their property when it is dangerous. Now, I confess I am not disposed to limit his powers in this way, for it may be very desirable to fence ground that is not absolutely dangerous, either for the sake of decency or some other good reason, and there is a large discretion given to the Master of Works to say whether property should be fenced or not. But what we have to determine is, whether the present case is a case falling under the clause of the statute. I am of opinion that it is not so.

This is a demand that the proprietor of Barrowfield shall fence the river Clyde, and that is not contemplated by the clause of the Act of Parliament. I should be sorry if the Act of Parliament required me to say that the proprietor of the land was bound to fence the river Clyde for the benefit of those who, by carelessness or good nature on his part, have been allowed to acquire a right which they must first have exercised as intruders. But considerations of hardship have to do with the interpretation of an Act of Parliament. My reason for holding that the Act of Parliament does not apply to this case is that the Clyde is not a "land or heritage." It is a public navigable river, not continuously navigable from the sea up to this point, for there is a weir some way below this which interrupts the navigation. But it is navigable, and it is tidal, for there is no doubt that spring-tides do, in spite of the weir, ascend the river as far as this point. The river, therefore, may fairly be said to be a public navigable and tidal river. Now, if that is so, the property of the alveus and the banks is vested in the Crown. Then, the source of the danger, and the reason why the Master of Works is induced to interfere, is that the Clyde is there, and is a source of danger. Therefore it seems to me that, whoever may be liable to fence the river, the proprietor of Barrowfield is not liable, for he is not proprietor of the subject which is dangerous.

The Lord Ordinary refers to the case of Bruce v. Lang. But there is an essential distinction between this case and that, and it is this: That there the danger was that was the cause of danger and required to be fenced was a private mill-race. The only defence was: Let the road trustees fence their road. The answer was that the Master of Works is entitled to call on the proprietor of any lands or heritages to fence them if they are dangerous or inconvenient to the public. I can see no possible application of that case to the present.

I do not wish it to be thought that this section can be construed so as to exempt from his obligation to fence any one who is called on by the Master of Works to fence his property. But I cannot read this notice and petition as a demand and petition warranted by the statute at all, for I think that this is only a demand to fence the river Clyde.

ORD DEAS.—The notice here relates to a public footpath running along the river Clyde in the heart of the city of Glasgow. The public are entitled to use the path, and certain portions of it have nothing at all to divide them from the river. Others have a strip of ground separating them from the river. Fearing that footpath is admitted to be attended with danger to the public, and that the Master of Works, by the 384th section of the Glasgow Police Act, is

No. 121.

June 1, 1877.
Kerr, Anderson, & Co. v.
Lang.

authorised to give notice requiring "any proprietor or occupier of a land or heritage to fence the same or repair any chimney-stalk or flue, or any chimney-head or can, or any rhone, signboard, or other thing connected with or appertaining to any building thereon, which appears to be dangerous, to his entire satisfaction." Now, it is not material whether the words "which appear to be dangerous" apply to the whole preceding words or not. Danger is admitted to be one of the considerations in respect of which this order, if competent in any case, may be made. It can hardly, I think, be disputed that somebody must be liable to fence this footpath, and so prevent danger to the public frequenting it. Now, the only persons who can possibly be bound to fence it are, first, the proprietors of the Clyde—these are the Crown authorities. It is not said that the Crown can be made liable. Second, The municipal authorities, at the expense of the town. But neither is it said that they are liable. There remains only the proprietor of the footpath,—I mean of the solum of the footpath,—and my opinion is that to him alone liability can be attached.

It is quite true that the danger arises from the proximity of the river, and that if there were no river there would be no danger. But this is a fallacious view of the matter. The danger arises from the right conferred by the proprietor of the solum upon the public to use that footpath, and the consequent exercise by the public of that lawful right. The Lord Ordinary grapples with that fact, and I am disposed to agree with his Lordship when he says—"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the purpose of the Act was to secure the public from danger in the exercise of the rights belonging to them, and he thinks that the property of the complainers is dangerous within the meaning of the Act. It is dangerous, because one of the uses to which it is subject cannot be enjoyed with safety in its present condition. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that it would be a too limited construction of the statute to restrict it to cases where the danger arises from artificial causes." I think that that is a reasonable view of the statute. The danger arises from the use the proprietor of this land is allowed, or, in other words, has authorised, to be made by the public of the solum of this footpath. The public have not, it is true, a written grant: but what is the same thing, they have a grant by prescription of this footpath from the proprietor of the ground in a position in which they cannot use the ground with safety. The danger arises out of this grant of footpath. It is of no relevance to inquire whether the grant was made tacitly or expressly. The law prevents a grant from the prescriptive possession. I do not know that there is any law to prevent the proprietor of the solum from diverting the footpath in a somewhat different direction. He could most certainly have prevented it from being in this place at the beginning. In that state of matters I am of opinion that the proprietor of this land is the proprietor of land which is dangerous from the use made of it in conformity with the grant made by him, and that he is the party who is bound to fence it. I can derive no analogy from the common law applicable to rural footpaths, which are not regulated by statute. I regard the statutory enactment made to meet the emerging necessities for the public safety in a great and growing municipality.

I do not know that I am entitled to go into what is rather a question of fact and merits, viz., how far the whole footpath, or only certain portions of it, should be fenced. All I shall say is—that where the footpath is close to the river there can be no doubt of the necessity for its being fenced. Where there is a wide interval between the river and the path, so that without straying wilfully or negligently from the path there is no danger, it may possibly be different. But in the No. 121.

 shape of the case, and according to the view of your Lordship, that distinction, there be room for it, does not seem to be before us.

June 1, 1877.
 Kerr, Ander-
 son, & Co. v.
 Lang.

LORD MURE.—The property of the complainers, as stated in the joint minute, tends along the bank of the Clyde, which is here a navigable river for about 10 yards east of Rutherglen Bridge. That property has for time immemorial been separated from the river, partly by a wall and partly by a wooden fence on the south side of the property; and when this wall and fence were erected a strip of ground appears to have been left between them and the river, upon which the public appear to have acquired by prescriptive use a right of footpath along the bank of the river. In these circumstances there can be little doubt that there may, at some parts of this bank, be a certain amount of danger to parties using the footpath; but not more so than there is in the case of most navigable rivers to parties who go along the bank, as they are entitled to do, at all events for purposes of navigation. The question to be decided, therefore, is, whether a danger thus arising from the proximity of a navigable river to a public footpath along the banks of that river is one which the owners of the land on which the right of footpath has been acquired can, in respect of the 14th section of the Act founded on, be called upon to obviate by fencing the river banks. I am of opinion, with your Lordship in the chair, that they cannot. The bank of the river on which the complainers are here required to erect a fence is not, I conceive, their property in the sense of this statute. It is ground over which the complainers have any exclusive right or control, inasmuch as the use of it is in the public, at least for the purposes of navigation. This is laid down very distinctly, both by Lord Stair, ii. 1, 5, and by Mr. Kine, ii. 1, 5. Now, the proposal here made by the Master of Works amounts substantially to this, that the complainers should be ordered to fence a public footpath, on the banks of a navigable river, from that river, and is not, therefore, as I apprehend, within the provisions of section 384 of the statute; it amounts to an order on the complainers to erect a fence upon ground which is neither the exclusive property, nor in the exclusive occupation, of the complainers who are required to fence it.

LORD SHAND.—I concur in opinion with the majority of your Lordships. It may be remarked that the case has been presented to us in a different aspect from that in which it was presented to the Lord Ordinary. Then it was apparently conceded that the river was within the property of Barrowfield; but now that we have the joint minute before us it appears that the boundary of the property of Barrowfield is the north side of the river Clyde—that is to say, that the property being bounded by the river Clyde, which at that part is admittedly tidal and navigable, the river is no part of the property of Barrowfield. These facts appear to me to be material facts for the decision of the case.

I agree with your Lordship in the chair as to the purport and construction of section 384 of the statute, and if this had been the case of a private river, whether tidal nor navigable, and where the adjoining proprietor had therefore a right of property in the river bed, I should have held that the case was ruled by the decision in the case of Bruce, and that the river, being the property of the adjoining proprietor, and a source of danger, he was bound to fence it. But the source of danger not being the property of the proprietor of Barrowfield, and, as

No. 121. I think, the statute lays the burden of fencing on the proprietor of the dangerous subject, it follows that there is no obligation on the complainer to fence.
 June 1, 1877. It has been said that as the proprietor here has allowed the public to exercise the right of footpath for the period of prescription he is bound to ensure the safety in the exercise of that right. But I know of no principle of law that requires him to do more than suffer the use of this footpath by the public, or that requires him to repair or improve the path, or that imposes any further obligation than that he shall allow the public to use it. As proprietor he is subject to a servitude patiendi only. If we had the case of a mill-lade or a private river or a quarry pit or hole on his property and in proximity to the path, then, as owner of that source of danger, he would be required to fence it. The obligation, however, affects the owner of the river or lade or pit which is the source of danger.

Kerr, Anderson, & Co. v. Lang.

I am not sure that the argument presented to us, viz., that this is a public navigable river, and that its bed and banks below high-water mark are therefore not the property of the proprietor of Barrowfield, was presented to the Lord Ordinary. From the passage already referred to I see that the distinction the Lordship had in view between this case and the case of Bruce was the distinction between an artificial subject and a natural subject. He says—"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that it would be a too limited construction of the statute to restrict it to cases where the danger arises from artificial causes." I quite agree with that observation, and though it had appeared that the danger was the result of a natural as distinguished from an artificial cause, yet if that cause—the river in this instance,—were the property of the complainer, I should have held him liable to fence it.

It has been said by my brother Lord Deas that some one must be bound to fence this river. That probably is so, at least as regards such points as are obviously dangerous, and it may very well be that the magistrates have that duty laid upon them, as the public seem to resort extensively to this place. For we have here no question as to whether that responsibility rests on the magistrates, or possibly on the Crown. All I say, and all that is necessary for the decision of this case is, that the proprietor of Barrowfield is not bound to fence off a source of danger not on his property.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor: Sustain the reasons of suspension: Suspend the proceedings complained of: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge, as prayed, and decern: Find the respondent liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 122.

PETER DUFFUS AND OTHERS (White's Trustees), First Parties—
Kinnear—Pearson.

June 1, 1877.
 White's
 Trustees v.
 Whyte.

ROBERT WHYTE, Second Party.—Trayner—A. J. Young.
 RACHEL WHITE, Third Party.—Millie.

Alimentary Provision—Discharge—Trust.—In a trust-settlement the trustees were directed to pay an annuity, which was declared to be an alimentary provision and not arrestable nor assignable by the annuitant onerously or gratuitously. After the whole purposes of the trust had been fulfilled except payment of the annuity the heir-at-law of the truster, who was entitled to the residue of the trust-estate, called upon the trustees to denude, and proposed to grant a heritable annuity over the heritable property, which formed the residue of the trust-estate.

in favour of the annuitant, in precisely the same terms as provided in the trust-deed. The annuitant was willing to accept of the security offered in place of the provision in the trust-deed, and to concur in granting a discharge to the trustees. Held that the annuitant had not power to grant a discharge of the alimentary provision, and that the trustees were not entitled to denude.

No. 122.

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

1st Division.
B.

DAVID WHITE, bookseller, Edinburgh, died on 1st March 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement in which he directed his trustees "to make payment to my said sister, Rachel White, of an annuity of £60, payable half-yearly in advance at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment thereof at the first of these terms after my decease for the then ensuing half year, and so on half-yearly in advance during all the days of her life; declaring that the said annuity shall be purely an alimentary provision to my said sister, and that the same shall not be arrestable for her debts or deeds, nor shall it be in her power to assign or convey the same either onerously or gratuitously in any manner of way." With regard to the annuity the settlement further provided—"Excluding, as I hereby expressly exclude, the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband whom my daughter or granddaughters or my said sister may marry, in reference to the provisions conceived in their favour under these presents; and declaring that the said provisions shall noway be affected by nor liable to be attached for the debts or obligations of their husbands, and that they shall not be at liberty to assign the same, and that the receipts or discharges of my daughter and granddaughters and sister alone shall be sufficient to my trustees without the consent of their husbands."

In 1876 the whole purposes of the trust had been fulfilled except those owing reference to the payment of the annuity to Rachel White, the truster's sister, who was unmarried, and was then seventy-six years of age. Robert Whyte, the heir-at-law of the truster and of his daughter, who is entitled to the residue of the trust-estate, which consisted entirely of real estate, called upon the trustees to denude in his favour, offering to put a bond over the heritable estate belonging to the trust in favour of the annuitant.

A special case was presented to the Court by Peter Duffus and others, trustees of David White, the truster, as first parties, by Robert Whyte second party, and by Miss Rachel White as third party.

The special case set forth,—"The second party proposes to grant a bond of annuity for £60 sterling in favour of the said Rachel White, in the same terms in which that annuity is provided to her by said trust-disposition and settlement, and in security of said annuity to convey to her the whole estate forming the foresaid residue in such manner that the said annuity may be heritably secured as a preferable debt upon said estate, as freely and as if the same had been a heritable burden affecting the said subjects at the date of the truster's death. The said Rachel White is willing to accept of the bond of annuity and conveyance in security."

The following question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"Whether, on obtaining a full discharge from the parties interested, and on the second party granting bond of annuity in the terms with the conveyance in security above mentioned, the first parties are, without the consent of the said Rachel White, bound or entitled to denude the said trust, and to convey the residue of the trust-estate to the second party as heir-at-law aforesaid?"

It was argued for the first parties;—The truster had taken a well-known mode of securing the annuity, and this was the only competent way of doing it.

The object was to prevent the annuitant from alienating the provision, and the heir-at-law would have to put the annuitant in the same position

No. 122. as if the trust were kept up. If the proposal of the heir-at-law was carried out the annuitant might assign or renounce her annuity.¹

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

Argued for the heir-at-law ;—The security proposed was ample, and the annuitant might be protected without the form of a trust. She would be no more able to discharge the heir-at-law than she could discharge the trustees. The Court had often authorised a transaction of the kind proposed.²

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—The heir-at-law calls on the trustees, in these circumstances, to concur with him and Miss Rachel White in finding another security for the payment of her annuity, and then to convey the trust-estate to him, the heir-at-law. Miss Rachel White is willing to concur in these proceedings ; but the trustees have very properly maintained before your Lordships that they are not in safety, and are not bound to denude of this trust, but, on the contrary, are bound to maintain it for the purpose of securing the annuity of Miss Rachel White in terms of the trust-deed, even although she herself is willing to renounce that annuity, and the security for its payment which the trust affords, because, as they say, the annuity is provided to her on such terms that she has not the power of renouncing it. The only part of the trust-deed, accordingly, which it is necessary to consider, is the third purpose, which provides this annuity. It is in these terms :—" I direct my trustees to make payment to my said sister Rachel White of an annuity of £60, payable half-yearly in advance at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, in equal portions, beginning the first term's payment thereof at the first of the terms after my decease for the then ensuing half year, and so on half-yearly in advance during all the days of her life ; declaring that the said annuity shall be purely an alimentary provision to my said sister, and that the same shall not be arrestable for her debts or deeds, nor shall it be in her power to assign or convey the same either onerously or gratuitously in any manner of way."

Now, prima facie, one would say that this lady, being expressly debarred by the trust-deed from assigning or conveying her annuity, either onerously or gratuitously, in any manner of way, is not in a condition to renounce her annuity as secured by the trust-deed. For a renunciation of a security is really a conveyance, and it cannot be supposed for one moment that it could be in the contemplation of the maker of this deed that the lady whom he had thus striven to protect against all acts and deeds should nevertheless be able gratuitously to defeat his intention and her own rights by resigning her right to the annuity to the trustees, or, in other words, by renouncing her right to the annuity secured by the trust-deed. It is said, however, that although in form this would look like a violation of the trust-deed, and that accession to this transaction would involve a breach of trust on the part of the trustees, yet, if there were substituted for the annuity, and the security for the annuity which the trust-deed provides, an obligation and a security equally good, equally unex-

¹ Smith and Campbell, May 30, 1873, 11 Macph. 639, 45 Scot. Jur. 41 ; Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, ante, vol. ii. p. 507.

² Standard Property Investment Co. v. Cowe, March 20, 1877, supra, p. 507 ; Watt v. Greenfield's Trs., Feb. 18, 1825, 3 S. 544 ; Nicolson's Trs. v. Nicolson, Dec. 5, 1850, 13 D. 240, 23 Scot. Jur. 94 ; Pretty v. Newbigging, March 1, 1824, 16 D. 667, 26 Scot. Jur. 338 ; Cosens v. Stevenson, June 26, 1863, 11 M. 761, 45 Scot. Jur. 469.

able as that provided by the trust-deed itself, it would be very hard to maintain his trust merely for the purpose of securing the payment of this £60 a-year to Miss Rachel White, and keeping the heir of the trust out of possession of what is really his estate. Now, I do not hesitate to say that under ordinary circumstances, wherever there is left only one special interest to be provided for, or which alone it is necessary that the trust should be kept up, and that interest of a partial kind, and may be provided for just as effectually in some other way, and thus the estate be liberated from the trust and set free, so as to be conveyed directly to the residuary legatee or heir-at-law, this may competently be done. Indeed we have many examples of such arrangements being made by all the parties interested, with the entire approval of the Court. But then, in order to justify such a proceeding, it must be made quite clear, in the first place, that all parties interested consent, and, in the second place, that all parties interested have power to consent. Now, the question put to us here is, "Whether, on obtaining a full discharge from the parties interested, and on the second party granting bond of annuity in the terms and with the conveyance in security above mentioned, the first parties are, with the consent of the said Rachel White, bound and entitled to denude of the said trust, and to convey the residue of the trust-estate to the second party as heir-at-law foresaid." The manner in which the annuity is to be secured, as referred to in this question, is set forth upon the first page of the case thus:—"The second party proposes to grant a bond of annuity for £60 sterling in favour of the said Rachel White, in the precise terms in which that annuity is provided to her by said trust-disposition and settlement, and in security of said annuity to convey to her the whole estate comprising the foresaid residue in such manner that the said annuity may be heritably secured as a preferable debt upon said estate, as fully and freely as if the same had been a heritable burden affecting the trust-subjects at the date of the trustor's death. The said Rachel White is willing to accept of the bond of annuity and conveyance in security."

As I understand this proposal, there is, in the first place, a personal obligation to be undertaken by the heir-at-law to pay the annuity, and in the second place, there is to be a conveyance of the heritable estate which forms the trust-property in security of that personal obligation. Now, it occurs to us to inquire what would be the effect of such a bond and such a disposition in security if this trust had never existed; and I think the answer to that question is not doubtful. If a party, being in right of an annuity, takes a personal bond herself, or if a party not having any antecedent right to an annuity takes a personal bond for payment of a certain sum of money in name of an annuity, and a heritable security for that, and puts into that bond a provision that this annuity shall be purely alimentary, shall not be liable for the debts or deeds of the creditor in the obligation, and shall not be liable to be assigned or renounced by her, the result would be simply that she would be the absolute mistress of the annuity, and could do what she liked with it, and that that qualification of her rights, so inserted by her in security of the annuity, would be of no avail whatever. It is against the whole principles and policy of the law to enable a party so to settle the property belonging to himself or herself that he or she may have the full beneficial enjoyment, and yet put it extra commercium, and exempt it from the diligence of creditors; and in the case which I suppose, the effect of the annuity is just creating these fetters for the purpose of placing it extra commercium, and exempting it from the diligence of creditors. Now, if that

No. 122.

June 1, 1877.

White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

No. 122.

June 1, 1877.
 White's
 Trustees v.
 Whyte.

case be clear, what is the difference in effect of the proposal which is made in this case? It is proposed that the trustees shall convey the estate to the heir-at-law upon condition of his granting such a bond and conveyance in security to Miss Rachel White, the annuitant, but with the circumstance that he receives a conveyance of the trust-estate as the consideration of his creating such a right. Does that alter the nature of the right which he creates in her favour? I cannot see that it does. It seems to me that the effect of these deeds, when granted would be just the same as if Miss Rachel White had purchased this annuity from the heir-at-law, and had taken these deeds herself in the terms suggested. What is to prevent Miss Rachel White, for example, the day after she has obtained delivery of these deeds, from renouncing her right in favour of her own debtor, the heir-at-law? It is said she cannot do that, because the deeds declare she is to have no power to do so. Well, this trust-deed declares that in the same terms, and, in my opinion, much more effectually than the proposed deeds would do. And yet one part of the proposal before us is that Miss Rachel White, notwithstanding the restriction of her right as a beneficiary under the trust, is to discharge the trustees. If she can discharge the trustees, notwithstanding the terms in which this annuity is settled for her, multo magis can she discharge the heir-at-law after she has got, in place of the security, the deeds proposed to be granted; and that, in my mind, is conclusive of the whole matter. But I think it right to say further, for the purpose of distinguishing the principle of the case, that I do not very well see how a right of this kind, restricted in the manner here described, can be effectually created except through the operation of a trust-deed. I have already said that a man can tie up his own property so as to exclude the diligence of his own creditors, and I do not think that anybody, by a mere conveyance to an individual, can exempt that individual from the diligence of his creditors as regards property conveyed. But if a settler desires to provide an alimentary payment to some person in whom he has a want of confidence (as is to be inferred in the present case from the clause referred to), and desires to make a provision that the party recipient shall not have the power to discharge or assign, or give in any way, he may do this: he may place a sum of money in the hands of trustees, and may direct them to use that money in such a way that with a breach of trust they could not possibly listen either to an assignee or an attaching creditor, because the directions of the truster would be—as they are in the trust-deed—“You shall pay over term by term a certain sum of money to the beneficiary whom I have named. You shall not pay it to anybody else. The trust is created for the purpose of the money going into her hands, and I intend to and restrain you from doing anything else with it.” I apprehend a trust-deed does that. This has been recognised for a long time as an effectual way of creating such a restrictive alimentary right, and I know of no other way in which this has ever been supposed that it can be done.

I am therefore of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

LORD DEAS.—It appears distinctly from this trust-deed that what the testator wished to do with reference to his sister was to give her an annuity trustis causa trustees half-yearly in advance for her aliment, and to declare that it should not be arrestable or assignable, and that in the event of her marrying her husband's jus mariti should be excluded, and his creditors should be excluded from attaching or interfering with that annuity. That is the declared at present charged, with the addition of the personal obligation of the heir-at-law, which may be of some value. And if there were no other consideration in the case I should hold that the heir-at-law was entitled to have the estate conveyed to him on condition of his granting the security proposed.

But the obstacle—the unsurmountable obstacle as I think—which presents itself in the way of the proposed arrangement arises upon that clause of the deed which declares that this annuity shall be purely an alimentary provision, &c.—(reads clause). That clause does not in express terms prohibit the charge of the annuity; but as assignation, either onerous or gratuitous, is prohibited, and as a discharge is substantially an assignation of the right in favour of a person getting it, it is clear that a discharge of the annuity is as effectually prohibited as an assignation. Now, that being so, it lies upon the heir-at-law, to make the proposal, to shew that this annuity would be as well secured against the lady's creditors and her own acts under the new arrangement as it is at present. I have come to be clearly of opinion that it would not be so, whether if the heir-at-law were to grant a bond, as he proposes to do, with a disposition in security, or if the estate were to be conveyed to him under burden of an annuity. For I think that the moment the trust is discharged the declaration that the annuity should not be affected by the lady's debts or deeds would no longer be effectual.

Your Lordship in the chair has explained the general law on this subject, and concurs in the statement that has been made. If a proprietor of a heritable subject, either by deed of conveyance de presenti or mortis causa, gives away the dominium or fee of that estate, not to trustees, but to a third party, the absolute fee being conveyed, he cannot at the same time limit the powers of his donee to deal with the estate. The absolute fee being conveyed he cannot impose conditions restraining alienation or the like, which is practically effecting an entail, except by compliance with the provisions of the entail statutes. He cannot fetter the property with conditions which are inconsistent with the right of fee, as, for example, with the condition that the person vested with property shall not be entitled to assign his right to it, or that the estate shall not be liable to his debts or deeds.

Again, the estate may be conveyed to one in liferent and another in fee, and the former right may be described as in liferent simply, or for liferent use only. The result is the same as regards the granter of the deed. He is entirely divested of the fee, and the terms of the conveyance mark and define the character and limits of the rights conferred on the respective disponees. Having conveyed away the entire property he cannot, however, affect the estate of life or fee with conditions which shall protect either estate against the acts and omissions of the respective owners or the diligence of their creditors. I should say the same with an annuity made a burden on an heritable estate, which the owner has conveyed to a third party. The right of annuity cannot, any more than the right of fee or liferent, be affected by conditions against alienation or effecting the right against diligence.

There is a way by which a proprietor can effectually impose such restrictions as he desires to create either on the fee or liferent or on any right of annuity created, viz., by conveyance to trustees who hold the property for him so long as the trust subsists, and are bound to fulfil his directions, and in a position to secure the fulfilment of the conditions which the truster has imposed. On the whole, being of opinion that if this trust is brought to an end this lady could

No. 122.

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

No. 122. discharge her right, whether the one proposal or the other to secure the annuity against her debts and deeds were carried out, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the question must be answered in the negative.

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the parties of the first part are not bound or entitled to demand themselves of the trust committed to them by the trust-disposition and settlement of the late David White, or to convey the residue of the trust-estate to the party of the second part on the terms and conditions proposed in this case, and decern."

MACANDREW & WRIGHT, W.S.—W. R. SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 123. Mrs HESTER ANN MOSTYN LOMAX OF FRASER and OTHERS (Fraser's Trustees), Pursuers.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Trayner—Asher.
JOHN CRAN, Defender.—Fraser—Mackintosh.

June 1, 1877.*
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

Nuisance—Pollution of air—Interim interdict granted.—In an action of declarator and interdict against a manure manufacturer at the instance of a neighbouring proprietor interim interdict granted (after proof) against the defender carrying on the work so as to create a nuisance, although a man of skill to whom the Court had remitted had expressed his satisfaction with the way in which the defender had carried out improvements suggested by the reporter, and reported that these improvements had produced a great amelioration of the nuisance.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
R.

THIS action was raised on 30th November 1875 by the late John Fraser, Esq. of Bunchrew, in the county of Inverness, against John Cran tenant under a long lease of an area of ground near Bunchrew station, in which he had erected an artificial manure work.

The conclusions of the summons were to have it found and declared "that the said defender is not entitled to carry on the manufacture of artificial manures at present carried on by him at the works or other premises presently occupied by him near the railway station of Bunchrew in the said county, on the Highland Railway; at least that he is not entitled to carry on the said manufacture in such way and manner as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, his tenants, and others residing in the vicinity of the said manure work or other premises, in their health, comfort, or otherwise, or so as to create a nuisance," and to have the defender interdicted "from carrying on the said manufacture of artificial manure at the said work or other premises, at least from carrying on in such way and manner as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, tenants, and others, as aforesaid, in their health, comfort, or otherwise, or so as to create a nuisance."

The pursuer averred that the defender's work was carried on so as to be a nuisance, and injurious to the comfort and health of persons residing at Bunchrew.

The defender denied that any nuisance had been caused or existed at the date of the action. He also pleaded that the pursuer was prevented from objecting to the existence of his works or their use for the manufacture of manure, in respect that he had allowed the works to be erected in the full knowledge of their purpose, without objection.

The original pursuer having died during the dependence of the action, his testamentary trustees were sisted in his room.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary, on 24th March 1876, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that at and for a considerable time prior to the institution of the present action the manufacture of manure at defender's works near Bunchrew station was carried on to the nuisance of No. 123. the proprietor and occupants of the mansion-house, garden, and grounds of Bunchrew: Finds that although the remedial measures adopted by the defender, and put in operation for the first time on or about the 16th of last month, are calculated, with the exercise of due care, to remedy the evil complained of to a certain extent, and have, in point of fact, done so, yet the manufacture, as still carried on, is to the nuisance of the pursuers: Remits Professor Crum Brown, Edinburgh, whom failing, Professor Dewar, Cambridge, to visit the premises, and to report what changes, if any, in the buildings and other works, are necessary in order to secure the absorption and destruction within the manufactory of the fumes and gases evolved in the course of the manufacture, so as to prevent the nuisance complained of: Finds the defender liable in expenses; and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor, to tax and to report: Farther, on the motion of the defender, grants leave to him to reclaim against this interlocutor, without prejudice to proceedings being taken forthwith, in order that a report under the above remit may be given in by the meeting of the Court in May next.*

June 1, 1877.
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

* OPINION delivered at advising.—“The pursuers of this action are the testatary trustees of the late Mr Fraser of Bunchrew, a property situated about one and a half miles from the town of Inverness; and the object of the action is to have the defender, John Cran, interdicted from carrying on the manufacture of artificial manures at the works occupied by him near the railway station of Bunchrew, and in the neighbourhood of the pursuer's property, on the ground that the manufacture has been so carried on as to be a nuisance and injurious to the comfort and health of persons residing at Bunchrew.

“The works, which were originally put up in 1870, have been considerably extended as the manufacture increased. The defence is a complete denial that a nuisance has been caused or now exists.

“The property of Bunchrew extends to about 1000 acres. The mansion-house and grounds have for many years been occupied by the late Mr Fraser and his family for several months in the year, and are at a distance from the defender's works of about 660 yards, and on a considerably lower level. The action was originally instituted on 30th November 1875 by the late Mr Fraser, who died recently as the 24th of last month; and it is a remarkable and painful feature in the case that he and his family attribute the origin of the four days' illness which he died to nausea produced by inhaling polluted air coming from the works, and which caused severe and continued sickness. His trustees, immediately after his death, took up the litigation, which has now to be disposed of after a period of which has lasted over four days.

“At the close of the pursuer's evidence I intimated a clear opinion that so long a case of nuisance had been made out as to render it extremely difficult for the defender to resist a finding to the effect that a nuisance did exist, and suggested that advantage might be taken by the defender of the suggestions of some of the scientific witnesses as to possible modes of remedying the evil. The defender's counsel, however, stated that they anticipated they would be able to produce evidence to disprove entirely the case made by the pursuer. I am, however, of opinion, after careful attention to the defender's evidence of the two succeeding days, that it falls far short of meeting the pursuer's case.

“There is no question as to the law which is applicable to the case. Apart from any limited rights which may have been acquired by prescriptive possession one is entitled so to use his property as to cause injury to the health of his neighbour, or to render the occupation of his neighbour's property positively uncomfortable. In particular, and with special reference to the question raised in this case, no one is entitled, in the use of his property for the purpose of any manufacture or otherwise, to emit gases, fumes, or vapours, either noxious in their nature, or causing nauseous or offensive smells, which sensibly diminish the comfort of others in the use and enjoyment of their adjoining property. It

No. 122. discharge her right, whether the one proposal or the other to secure the annuity against her debts and deeds were carried out, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the question must be answered in the negative.

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the parties of the first part are not bound or entitled to deplete themselves of the trust committed to them by the trust-disposition and settlement of the late David White, or to convey the residue of the trust-estate to the party of the second part on the terms and conditions proposed in this case, and decern."

MACANDREW & WRIGHT, W.S.—W. R. SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 123. Mrs HESTER ANN MOSTYN LOMAX OF FRASER and OTHERS (Fraser's Trustees), Pursuers.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Trayner—Asher.
JOHN CRAN, Defender.—Fraser—Mackintosh.

June 1, 1877.*
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

Nuisance—Pollution of air—Interim interdict granted.—In an action of declarator and interdict against a manure manufacturer at the instance of a neighbouring proprietor interim interdict granted (after proof) against the defender carrying on the work so as to create a nuisance, although a man of skill to whom the Court had remitted had expressed his satisfaction with the way in which the defender had carried out improvements suggested by the reporter, and reported that these improvements had produced a great amelioration of the nuisance.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
R.

THIS action was raised on 30th November 1875 by the late John Fraser, Esq. of Bunchrew, in the county of Inverness, against John Cran, tenant under a long lease of an area of ground near Bunchrew station, on which he had erected an artificial manure work.

The conclusions of the summons were to have it found and declared "that the said defender is not entitled to carry on the manufacture of artificial manures at present carried on by him at the works or other premises presently occupied by him near the railway station of Bunchrew in the said county, on the Highland Railway; at least that he is not entitled to carry on the said manufacture in such way and manner as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, his tenants, and others residing in the vicinity of the said manure work or other premises, in their health, comfort, or otherwise, or so as to create a nuisance," and to have the defender interdicted "from carrying on the said manufacture of artificial manure at the said work or other premises, at least from carrying on the same in such way and manner as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, tenants, and others, as aforesaid, in their health, comfort, or otherwise, or so as to create a nuisance."

The pursuer averred that the defender's work was carried on so as to be a nuisance, and injurious to the comfort and health of persons residing at Bunchrew.

The defender denied that any nuisance had been caused or existed at the date of the action. He also pleaded that the pursuer was prevented from objecting to the existence of his works or their use for the manufacture of manure, in respect that he had allowed the works to be erected in the full knowledge of their purpose, without objection.

The original pursuer having died during the dependence of the action, his testamentary trustees were sisted in his room.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary, on 24th March 1876, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that at and for a considerable time prior to the institution of the present action the manufacture of manure at the defender's works near Bunchrew station was carried on to the nuisance of the proprietor and occupants of the mansion-house, garden, and grounds of Bunchrew: Finds that although the remedial measures adopted by the defender, and put in operation for the first time on or about the 16th of last month, are calculated, with the exercise of due care, to remedy the evil complained of to a certain extent, and have, in point of fact, done so, yet the manufacture, as still carried on, is to the nuisance of the pursuers: Remits Professor Crum Brown, Edinburgh, whom failing, Professor Dewar, Cambridge, to visit the premises, and to report what changes, if any, in the buildings and other works, are necessary in order to secure the absorption and destruction within the manufactory of the fumes and gases evolved in the course of the manufacture, so as to prevent the nuisance complained of: Finds the defender liable in expenses; and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor, to tax and to report: Farther, on the motion of the defender, grants leave to him to reclaim against this interlocutor, without prejudice to proceedings being taken forthwith, in order that a report under the above remit may be given in by the meeting of the Court in May next.*

No. 123.
June 1, 1877.
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

* OPINION delivered at advising.—“The pursuers of this action are the testatory trustees of the late Mr Fraser of Bunchrew, a property situated about two and a half miles from the town of Inverness; and the object of the action is to have the defender, John Cran, interdicted from carrying on the manufacture of artificial manures at the works occupied by him near the railway station of Bunchrew, and in the neighbourhood of the pursuer's property, on the ground that the manufacture has been so carried on as to be a nuisance and injurious to the comfort and health of persons residing at Bunchrew.

“The works, which were originally put up in 1870, have been considerably extended as the manufacture increased. The defence is a complete denial that a nuisance has been caused or now exists.

“The property of Bunchrew extends to about 1000 acres. The mansion-house and grounds have for many years been occupied by the late Mr Fraser and his family for several months in the year, and are at a distance from the defender's works of about 660 yards, and on a considerably lower level. The action was originally instituted on 30th November 1875 by the late Mr Fraser, who died recently as the 24th of last month; and it is a remarkable and painful feature of the case that he and his family attribute the origin of the four days' illness which he died to nausea produced by inhaling polluted air coming from the works, and which caused severe and continued sickness. His trustees, immediately after his death, took up the litigation, which has now to be disposed of after a period of which has lasted over four days.

“At the close of the pursuer's evidence I intimated a clear opinion that so long a case of nuisance had been made out as to render it extremely difficult for the defender to resist a finding to the effect that a nuisance did exist, and suggested that advantage might be taken by the defender of the suggestions of some of the scientific witnesses as to possible modes of remedying the evil. The defender's counsel, however, stated that they anticipated they would be able to produce evidence to disprove entirely the case made by the pursuer. I am, however, of opinion, after careful attention to the defender's evidence of the two succeeding days, that it falls far short of meeting the pursuer's case.

There is no question as to the law which is applicable to the case. Apart from any limited rights which may have been acquired by prescriptive possession, one is entitled so to use his property as to cause injury to the health of his neighbour, or to render the occupation of his neighbour's property positively uncomfortable. In particular, and with special reference to the question raised in this case, no one is entitled, in the use of his property for the purpose of any manufacture or otherwise, to emit gases, fumes, or vapours, either noxious in their nature, or causing nauseous or offensive smells, which sensibly diminish the comfort of others in the use and enjoyment of their adjoining property. It

No. 123. Professor Dewar having made a report in accordance with the remit contained in the preceding interlocutor, the Lord Ordinary, on 27th June

June 1, 1877.
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

may be shewn beyond question that the smells complained of are not in a direct sense injurious to health ; but even in that case, if they be such as cause sensible discomfort, and so destroy, or in a practical sense restrict and diminish the use and enjoyment of a neighbouring property,—as, for example, by compelling the proprietors or occupants to close their windows and doors against the admission of fresh air, on account of the disagreeable odour which accompanies it,—the law will put a stop to the use complained of, as a nuisance. There is no answer to the party injured, and no justification of the nuisance, that the work or manufacture is in what is called a convenient and suitable place, either for the manufacture, or for such members of the public as may purchase and be the subject of manufacture. The convenience and benefit of the manufacturer and his customers cannot be gained by requiring others, for the profit or convenience of their neighbours, to submit to such injury or discomfort as results in a sensible diminution or restriction of their enjoyment of their property, distinguished from a mere trifling or temporary passing inconvenience.”

After an examination of the evidence his Lordship proceeded :—“ The defender has examined a number of witnesses from a distance—generally speaking persons engaged in the same or similar trades—who say that at their works in their neighbourhood similar manufactories cause no injury to health, or discomfort, or inconvenience ; and, as generally occurs in cases of this class, it is represented that the decision in this case involves the settlement of a much larger question, viz., whether the existence of such works is to be tolerated at all in the neighbourhood of human habitations. I do not think the case involves any such general question, nor do I think that much benefit is to be gained from the evidence of the nature now referred to which has been adduced. Whether the operations at a particular work constitute a nuisance to an adjoining property or a neighbouring district must always be a question of circumstances. Everything depends on the nature of the situation—the position of the locality which may be affected in relation to the works. The situation may be open, as on or near the sea-side ; or confined by the contour of the neighbouring ground ; or open at one side and shut in at another ; the work may be in the midst of a locality filled with other manufactories, the smoke or fumes of which have to a great extent pervaded and affected the atmosphere, and where the surrounding inhabitants are mainly if not exclusively engaged as operatives in the manufactories, which to them, from habit, are little if any annoyance. Much may depend on the prevailing direction of the wind as affecting a particular house or district ; and very much on the nature of the buildings of which the manufactory consists, and the system on which the work is conducted. In order to judge properly of most of the other works referred to by the witnesses it would be necessary to know about as much in regard to each of them, by the evidence of people from the locality besides that of the owner or occupant, as is now before the Court on the proof in regard to the work in question. Taking the partial evidence adduced, I can only say that the impression on my mind, in reference to the other works now referred to is, that some of them are in a similar situation and carried on in such a manner as not to constitute a nuisance to the particular neighbourhood in which they are placed ; while, in regard to others, if they were made the subject of legal proceedings, it would probably be found that they do constitute a nuisance, and could not be permitted to be continued unless under such an entire change of system as would prevent the escape of fumes and disagreeable odours.

On the grounds now stated, I am of opinion that it is the clear result of the evidence that the defender's manufactory, at the date of the action, and for a considerable time prior to that date, did constitute a nuisance to the owners and occupiers of Bunchrew House. Taking advantage of a suggestion made by Stevenson Macadam, who, having examined the works in order to give evidence for the pursuers, was precognosed by the defender with their consent, the defender, in the early part of last month, erected a coke-tower, with connate 1876, made another remit to him to see the works reported on by him No. 123. obviating the evils complained of executed forthwith.

The defender reclaimed against the interlocutor of 24th March 1876, ^{June 1, 1877.} Fraser's Trustees v. Cran. and after hearing counsel for the defender the Court, upon the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary, on 30th November 1876 pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the first finding in the said interlocutor, and point parties to be further heard on the cause, reserving, in the meantime, the question of expenses."

Professor Dewar having made a second report, the result of which was that, in his opinion, while the improvements introduced by the defender had greatly diminished the nuisance, they had not as yet wholly removed the case was again put out for debate in May 1877.

The pursuers submitted that they were entitled to interdict. The nuisance had not been wholly removed. The only effectual means of curing the defender's watchfulness was to grant an interdict against him. The defender had already received more than ordinary indulgence. In the case of *M'Neill v. Scott*¹ interim interdict was granted (on caution) on inquiry.

Argued for the defender;—Professor Dewar's report shewed that he had done everything in his power to abate the nuisance. Before interdict was granted he should be allowed an opportunity for perfecting his arrangements.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite satisfied that the pursuers are entitled to interdict. It is proved that a very serious nuisance has been perpetrated by this manufactory. The defender says that he has done everything in his power to abate the nuisance, and that the manufactory is a new one. I think that the novelty of the manufacture rather strengthens the pursuers' right to interdict. It is true that Professor Dewar reports "his great satisfaction with the mode in which the chamber in which the bones are dissolved, for the purpose of dissipating or destroying the fumes arising from the manufacture. This work was completed on the 16th of February, and stated by the defender to be a complete remedy of any evil that existed. I do not think it is so; although, when carefully attended to, it has greatly modified the evil complained of. . . . It appears to me, however, to be the result of the evidence as a whole, and I particularly refer to the evidence of Dr Stevenson Macadam, that the work should be put into such a condition and may be so carried on as to obviate the nuisance, although, undoubtedly, with the best appliances, it will require great attention on the defender's part. It was stated for the defender that while he denied that any nuisance existed, yet if the Court should decide otherwise, he desired an opportunity of adopting such remedial measures as might remove all cause of complaint. In the circumstances, I think such an opportunity should be allowed; with that view I propose to remit to a person of skill, who, after perusing the evidence, particularly with reference to the suggestions of means for removing the existing evil, will visit the manufactory, and report as to the works which are necessary for that purpose."

Professor Dewar's report contained the following passages:—"I have to express generally my great satisfaction with the mode in which the above objections have been executed, and also with the willingness and desire of the defender to carry out all my recommendations.

The above improvements have produced a great amelioration of the nuisance formerly arose from the Bunchrew Works, and I regard the principle of the order on its first trial as so satisfactory that it only requires judgment and a scientific knowledge to reduce almost indefinitely annoyances arising from the manufactory."

March 17, 1866, 4 Macph. 608, 38 Scot. Jur. 316.

No. 123.

June 1, 1877.
Fraser's
Trustees v.
Cran.

which the alterations suggested by him have been executed," and also with the willingness and desire of the defender to carry out all his recommendations. I think that we should remit back to Professor Dewar to report, not whether the recommendations have been carried out, but whether the nuisance has been abated, and that we should in the meantime grant interim interdict.

LORD ORMDALE.—I think this is a clamant case for interim interdict. On 24th March 1876 the Lord Ordinary found that there was a nuisance. The Court unanimously adhered to that judgment. At first sight, and independent of specialities, I should have thought that, if the Lord Ordinary had not previously granted interim interdict, he could not have gone wrong in granting interim interdict in his interlocutor of 24th March 1876. His Lordship, however, so far gave an indulgence to the defender, and merely made a remit to Professor Dewar.

If Professor Dewar had reported that the nuisance had been completely removed even then I am not sure that, nuisance having once been established, we ought not to have granted interdict, so as to prevent its recurrence. On reading the Professor's report I find that he does not say that the nuisance has been entirely removed, but only that it has been greatly abated.

The work on which the defender is engaged is a new work, perhaps a valuable work; still he is carrying it on for his own pecuniary benefit, which he is right to do, but not at imminent risk to the health and comfort of the pursuers.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

ON 31st May this interlocutor was pronounced:—"Remit to Professor Dewar to visit the premises at such intervals between this 15th October next as he may think necessary, and to report at that date whether the nuisance complained of is then abated, and to accompany his report with such remarks as he may judge important for the consideration of the Court; meantime grant interim interdict against the defender carrying on the manufacture complained of so as to create a nuisance, and reserve in meantime all questions of expenses, and quoad ultra continue cause, and decern."

IRONS & ROBERTS, S.S.C.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 124.

June 4, 1877.
Minister of Brydekirk v.
Minister and Heritors of Hoddam.

REV. JOHN HENDERSON GOURLIE, Minister of Brydekirk quoad sacra Petitioner.—Balfour—Mackintosh.

REV. ROBERT MENZIES AND OTHERS, Minister and Heritors of Hoddam Respondents.—Kinnear—R. Johnstone.

Parish—Parish quoad sacra disjoined from united parish—Transfer of Glebe from united parish to quoad sacra parish—39 Vict. c. 11 (The Parishes Act, 1876), sec. 4.—The United Parishes Act, 1876, sec. 4. provides that where a portion of a united parish has "been erected into a parish quoad sacra" and there is more than one glebe belonging to the united parish, it shall be lawful for the Court of Teinds . . . to decern and declare that of such glebes . . . shall be transferred from the minister of such united parish to the minister of such parish quoad sacra."

Held that the section did not apply to the case of a quoad sacra parish, a small portion of which only had been disjoined from a united parish and transferred from adjoining parishes.

Opinion (per Lord President) that the provision applied only in the case of No. 124.
quoad sacra parish the whole of which had been disjoined from the united Irish.

June 4, 1877.

Minister of Brydekirk v.
 Minister and Heritors of Hoddam.

UNDER the Act 1609, c. 23, the parishes of Hoddam, Ecclefechan, and were formed into the united parish of Hoddam. At the date of the tion each of these parishes had a glebe. The three glebes thereafter med part of the benefice of the united parish.

TEIND COURT.
 Teind Clerk.

Under the Disjunction and Erection Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 44), a rtion of the united parish of Hoddam, consisting of a portion of the old ish of Luce, but not including the glebe of Luce, together with parts of e adjacent parishes of Annan and Cummertrees, were, in 1853, disjoined
 d erected into the quoad sacra parish of Brydekirk.

The Rev. J. H. Gourlie, minister of the quoad sacra parish of Brydekirk, nding on the 4th section * of the United Parishes Act, 1876 (39 Vict.
 11), presented this petition, with consent of the presbytery of Annan, ving that the glebe of the old parish of Luce, which formed part of the nefice of the united parish of Hoddam, should be transferred from the ister of the united parish of Hoddam to him as minister of the quoad ra parish of Brydekirk.

The petition was opposed by the minister and heritors of the united ish of Hoddam on these grounds, inter alia,—1. That the petitioner not entitled under the provisions of the United Parishes (Scotland) Act, 6, to obtain the transference sought, in respect that the quoad sacra sh of Brydekirk was formed by the disjunction of portions of various shes, and not by the erection of a portion of the parish of Hoddam ie into a quoad sacra parish. 2. That the glebe of the old parish of e was not situated within the quoad sacra parish of Brydekirk, and its transference would be injurious to the benefice of Hoddam.

It was stated in the answers for the respondents, and substantially itted by the petitioner at the bar, that of the quoad sacra parish of lekirk only about one-eighth had been disjoined from the parish of dam, that the annual value of this one-eighth was only £475, and nhabitants eighty persons, while the total value of Brydekirk was 37, and its population 731, and that the value of the united parish of dam was £14,297, and its population 1520.

RD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition under the 4th section of the Act 39 Vict.

The petitioner is the minister of the quoad sacra parish of Brydekirk, asks to have a glebe transferred from the benefice of Hoddam to the benefice ydekirk in the following circumstances:—

Under the Act 1609, c. 23, the united parish of Hoddam was formed by the of the old parishes of Hoddam, Ecclefechan, and Luce.

A quoad sacra parish of Brydekirk was afterwards erected under the proviof 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, and was composed of portions of the parishes of n, Cummertrees, and of a portion of that part of the united parish of Hodwhich had once been the parish of Luce.

Section 4 of 39 Vict. c. 11 runs thus—"If a portion of a united parish in nd has, under the provisions of the recited Act (7 and 8 Vict. c. 44), been l into a parish quoad sacra, and it shall appear in the course of any progs taken under this Act that there is more than one glebe forming part of nefice of such united parish, it shall be lawful for the Court of Teinds
 . . . to decern and declare that one of such glebes . . . shall be

* For the terms of this section see opinion of Lord President.

No. 124. transferred from the minister of such united parish to the minister of such parish quoad sacra." The petitioner maintains that his parish being composed, inter alia, of a portion of the united parish of Hoddam, he is entitled to one of its glebes under this section.

June 4, 1877.
Minister of Brydekirk v.
Minister and Heritors of Hoddam.

Now, in construing this section regard must be paid to the preamble and previous sections of the Act.

The part of the preamble which is important in this question is this—"And whereas it is expedient that where an application is presented under the recited Act (7 and 8 Vict. c. 44) for the disjunction of a portion of a united parish having more than one glebe, and its erection into a parish quoad sacra," it should be lawful for the Court of Teinds, under certain conditions, to transfer to the minister of such parish quoad sacra one of the glebes of such united parish. Section 3 is also important, and is as follows:—"If in the course of any proceedings under the recited Act, for the disjunction of a portion of a united parish in Scotland and for its erection into a quoad sacra parish, it shall appear that there be more than one glebe forming part of the benefice of such united parish, it shall be lawful for the Court of Teinds, . . . in pronouncing decree of disjunction and erection, to declare that one of such glebes . . . shall be transferred from the minister of such united parish to the minister of such parish quoad sacra."

Now, reading section 4 in the light of the preceding parts of the Act, I am of opinion that it was intended to apply only in the case where the portion taken from the united parish had by itself been erected into the quoad sacra parish. Upon the question whether it might not be extended to the case of a quoad sacra parish composed of portions of several parishes, whereof the part taken from the united parish is the largest, I give no opinion—it is not the case here. Parties are not quite at one as to the facts stated in the answers of the heritors: but taking the admissions of the counsel for the petitioner made at the bar, it is evident that only a small part of the united parish of Hoddam forms part of the parish of Brydekirk, and that by far the greater portion of that parish has been formed of parts of the parishes of Annan and Cummertrees. I am therefore of opinion that to this case the Act does not apply, and that the petition must be dismissed.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD RUTHERFURD CONCURRED.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition, with expenses.

C. S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

JOHN MITCHELL, Pursuer.—Fraser—Millie.
JAMES HOGG AND OTHERS (Mitchell's Trustees), Defenders.—
Asher—A. J. Young.

Husband and Wife—Mutual Settlement—Donatio inter vivos et mortis causa—Jus quesitum tertio—Revocation.—A husband and wife, who had married without an antenuptial contract, executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed the whole estate presently belonging or which should belong to the spouses, jointly or individually, at the death of the predeceaser, to trustees, who were directed to allow the survivor the life rent use and enjoyment of the same, and, upon the death of the survivor, to realise and pay over the same to the

is at present charged, with the addition of the personal obligation of the heir-at-law, which may be of some value. And if there were no other consideration in the case I should hold that the heir-at-law was entitled to have the estate conveyed to him on condition of his granting the security proposed.

But the obstacle—the unsurmountable obstacle as I think—which presents itself in the way of the proposed arrangement arises upon that clause of the trust-deed which declares that this annuity shall be purely an alimentary provision, &c.—(reads clause). That clause does not in express terms prohibit the discharge of the annuity; but as assignation, either onerous or gratuitous, is prohibited, and as a discharge is substantially an assignation of the right in favour of a person getting it, it is clear that a discharge of the annuity is as effectually prohibited as an assignation. Now, that being so, it lies upon the heir-at-law, who makes the proposal, to shew that this annuity would be as well secured against the lady's creditors and her own acts under the new arrangement as it is at present. I have come to be clearly of opinion that it would not be so, whether if the heir-at-law were to grant a bond, as he proposes to do, with a disposition in security, or if the estate were to be conveyed to him under burden of an annuity. For I think that the moment the trust is discharged the declaration that the annuity should not be affected by the lady's debts or deeds would no longer be effectual.

Your Lordship in the chair has explained the general law on this subject, and occurs in the statement that has been made. If a proprietor of a heritable subject, either by deed of conveyance de presenti or mortis causa, gives away the full dominium or fee of that estate, not to trustees, but to a third party, the absolute fee being conveyed, he cannot at the same time limit the powers of his donee to deal with the estate. The absolute fee being conveyed he cannot impose conditions restraining alienation or the like, which is practically excluding an entail, except by compliance with the provisions of the entail statutes.

He cannot fetter the property with conditions which are inconsistent with the right of fee, as, for example, with the condition that the person vested with property shall not be entitled to assign his right to it, or that the estate shall not be liable to his debts or deeds.

Again, the estate may be conveyed to one in liferent and another in fee, and the former right may be described as in liferent simply, or for liferent use only. The result is the same as regards the granter of the deed. He is entirely divested of the fee, and the terms of the conveyance mark and define the character and limits of the rights conferred on the respective disponees. Having conveyed away the entire property he cannot, however, affect the estate of life or fee with conditions which shall protect either estate against the acts and debts of the respective owners or the diligence of their creditors. I should say the same with an annuity made a burden on an heritable estate, which the owner has conveyed to a third party. The right of annuity cannot, any more than the right of fee or liferent, be affected by conditions against alienation or affecting the right against diligence.

There is a way by which a proprietor can effectually impose such restrictions as he desires to create either on the fee or liferent or on any right of annuity created, viz., by conveyance to trustees who hold the property for him so long as the trust subsists, and are bound to fulfil his directions, and in a position to enforce the fulfilment of the conditions which the truster has imposed. On the whole, being of opinion that if this trust is brought to an end this lady could

No. 122.

June 1, 1877.
White's
Trustees v.
Whyte.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

And further, we hereby declare that in case from any cause the free income of the estates hereby conveyed shall be considered by the survivor of us insufficient for his or her proper and comfortable maintenance, such survivor shall, with the consent and approbation of the said trustees, be entitled to receive and use from time to time such portion of the capital (but not exceeding one-half thereof) as may by the survivor of us, with approval of the said trustees, be considered necessary for the proper and comfortable maintenance and support of the survivor of us."

By the fifth purpose the trustees were directed, on the death of the survivor, to realise and convert into cash the whole estate, and to pay over one-half to the brothers and sisters then alive of Mr Mitchell, and the issue of such as might have predeceased, per stirpes, and the other half to the brothers and sisters then alive of Mrs Mitchell, and the issue of such as might have predeceased, per stirpes (excluding, however, from the succession two nephews of Mrs Mitchell); "and further declaring that in case any portion of the said capital shall be paid to and used by the survivor of us for his or her maintenance and support, such portion so paid to the survivor shall form a deduction from the half of the free residue hereinbefore directed to be paid to the brothers and sisters of the survivor of us or their issue as aforesaid."

The trustees were empowered, on the death of the predeceaser, to enter into possession of the estate, and to sue for, uplift, receive, and discharge all debts and sums of money then owing to either spouse, and, with consent of the survivor, to output and input tenants, to grant leases, and to sell the subjects by public roup. The trustees were farther empowered to invest the estate during the life of the survivor, to change the investments with consent of the survivor, and to submit and compound differences in relation to the trust. The deed also contained the following clauses:—"Declaring always that the said trustees shall not be bound to take possession of the said trust-estate until after the death of the last survivor of us, and they shall not be liable or responsible in any way for the capital of the trust-estate which may be left in the hands and under the control of the survivor of us after the predeceaser's death, nor for the income thereof during the lifetime of the survivor, but shall only be responsible for what they, the said trustees, may receive possession of and intromit with after the death of the survivor of us. . . . And we hereby, during our joint lives, reserve our own liferent of the whole estate and effects above conveyed, with full power to us during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part as we shall think proper: But declaring that upon the death of either of us these presents shall become absolute and irrevocable; it being hereby specially agreed betwixt us that the survivor of us shall not have any power to alter or recall these presents, which shall be a valid and effectual deed immediately upon the death of the predeceaser of us, although found lying in the repositories of the predeceaser of us, or in the custody of the survivor of us, or of any other person to whom we or either of us may entrust the same, undelivered at the time of the death of the predeceaser of us, with the delivery whereof we hereby dispense for ever."

There were no children of the marriage. After Mrs Mitchell's death the persons named as trustees under the mutual settlement, which had been placed in the hands of the person who had acted as the pursuer's agent, accepted office, ascertained the net amount of the trust-estate, completed their title to the heritage, part of which they sold, and invested the funds. In 1875 the pursuer entered into a second marriage.

The parties were agreed that at the date of the mutual settlement the pursuer was possessed of means and estate to the extent of about £3000.

but it did not appear how much thereof consisted of heritable property. No. 125.
The wife's estate at that date consisted of two heritable bonds, together of the value of £460.

June 5, 1877.

Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

The pursuer made various averments with regard to the intention of himself and his wife in entering into the mutual settlement. These averments were not admitted by the defenders, and neither of the parties asked for proof. The case was argued on the footing that the pursuer and his late wife had not entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage.

The pursuer put in a minute, renouncing all benefit under the trust-disposition and settlement in the estate of his deceased wife, and offering a refund, with interest, any part of that estate which he might have received under the same.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The mutual settlement, being a mortis causa deed, is revocable by the pursuer. (2) At all events, it is revocable in so far as it disposes of his own estate. Separatim, it is revocable in so far as it disposes of one-half of the residue in favour of the pursuer's own brothers and sisters.* (3) The said settlement was a donation inter vivos in uxorem by the pursuer, and is revocable.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The trust-deed in question is not revocable by the pursuer, in respect that it is a mutual and onerous contract, intended to take effect during the survivor's lifetime; and, separatim, in respect that there is an express exclusion of the power of revocation. (3) The said trust-deed is at least mutual and onerous to such an extent that the pursuer cannot revoke it, so as to affect the provisions conceived in favour of his late wife's brothers and sisters or their issue.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th December 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the record and productions, finds that the trust-disposition and settlement referred to in the summons and record is revocable by the pursuer in so far as it disposes of his own estate, but that only on the condition that he shall renounce all benefit under the said disposition and settlement in the estate of his deceased wife, and refund, with interest, any part of that estate which he may have received under the same: Grants leave to claim against this interlocutor."†

* The summons contained alternative conclusions, to which the second part of this plea was relative.

† "NOTE.—Applying the language of the mutual trust-disposition to the event that happened (viz. the predecease of the wife on 18th October 1874), the pursuer thereby divested himself of his whole property as then (18th October 1874) existing, conveying it to trustees, with a direction to allow him the liferent, and on his death to divide the fee among his own and his deceased wife's brothers and sisters. If this be the legal import and plain meaning of the language employed, as I think it is, I must assume that the pursuer so understood and at the time intended, whatever doubt I may have of the fact, looking to the extraordinary and apparently improvident character of the proceeding, whether the deed was revocable by him or not. The question in the case is, whether or not he is at liberty to revoke.

"In the event that happened, the pursuer's part of the deed was not testamentary, but an alienation in his lifetime of his estate as it stood on 18th October 1874, in which his wife, who died on that day, had no interest except the benefit intended to her brothers and sisters or their issue, to take effect at the pursuer's death. But such a conveyance, while unimplemented, is, I think, clearly subject to revocation as a donation, unless protected therefrom by onerosity, i.e. looking to the facts of the particular case), by being the consideration or interpart of some conveyance or obligation by the wife in favour of the husband or others for whom he chose so to purchase a benefit. The defenders ac-

No. 125. The defenders reclaimed.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Trustees.

Argued for them ;—The deed was an onerous mutual settlement, which could not be revoked by one of the granters after the death of the other. There was no such inequality in the counter considerations of the deed as to make it a donation inter virum et uxorem. Further, revocation was barred by a jus quæsitum having been created in favour of third parties. The case could not be distinguished from that of Kidd v. Kidds.¹

cordingly contend, in defence of their trust and the interests under their protection, that the conveyance which the pursuer seeks to revoke is onerous, and therefore irrevocable. The ground of the contention is, that by the same deed the wife made an exactly corresponding conveyance of her estate, which the defenders say has passed to them, to be held subject to the same trusts as the estate of the husband. As she predeceased, her conveyance, with the relative direction operates testamentarily ; but as the pursuer's conveyance would have done : also had he been the predeceaser, there is in this circumstance no interference with the exactness of the mutuality.

“ It is, I think, clear that as regards the benefits conferred by the spouses on each other, the deed was onerous and not revocable by either. The survivor was thus secured irrevocably in the benefit designed by the deed to him or her, and this was no doubt the primary purpose of the deed. With respect to the ulterior benefit designed to the brothers and sisters of the spouses, to be satisfied out of the estate on the death of the survivor after the primary purpose of the deed was served, I think this was gratuitous when regarded as the joint act of the spouses, who were under no obligation or duty of which the law can take account, to provide for them. It follows that these parties had no jus quæsitum which would have been available against a joint revocation by the spouses. I am disposed to think (though this is not so clear), by one of them so far as regards his or her estate. The effect of such revocation by one only, on the interest under the deed of the revoking spouse in the estate of the other, is another matter, and involves the doctrine of election, or approbate and reprobate. If the survivor (say the husband) took the interest in his wife's estate which the deed assigned to him, I should hold that he was thereby precluded from revoking his own part of the deed, though in favour of strangers, which was the consideration (or part of it) of that benefit. In an ordinary contract, a party cannot, of course, free himself of the obligations upon him by simply renouncing those in his favour. But such a contract (as this deed implies) between husband and wife, is, I think, exceptional to this extent, that as regards strangers,—gratuitously benefited, and having nothing but the contract of a man and his wife to rest upon for legal onerosity,—either spouse may, by revocation, free his or her estate from its operation on the condition of surrendering all benefit under it in the estate of the other. If this is any extension of the doctrine which allows the revocation of gifts passing between husband and wife (which I doubt), it is, in my opinion, allowable as being according to the spirit and policy of the doctrine.

“ About two years have elapsed since the death of the pursuer's wife, but I am nevertheless of opinion that the pursuer ought not, on the ground of undue delay, to be denied a remedy otherwise competent to him. The deed was manifestly improvident, and I think he ought to be dealt with as having challenged it so soon as he realised its import and practical operation. The only parties having an adverse interest are in no way prejudiced by any delay that has occurred. I shall therefore allow the proposed revocation, on the condition of the pursuer renouncing all benefit under the deed, and refunding, with interest, any part of his wife's estate which he may have drawn under it. Beyond this I cannot in this process decide anything. In the meantime I shall only pronounce a general finding, which may be taken to review. With regard to expenses, in case the action should be ultimately disposed of in conformity with the opinion which I have expressed, I think the whole expenses of the trustees (the defenders) ought to be paid out of the pursuer's estate.”

¹ Hepburn v. Brown, 1814, 2 Dow's App. 342 ; Wood v. Fairley, Dec. 3, 1822, 2 S. 549 ; Gentles v. Aitken, June 23, 1826, 4 S. 749 ; Craich's Trustees v. Ma

Argued for the pursuer;—The rationality of the deed must be judged of, not merely at the date of its execution, but at the date when it came into operation, i.e. the death of the wife.¹ In the event which occurred there was no “reasonable proportion”² between what the spouses gave for the husband gave up everything, and received nothing beyond what the law would have given him. He was therefore entitled to revoke the deed as a donation inter virum et uxorem. The bequests to the relatives of the spouses were gratuitous and testamentary, and formed no part of the mutual considerations.³ The fact that the deed was placed in the hands of the agent for the spouses did not operate as delivery quoad the ultimate legatees. Besides, even delivery did not render a bequest irrevocable which was purely testamentary and gratuitous in its character.⁴ Nor did a mere statement that a bequest was irrevocable make it so.

At advising.—

LORD GIFFORD.—This case involves the consideration of several very important principles regulating settlements, mutual deeds, and donations between husband and wife, and particularly the rights of revocation and alteration which surviving spouse has after the death of the predeceaser.

The mutual trust-disposition and settlement in the present case, executed between the pursuer, Mr Mitchell, and his late wife, is a very peculiar deed, expressed in unusual terms, and containing very unusual provisions, and I have felt its construction and effect to be attended with a great deal of difficulty. Ultimately, however, I have come to substantially the same result as that reached by the Lord Ordinary, only, instead of making the renunciation by the husband of all interest in his wife's estate a condition of the revocation which the husband seeks, I am disposed to put such renunciation as a matter of consent upon the minute lodged by the pursuer. I hardly think it follows in all cases that a husband or wife who revokes the provisions of a mutual settlement as donations must give up all right to the estate of the other spouse, and although such renunciation by the husband may be quite reasonable in the present case decline to lay down any general rule on the subject.

The first observation which occurs in relation to the mutual disposition and settlement is that it is in substance a mortis causa deed, or, at all events, it is a deed not intended to have any effect whatever until the dissolution of the marriage by the death of one or other of the spouses. It is not a contract or remuneratory grant which is to be operative stante matrimonio, but is both in form and in substance a settlement of, in the words of the deed itself, “our affairs, so as to prevent disputes in regard thereto after our deaths.” No doubt

e, &c., June 24, 1870, 8 Macph. 898; Kidd v. Kidds, Dec. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 17, 36 Scot. Jur. 112.

¹ Hunter v. Dickson, Sept. 19, 1831, 5 W. and S. 455; McNeill or Steel v. Steel's Trustees, Dec. 8, 1829, 5 F. C., and 8 S. 210; Thomson v. Thomson, Feb. 20, 1838, 16 S. 641, 10 Scot. Jur. 319; Blaikie v. Milne, Nov. 14, 1838, 1 S. 18, 11 Scot. Jur. 29.

² Ersk. Inst. i. 6, 30.

³ Jardine v. Currie, June 17, 1830, 8 S. 937, 2 Scot. Jur. 483; Cousin v. Caldwell, June 5, 1838, 16 S. 1109, 10 Scot. Jur. 467; Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 232, 27 Scot. Jur. 86; Lang v. Brown, May 24, 1867, Macph. 789, 39 Scot. Jur. 407; Davidson and Others, May 27, 1870, 8 Macph. 17, 42 Scot. Jur. 458, and cases in note.

⁴ Somerville v. Somerville, May 18, 1819, F. C.; Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, ante, vol. ii. 237.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

No. 125. it is to take effect on the death of either of the spouses, and it contains a clause dispensing with delivery. Still it is to a large extent of a proper testamentary nature in reference to the estates of both the granters.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

And this leads, in the second place, to the inquiry,—At what date are the estates of the spouses to be considered, and the relative value of the grants or provisions made by the spouses hinc inde to be considered, so as to judge how far they are onerous and mutual, or how far they are donations? Is the date at which the comparison is to be made the date of the deed itself, when both spouses were alive and when their chances of life or of future successions were unknown, or is it the date of the dissolution of the marriage by the predecease of the wife, when the rights of the husband and of his wife's next of kin became by law fixed and known?

Now, I am of opinion that in this case it is the date of the death of the wife, the date of the dissolution of the marriage by her death, which is to be taken as the date of comparison of the value of what the husband took and received and of what he gave or obliged himself to give per contra by the deed in question so as to judge how far the grants by the husband were donations or not. I think this is the general rule in all cases where the alleged deed of donation is not to take effect till the dissolution of the marriage. It is then and then only you can exactly ascertain how far it is a donation or not. Where there is no proper contract between the living spouses, with remuneratory or onerous grant to take effect instantly or stante matrimonio, the case might be otherwise, but where a provision to take effect at the dissolution of the marriage must, I think, as to its reasonableness, extent, or onerosity, be judged of at the dissolution. And accordingly, I think it has been fixed by the decided cases. In M'Neill v. Steel v. Steel's Trustees, 8th December 1829, F. C., this was one of the points, and the value of the husband's estate was taken not at the date of the postnuptial contract (which was reduced as a donation), but at the date of Mr Steel's death. Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle says, and the other Judges concur, "I am clear that we are not to look at its value as at the date of the deed, but as at the time of his (Mr Steel's) death, when the question arises. We are therefore to take the value of his estate as at the time of his death." In Hunt v. Dickson, as decided in the House of Lords 19th December 1831, 5 W. R. S. 455, the same principle was applied even when the contract challenged as a donation was a contract of separation which had taken effect during marriage and had not been revoked at its dissolution. The annuity to the wife stipulated in the contract, and which she had received stante matrimonio, was held to be inadequate and a donation on her part, in respect that at the death of her husband he left an estate which would have given her by law a much larger provision. The Lord Chancellor says,—“In order to ascertain whether there was an inadequacy of consideration, another question, and that of law and not of fact, is to be determined, namely, whether the consideration given by the one party, in respect to and in comparison with the rights surrendered by the other, is to be compared with the amount and value of those rights at the date of the contract executed, or at the determination of the matrimonial contract, that is to say, at the death of the husband. I was at first inclined to think, on general principles (for no doubt in other cases it would be so), that the comparison of the consideration with the value given up was to be taken at the date of the contract, and not at any subsequent time, but I am satisfied now by the case decided on the authority of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and that recent case not sented from by his brethren, and I am still more satisfied from the reason of the thing, that there is a peculiarity in the irrevocable nature of the marriage-contract, and that in those donations you are, upon the plainest principle, to regard not merely the date of the contract, but also the last period, namely, the decease of the husband." The same principle seems to have been applied in subsequent cases, among which I may mention Thomson, 20th February 1838, 16 S. 641, Blaikie v. Milne, 14th November 1838, 1 D. 18.

How, then, did matters stand at the dissolution of the marriage by the death of Mrs Mitchell? We have not the relative values of the estates of the husband and wife respectively very accurately ascertained or stated on record, but, as in such questions, to use the expression of Lord Eldon, matters are not to be weighed in very nice scales, probably we have enough for the purposes of the case. The wife's estate, then, at the dissolution, may be taken as consisting of two heritable bonds, together of the value of £460, and the husband's means, including his heritable estate, about £3000. Now, as there was no antenuptial contract, if there had been no mutual settlement, the husband, on his wife's death, would have retained the whole of his own estate, and in virtue of his courtesy would have liferented his wife's two bonds. By the mutual settlement he gets a liferent of the whole, that is, practically, and leaving his own estate out of view, he gets a simple liferent of his wife's two bonds, and the result is that under the deed he takes nothing whatever to which he had not right independent of the deed and at common law. On the other hand, by the mutual deed he gives away gratuitously the absolute fee of his whole estate, one-half to his own brothers and sisters, and the other half to the brothers and sisters of his deceased wife and their issue, excluding David and Thomas Hogg, two of his wife's nephews specially named, and he retains a bare liferent of his own property. I think it can hardly be maintained that the provisions hinc inde here, and as the case has turned out, are mutual or remuneratory, or that there is any reasonable equitable relation between the two. The husband really gives all and gets nothing, and so, instead of being an onerous or remuneratory contract it is very truly, indeed altogether, a pure donation so far as the husband is concerned. In the case stopped here I think there would be no doubt of the husband's power to revoke, for it is quite fixed that [a husband or wife being the donor] he may revoke the gift even after the death of the other spouse, and at any time during the life of the donor.

But, then, it is said, and here also are questions attended with nicety, that the donation by the husband in this case is not a donation to the wife at all, but a donation to third parties, namely, to his own brothers and sisters as to one-half of his estate, and to the brothers and sisters of his wife and their children, in two specified exceptions, as to the other half of his estate. It is contended that the deed quoad these ultimate legatees has been delivered, or must be held such, that jus quæritum tertio has taken place, and that the whole estate of the husband and the wife are now disposed of beyond recall, the deed being expressly declared irrevocable.

Now, this would be a very startling result, for its effect would be, if the condition is well founded, that the pursuer, Mr Mitchell, stands divested of everything he possessed, of his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including his furniture and body clothes, for although the body clothes of the predecessor are excepted, there is no such exception as to the survivor, and, accordingly, although the pursuer has married again, and may have a family, he is not to

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v.
Mitchell's
Trustees.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
 Mitchell v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustees.

be allowed to make any provision for his new wife, or for his children, but every thing he has is to go to his own brothers and sisters, and the brothers and sisters of his late wife. His present wife and any children he may leave are to be left destitute unless he should happen to earn in his later years a new estate.

I find myself unable to accede to this contention. In the first place, the declaration as to irrevocability really goes for nothing if the bequest is in its nature revocable, for the clause of irrevocability may be itself revoked. It falls with the deed. No man by merely calling his will his last and irrevocable will can bar himself from altering it.

In the next place, I think the deed, though delivered as between the spouses and in the hands of their mutual agent, has not been delivered quoad the ultimate residuary legatees of the husband. It would be held delivered quoad the wife's estate, because it is really her will, and she is dead, and in testamentary death is delivery, or rather no delivery is needed; but it cannot be said as in the question between the husband and either his wife's brothers and sisters or his own brothers and sisters, that he, the husband, has delivered the deed to them. Apart from the deed being left in the hands of the agent of the spouses there has been no delivery whatever.

But, in the third place, and this is the main point, I am of opinion that the provisions made by the husband, and by the wife too for that part of it in favour of their respective brothers and sisters or nephews and nieces, are testamentary in their nature, and are not conventional or obligatory. The narrative of the deed shews this, for it proceeds on a statement not only of love and favour which the spouses bear to each other and certain onerous causes, and this relates to the provisions to the spouses respectively inter se—but it goes on to say that it is a “duty incumbent on us to settle our affairs so as to prevent disputes in regard thereto after our deaths,” that is, after the death of both of us, and this is just the narrative of an ordinary testament. It often happens that the same deed embraces various ends, and is intended to accomplish various purposes, and the effects in such cases will not be different from those which would have followed had they been provided for in separate deeds. The nature and essence of the provisions must always be ascertained, and the proper interpretation applied. An antenuptial contract of marriage very often embraces settlement by each of the engaging spouses of their separate and independent estates, in case the marriage be dissolved without issue; and although the contract is onerous and irrevocable, quoad the spouses and their issue, it will be read as a mere testament, and be ambulatory and revocable during the life of each spouse quoad their respective estates. The same may happen, perhaps, even more frequently in postnuptial contracts, and there are many instances of this. In the present case is an example. The spouses, after providing for each other, whichever be the survivor, contemplate the death of both without issue, and proceed to make their respective testaments accordingly. The wife gives her estate to her brothers and sisters, next of kin, with certain exceptions, and the husband leaves his estate to his brothers and sisters. If either of them had children would this not have operated as a revocation? If either of them, after the dissolution of the marriage, had married again, as has happened, would not the spouse so marrying be entitled to revoke his testamentary arrangements? Nor do I think any difficulty really arises from the circumstance, which is doubtless an important peculiarity, that instead of using separate testamentary words, each spouse bequeathing his or her own estate, they use mutual words.

wh bequeathing the estate as a whole, one-half to each set of next of kin. If No. 125.
 is had been done between strangers it might easily have been held in certain rumstances to have been a mutual settlement, which in general, and, except June 5, 1877.
 some unforeseen cases, may be only revocable by mutual consent. But when Mitchell v.
 ch a deed is made between husband and wife the general law of revocation Trustees.
 of nations comes into play, and a wife or husband who stipulates for a bequest to air heirs or next of kin is really, unless there is something very exceptional, in e same position as if stipulating for herself or himself. This was the principle cognised in the cases of Glasford v. Dawling, March 22, 1634, M. 6106; Stewart Foulis, Feb. 1686, M. 6096; Jardine v. Currie, 17th June 1830, 8 S. 937.
 In the present case I cannot hold that it was pars contractus between husband d wife, and an onerous contract, that the husband should at the dissolution of e marriage divest himself of his whole estate, and I think no distinction can taken, so far as the husband's estate is concerned, between his wife's relatives d his own. If the one set of relatives have a jus quæsitum so have the other.
 Of course it is quite different, quoad the wife's estate, because her testament s become final by her death; and I am of opinion that it will carry the fee of e whole of her estate, and not merely of one-half of it, to her preferred next of n, for it was a condition of her bequest of one-half of her estate to her sband's brothers that one-half of the husband's estate should come to her own eferred heirs. If this condition is not fulfilled the wife's heirs-nominate will im her whole estate in part compensation of what the husband has revoked d withheld.

There might have been a question whether the husband, besides retaining his n estate, might not have also claimed the liferent or courtesy—(of course he ld not claim the fee of the wife's bonds);—but as he has wisely and properly ren up this it is needless to consider it.

On the whole, then, I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be hered to, inserting, in reference to the renunciation by the husband of all erest in the wife's estate, that this renunciation is in terms of the pursuer's nute of consent.

LORD ORMDALE—This is a peculiar case as regards its circumstances, and rious nice and difficult questions in law have been raised in it. And it is cernly not without misgiving that I have now to express my opinion on these estions, seeing it differs not only from that of Lord Gifford, but also, I under-nd, from that of your Lordship in the chair, and, in reference to one branch the case, from that of the Lord Ordinary.

The first and most important inquiry is, how far the mutual disposition and tlement must be held to have been onerous and obligatory, or, to put it dif-erently, how far were the considerations given by the wife fair and reasonable counterparts of those which were given to her by her husband. The Lord dinary in the note to his judgment says that he thinks "it clear that as ards the benefits conferred by the spouses on each other the deed was onerous d not revocable by either." But this view of the matter was disputed by the rsuer, and as the case depends very much on whether it is to be taken as sound rnot, it is right that I should at once, and at the outset, address myself to it.
 It is not, I think, quite clear from the record what were the means and estate onging to each of the spouses when they executed the mutual disposition d settlement in question in December 1873. In the first article of his con-

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
 Mitchell v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustees.

descendence the pursuer states that at its date he "was possessed of means and estate to the extent of £3000, or thereby, and his said wife was lender and creditor in two bonds and dispositions in security, together of the value of £460, and which were executed by the granters thereof in her favour before her marriage with the pursuer;" and the answer made by the defenders to this statement is, that "the value of the means and estate belonging to the pursuer and his said wife respectively at that date is admitted." Whether any, and, if any, how much of the £3000 consisted of heritage is not stated, but neither in regard to this or any other matter of fact did either of the parties ask a proof. The debate took place on the footing that probate was not desired. I have not, however, overlooked the statement in article 13 of the condescendence and answer thereto, from which it appears that at his death the trustor had heritable property in Carnoustie, but what was its value does not appear from the record, although it was stated, if I recollect rightly, at the debate, on the part of the pursuer, that its value was £2000.

The question then arises, was there any such inequality in the counter considerations, in reference to which the mutual disposition and settlement was executed, as to entitle the pursuer, as the husband, to revoke it after the death of his wife, on the principle of donatio inter virum et uxorem. There were no children of the marriage, and it does not appear, and was not said, that any antenuptial contract of marriage had been entered into between the parties. It was therefore not unreasonable that the husband should by postnuptial deed make some provision for his wife in the event of her survivance. Independently, however, of this I am not prepared to say that there was any such inequality in the mutual considerations in the deed in question as to entitle the pursuer, as husband, to revoke it after his wife's death. According to the general rule, as illustrated by many decided cases, a mutual deed of settlement, partaking as it does of the nature of contract, cannot be altered or revoked except by both of the parties to it. And, in the present case, the deed expressly bears that it was specially agreed by the parties that the survivor should not have any power to alter or recall it, but that immediately on the death of the predecessor it should be a valid and effectual deed.

It is true that while the husband is admitted to have had means and estate to the extent of £3000, and the wife £460 only when the deed was executed, it is also true that the £3000, so far as moveable estate, formed the fund in communion between the spouses, to one-half of which the wife would have been entitled in the event of her surviving her husband. In this view the wife's own £460 and half of her husband's £3000, if moveable, would belong to her. But supposing that some portion of the £3000 was heritable estate it does not appear to me that even in that view, and bearing in mind the rights which would arise of terce and courtesy, according as the death of the one spouse or the other first happened, there is sufficient room for holding that there was inequality in the counter considerations, in reference to which the deed in question was executed, attending to what the parties did by that deed. Now, what the parties did by the fourth purpose of the deed was to declare that the survivor was to enjoy the liferent of the whole of their means and estate, and even to encroach on the capital if necessary for his or her subsistence; and by the fifth purpose it is provided that the capital, or what might remain of it, that is, the free residue on the death of the longest liver of the spouses, should go in equal

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.

Mitchell v.

Mitchell's

Trustees.

lives to the brothers and sisters, then alive, of the parties respectively, and their issue, to the exclusion of two of the wife's nephews specially named. I must own my inability, in this state of matters, on any fair and reasonable view I can adopt, to hold that there was any such inequality in the counter considerations in the deed as to entitle the husband to revoke it after the death of his wife. It is true that in virtue of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1820, cap. 23, section 6, the wife's representatives could have no right to any part of the £3000—supposing it were wholly moveable—as forming the goods and chattels of the husband in the event, which happened, of her predeceasing her husband, in reference to that contingency, if it alone were to be looked at, there would be a considerable inequality. But, in reference to the other contingency of the wife surviving her husband, and this might have happened just as well rather more likely than the other, if she was considerably younger than her husband, as, I understand from what was stated at the debate she was, the preponderance of consideration was in favour of the wife. And, at any rate, she had all she had, and all that might come to her, and the pursuer, her husband, had no more. In these circumstances, and as it was impossible to tell at the time the mutual disposition and settlement was executed which of the two spouses would predecease the other, I cannot say there was any such inequality as to counter considerations as to entitle the pursuer as husband to revoke the deed after the death of his wife.

It was argued, however, for the pursuer, that the date at which the equality of consideration must be judged of is the death of the wife, when the deed came into operation. But I must take leave to doubt this, either as a general rule or as which is applicable to the circumstances with which we are here dealing. In the case of Hunter v. Dickson as decided in the House of Lords (19th Sept. 1852, 5 W. and S., p. 455), it would rather appear to have been held by the Chancellor, looking at the whole of his observations and not an isolated part, that both the date of the deed and the date when it comes into operation ought to be taken into consideration. In the present case, having regard to the circumstances, and especially that the spouses became parties to a deed purporting to be of the nature of contract, I am disposed to think that the date of the deed is that at which the parties themselves must have had chiefly, if not exclusively, in view when it was executed by them; but I am not unwilling to hold that the date of the deed and the date when it came into operation should be taken into account, and in this view my opinion as to the right of the husband to revoke the deed after the death of his wife is that which has been already expressed by me.

There is still another ground in respect of which the mutual disposition and settlement in question must, in my opinion, be held irrevocable by the pursuer after the death of his wife, and that is the vested interests which have been created by it in favour of third parties, viz., the brothers and sisters of the spouses respectively. A mere spes successionis would not have been sufficient to prevent revocation as was decided in the case of Fernie v. Colquhoun, 20th Nov. 1854, 17 D. 232; but the opinions of the Judges were, in that case, to the effect that the decision would have been otherwise if there had been any vestitum tertio in respect of a vested interest. Nor did I understand it to be contended that there were in the present case interests vested in third parties, but a mere spes successionis. The deed being a mutual disposition and settlement in favour of trustees, and so expressed and dealt with as to have been operative, and, indeed, put into full operation immediately on the death

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
 Mitchell v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustees.

descentence the pursuer states that at its date he "was possessed of means and estate to the extent of £3000, or thereby, and his said wife was lender as creditor in two bonds and dispositions in security, together of the value of £460 and which were executed by the granters thereof in her favour before her marriage with the pursuer;" and the answer made by the defenders to this statement is, that "the value of the means and estate belonging to the pursuer and his said wife respectively at that date is admitted." Whether any, and, if any, how much of the £3000 consisted of heritage is not stated, but neither regard to this or any other matter of fact did either of the parties ask a proof. The debate took place on the footing that probate was not desired. I have not, however, overlooked the statement in article 13 of the condescendence and answer thereto, from which it appears that at his death the trustor had heritable property in Carnoustie, but what was its value does not appear from the record, although it was stated, if I recollect rightly, at the debate, on the part of the pursuer, that its value was £2000.

The question then arises, was there any such inequality in the counter considerations, in reference to which the mutual disposition and settlement was executed, as to entitle the pursuer, as the husband, to revoke it after the death of his wife, on the principle of donatio inter virum et uxorem. There were children of the marriage, and it does not appear, and was not said, that an antenuptial contract of marriage had been entered into between the parties. It was therefore not unreasonable that the husband should by postnuptial deed make some provision for his wife in the event of her survivance. Independent, however, of this I am not prepared to say that there was any such inequality in the mutual considerations in the deed in question as to entitle the pursuer, as husband, to revoke it after his wife's death. According to the general rule, illustrated by many decided cases, a mutual deed of settlement, partaking as it does of the nature of contract, cannot be altered or revoked except by both the parties to it. And, in the present case, the deed expressly bears that it was specially agreed by the parties that the survivor should not have any power to alter or recall it, but that immediately on the death of the predeceasing it should be a valid and effectual deed.

It is true that while the husband is admitted to have had means and estate to the extent of £3000, and the wife £460 only when the deed was executed, it is also true that the £3000, so far as moveable estate, formed the fund in common between the spouses, to one-half of which the wife would have been entitled in the event of her surviving her husband. In this view the wife's own £460 and half of her husband's £3000, if moveable, would belong to her. But supposing that some portion of the £3000 was heritable estate it does not appear to me that even in that view, and bearing in mind the rights which would arise of terce and courtesy, according as the death of the one spouse or the other first happened, there is sufficient room for holding that there was inequality in the counter considerations, in reference to which the deed in question was executed, attending to what the parties did by that deed. Now, what the parties did by the fourth purpose of the deed was to declare that the survivor was to enjoy the liferent of the whole of their means and estate, and was not to encroach on the capital if necessary for his or her subsistence; and by the fifth purpose it is provided that the capital, or what might remain of it, that is, the free residue on the death of the longest liver of the spouses, should go in equal served by Lord Glenlee in the case of Gentles v. Aitken, 23d June 1826, 4 No. 125. 1749—and his observation was concurred in by the rest of the Court—"A party may undoubtedly give legacies to strangers in a contract; and where it is clear that they are not in lieu of the other stipulations they would be revocable if in a separate deed. But the provision here was a counter stipulation in favour of the husband's family, and irrevocable."

June 5, 1877.
Mitchell v. Trustees.

On the whole matter, I am, for the reasons I have now stated, of opinion that Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied in the conclusions of the action.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is impossible to deny that this is a difficult and important case. Allowing all weight to the observations of my brother Lord Midale, which are strong and impressive, I prefer the result at which Lord Ford has arrived.

There are two questions in the case which stand essentially apart. The first whether this mutual settlement was, as far as the husband was concerned, a donation between husband and wife; in other words, whether the deed being substance and effect inequitable in respect of inadequacy of consideration, so a donation to the wife, the husband is entitled to revoke it. The second question is whether, supposing the deed to be a donation, and therefore revocable by the husband in regard to the wife, interests have been created in favour of both parties, which prevent the deed being revoked as regards them.

In the first question an important inquiry is involved, viz., at what period are the respective interests created by the deed to be compared. The case of *Hunter v. Dickson*¹ has been quoted by Lord Gifford as an authority for the proposition, that the adequacy or inadequacy of the considerations, in exchange for which the husband or wife gives up his or her legal rights, may be judged of when the deed comes into operation, that is, at the dissolution of the marriage, not merely at the date when the deed is executed. After the best consideration which I can give to the subject I think that if there is inequality at either of these dates the spouse whose interests are prejudiced by the deed is entitled to revoke it. It is sufficient that the husband or wife be inequitably affected by the deed, either as originally executed, or as it came into operation, to entitle the party to set aside the deed as a donation inter virum et uxorem. If the deed is plainly inequitable at the time, clearly the party injured has a right to revoke it, and nothing which subsequently emerges can affect that result. On the other hand, although there may be equality of consideration at the time, if the ultimate result produces inequality, the substance and effect of the deed must be regarded, and the spouse who is injured will in that case also be entitled to revoke.

Applying this rule to the present case, when this deed came into operation it was manifestly and palpably unequal. While the provisions made for the wife in the event of her survivance may have been reasonable, the husband, in the event which happened, got nothing whatever as the counterpart of the obligation under which he had come, of restricting himself to a life interest of his own property in favour of his own and his wife's relatives. The obligation to provide for a sufficient provision for his wife might have supported the deed to that extent; but, far as the settlement on the wife's heirs or representatives was stipulated

¹ Hunter v. Dickson, Sept. 19, 1831, 5 W. and S. 455.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
 Mitchell v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustees.

of the wife, it is difficult to come to the conclusion,—at least I feel it to be difficult,—that effect should be given to the pursuer's demands in the present action. I find it stated by the pursuer himself in article 5 of his condescendence that his own agent after his wife died "requested the trustees to accept of office, and to act therein as to dispossess the pursuer, after he had proved to be the survivor of the spouses, of the possession and contract of his own means and estate. And again in article 13 of his condescendence it is also stated by the pursuer that the trustees have, in virtue of the trust-disposition and settlement, taken infestment in his property in Carnoustie. The Lord Ordinary says that infestment was taken two years before the date of his interlocutor.

In these circumstances it appears to me that consistently with well established law the pursuer cannot now be held entitled to revoke the mutual disposition and settlement in question. The case of Kidd v. Kidds, 10th December 1866 (2 Macph. 227), seems to me to be very much in point in regard to all the questions which here arise. Excepting that the pecuniary interests involved were there more limited than they are here, and that the beneficiaries in whose favour a jus quesitum was created were the children of the marriage, in place as here, the brothers and sisters of the spouses, all the essential circumstances were very similar. The husband was to be restricted to a liferent, which was to terminate if he entered into a second marriage. Such a deed was all the husband had as it turned out that the husband survived his wife, then entered into a second marriage, and had more children. And yet his whole estate, capital and income, as it stood at the death of his first wife, passed entirely from him to his children by that wife.

The amount of the pecuniary interest involved in Kidd's case cannot, I think, affect the matter, and neither, do I think, can the circumstance of the husband being entitled to the ultimate benefit being the children of the first marriage. In regard to the latter point Lord Deas said,—“I agree in the observation that in this case the children, who are donees, are to be regarded as third parties to whom an interest has vested under the delivered deed, more especially as the wife had rights in respect of which she was entitled to bargain for behoof of her children,” just as the wife, in the present case, may be said to have had rights for which she was entitled to bargain for behoof of her brothers and sisters. It is, indeed, obvious from the report that the decision in the case of Kidd proceeds not on specialities, but on general principles applicable alike to all cases of this class to which it and the present case belong.

I must therefore hold it to have been settled in the case of Kidd v. Kidds that a mutual deed of settlement, such as that here in question, is not revocable by the husband, after his wife's death, on the ground of its being mortis causa, or on the principle of donatio inter virum et uxorem stante matrimonio, that revocation is barred in the present as it was in that case by the intention of vested interests creating a jus quesitum tertio. And if I am right in these propositions it necessarily follows that the deed is in all respects binding in giving the benefits intended by it for the brothers and sisters of the spouses. These interests are associated with, and made to depend in such manner upon the rights of the spouses themselves, which form the other objects of the mutual deed, as to render it impossible, I think, to deal with them as separate and independent legacies or interests. They are unmistakeably made to form an important part, and a very important part, of the counter considerations in reference to which the spouses contracted and agreed to execute the mutual deed. As

THE LORD ADVOCATE, Pursuer.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Sol.-Gen. Macdonald No. 126.
—Rutherford.

MRS E. M. BALFOUR OR SIDGWICK, Defender.—Kinnear.

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

Succession-Duty Act (16 and 17 Vict. c. 51), sec. 17.—The 17th section of the Succession-Duty Act provides that “no bond or contract made by any person in jure for valuable consideration in money or money’s worth, for the payment of money or money’s worth, after the death of any other person, shall create the relation of predecessor and successor between the person making such bond or contract and the person to or with whom the same shall be made.”

A lady on her husband’s death became entitled to payment of an annuity of £1000 provided to her by her husband’s father in her antenuptial contract of marriage. The Crown claimed succession-duty from the widow as successor to her father-in-law who had predeceased her husband. The widow claimed exemption under sec. 17, on the ground that the annuity had been granted for valuable considerations set forth in the marriage-contract, viz. (1) the settlement of £10,000 by her father upon the spouses and the children of the marriage, and her renunciation of jus relictæ and terce. Held, in sustaining the claim of the Crown (diss. Lord Deas), (1) that the provision by the lady’s father was a consideration for the granting of the annuity in the sense of the Act, and that the renunciation of jus relictæ and terce was not a valuable consideration, the husband, at the date of the marriage-contract, having neither heritable nor moveable estate.

Observed (per the Lord President) that in most marriage-contracts the consideration of each provision is the marriage.

THIS was a special case presented by the Lord Advocate, and Mrs Sidgwick, daughter and executrix of the late Lady Blanche Balfour, under the 8th section of the Court of Exchequer Act (19 and 20 Vict. c. 56). The question submitted to the Court was whether an annuity of £3000 provided to Lady Blanche in her marriage-contract was chargeable with succession-duty under the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51, sec. 2.

The contract of marriage in 1843 between James Maitland Balfour, eldest son of James Balfour of Whittinghame, on the first part, the said James Balfour on the second part, and Lady Blanche Cecil and her father, the Duke of Salisbury, on the third part, Mr James Balfour, in contemplation of the marriage (which took place) between his son and Lady Blanche Cecil, bound himself and his heirs to entail the estates of Whittinghame, and other estates of great value, upon his son, and the issue of the marriage, and bound himself to pay his son an annuity of £1000 during their joint lives. Further, the father and son bound themselves and the heirs of entail to pay Lady Blanche an annuity of £500 in the form of pin-money, until her jointure of £3000 aftermentioned should become payable, but declaring that during James Balfour’s lifetime the interest of Lady Blanche’s fortune of £10,000 aftermentioned should be applied as payment pro tanto of the annuity of £500.

Further, James Balfour bound himself and the heirs of entail to pay to Lady Blanche after the death of James Maitland Balfour, her promised husband, an annuity or jointure of £3000, which should be a real burden upon the lands to be entailed.

Lady Blanche accepted these provisions in full of her terce and jus relictæ, for which causes and upon the other part Lord Salisbury bound himself to grant a bond for £10,000, bearing interest at 4 per cent, to the heirs—(1) During the lifetime of James Balfour for payment of the interest to Lady Blanche, to be imputed pro tanto to the annuity of £500; after James Balfour’s death to pay the interest to J. Maitland Balfour during his life; (3) after his death to pay the interest to Lady Blanche

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

No. 125.

June 5, 1877.
 Mitchell v.
 Mitchell's
 Trustees.

for by her, it was pure donation, for which, as the event has shewn, she gave and her husband received, nothing. The law would have given him all that received.

The second question is, whether, supposing that the deed was revocable regards the wife, it can now be revoked as regards the donees. It is as with some force, that as the deed has been delivered, and the trustees have entered into possession of the estate under the deed, it is now too late to exercise the right of revocation. There have been a variety of decisions on the subject both ways, but I have been unable to find any case in which a testamentary deed in favour of third parties, and purely gratuitous, has been held by delivery to create a jus quaesitum, so as to prevent the party making the settlement from revoking it. The case is quite different when there is reasonable equality on either side, so as to sustain it in a question between the granters. But if the deed be in itself only testamentary and gratuitous, it will not be saved from revocation by being delivered. I do not intend to go over the cases. They have been commented upon with great force in the recent case of Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees.¹ I shall only refer to one of these, Somerville v. Somerville, May 1819, F. C. In that case the deed was not only delivered, but a document to that effect was written upon it by the granter. The Court held that as the deed was testamentary and gratuitous, there was necessarily implied a right on the part of the granter to revoke it. The present is a strong case for the application of the same principle, because the settlement is not in favour of the children of the marriage, but in favour of the brothers and sisters of the truster and his wife. The case of Kidd,² which has been referred to, was a different case from the present. There the parties were in a humble rank of life, and the wife succeeded to a legacy of £300. The husband at once very properly made a contract with his wife in regard to this sum in favour of the children of the marriage. But, more especially as the fund came from the wife, the deed in favour of the children of the marriage was in no sense gratuitous, but was a reasonable fulfilment of a natural obligation. Here the bequest is in favour of third parties and is purely testamentary.

With the variation proposed by Lord Gifford, we shall adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the trust-disposition and settlement referred to in the summons and record is revoked by the pursuer, in so far as it disposes of his own estate; but in terms of the minute No. 12 of process that such revocation be on the condition that he shall renounce all benefit under the disposition and settlement in the estate of his deceased wife, and refund, with interest, any part of said estate which he may have received under the same: With the above variation, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find both parties entitled to their expenses out of the fund in the hands of the trustees," &c.

W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—FYFE, MILLER, FYFE, & IRELAND, S.S.C.—Agents.

¹ Dec. 18, 1874, ante, vol. ii. p. 237.

² Kidd v. Kidds, Dec. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 227, 36 Scot. Jur. 112.

The Lord Advocate reclaimed, and argued;—To bring the case within No. 126. the exemption of the statute there must be a direct consideration in money

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

obligation was truly the obligation of James Balfour, and became prestable by his son only as heir of entail. Had the latter predeceased his father the annuity would have been payable to Lady Blanche by James Balfour, not under the deed of entail, but in virtue of the personal obligation undertaken by him in the contract of marriage, and after his death it would have been payable by the next succeeding heir of entail, under an obligation imposed not by the husband, but by James Balfour in the deed of entail. And if the defendant's case had depended solely upon the contention now under consideration, I should have had great difficulty in sustaining her claim for exemption from succession-duty.

"But I think the defendant is entitled to prevail on the other ground pleaded by her, viz. that the annuity was settled for valuable consideration in money or money's worth in the sense of section 17 of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. 51. The part of the section on which this argument is based is expressed as follows, viz. :—'No bond or contract made by any person bona fide for valuable consideration in money or money's worth for the payment of money or money's worth after the death of any other person shall create the relation of predecessor and successor between the person making such bond or contract and the person to or with whom the same shall be made.' The meaning of that section has been considered in various cases in England. In the case of Floyer v. Bankes, 9 Jur. (N. S.), p. 1255, which was cited for the Lord Advocate as his leading authority, the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) said,—"The essential requisites of a contract which is not to create a succession are clearly defined by the 17th section. First, it must be a contract by one person to pay money or money's worth to another; secondly, it must be made bona fide for valuable consideration existing in money or money's worth; thirdly, the contract creating personal liability between the contracting parties; and, finally, such a contract is prevented from creating a succession only as between the contracting parties, for all that the 17th section does is to declare that there shall be no relation of predecessor and successor between the person bound to pay and the person entitled to receive." Adopting this as the sound construction of the statute, I am of opinion that in the present case all these essential requisites are to be found. In the first place, there is a contract by James Balfour to pay money to another (Lady Blanche) on the death of a third person, viz. James Balfour. In the second place, the contract is made undoubtedly bona fide for the valuable consideration of £10,000 settled by the lady and her father, which creates personal liability between James Balfour and Lady Blanche; and, finally, the annuity on which succession-duty is claimed is, according to the Lord Advocate's own contention, a succession between these two contracting parties, viz. the person bound to pay and the person entitled to receive, but as between such parties the statute declares that there shall be no relation of predecessor and successor.

It is indeed maintained on behalf of the Lord Advocate that in the present case no valuable consideration in money or money's worth was given for the annuity. It is unnecessary in the view which I take of the case to hold that either the marriage itself or the renunciation by Lady Blanche of her terce and jus relictis constituted a valuable consideration in money or money's worth. The husband had apparently at the date of the contract no estate, heritable or moveable, in that respect the case closely resembles the case of Floyer v. Bankes, in which Lord Westbury, reversing the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, expressly decided that neither the marriage nor the renunciation by the wife of a third dowry out of the estates which her husband might never possess could be held to be considerations in money's worth. But in the present case I think it must be held that a valuable consideration in money was given for the annuity by the settlement in the marriage-contract of £10,000 by the Marquis of Salisbury for behoof of his daughter, Lady Blanche, and her husband, J. M. Balfour, the children of the marriage. It is said that neither the said sum of £10,000 nor any other sum of money was paid or provided to James Balfour; but that

No. 126.

June 6, 1877.
 Lord Advocate
 v. Sidgwick.

over and above her jointure; (4) after her death to pay the capital to the children of the marriage; (5) in the event of there being no children, pay the capital, if Lady Blanche predeceased her husband, to such persons as she should appoint, or, failing such appointment, to her husband if he survived, but if she should survive to herself in absolute property.

All the stipulations of the contract were fulfilled, and the entail Whittinghame was executed by James Balfour, in which the jointure of £3000 to Lady Blanche was made a real burden. He died in 1845. His son, James Maitland Balfour, succeeded to the estates, and died in 1851. He was survived by his widow, Lady Blanche Balfour, who thenceforth received her annuity of £3000 till her death in 1872.

The Lord Advocate maintained "that under the Act 16 and 17 V. cap. 51, the annuity of £3000 was a succession derived by Lady Blanche from James Balfour upon the death of her husband, and as such liable in succession-duty at the rate of one per cent; that the marriage of his son with Lady Blanche was the consideration on account of which James Balfour granted the annuity, and marriage, although a valuable consideration, was not a valuable consideration for money or money's worth in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act; that neither of the spouses conferred any provision on James Balfour, but he, besides the annuity of £3000 in question to Lady Blanche, granted to James Maitland Balfour an annuity of £3500 during their joint lives, and obliged him to grant the entails of Whittinghame and others, in which James Maitland Balfour was the substitute immediately after himself; that reciprocal provisions by the spouses in favour of each other could not be regarded as valuable consideration in money or money's worth to James Balfour, and they were not such with reference to the spouses themselves in the sense of the Succession-Duty Act."

The defender maintained "that the said annuity was not chargeable in succession-duty, in respect (1) that it was settled for valuable consideration in money or money's worth in the sense of section 17 of the Act 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51, such valuable consideration being, first, the payment of £10,000 for the purposes of the marriage-contract, and secondly the discharge by Lady Blanche Balfour of terce and jus relictæ; and in respect (2) that the payment of the foresaid annuity was an obligation undertaken by the said James Maitland Balfour in favour of his wife, under the foresaid disposition and deed of entail, and as such was liable in succession-duty."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Is of opinion, finds, decerns, and declares that the annuity of £3000 provided to Lady Blanche Balfour, and referred to in the said special case, is not chargeable with succession-duty: Grants leave to the Lord Advocate to reclaim."

* Lady Blanche was one of four children who were entitled under her mother's marriage-contract to such share of a sum of £20,000 as their father might appoint. Lady Blanche, in consideration of the sum of £10,000 provided by her father in her marriage-contract, and paid to the trustees, gave discharge of her claim upon the above sum.

† "NOTE.—One of the grounds on which the defendant maintains that the annuity of £3000 provided to Lady Blanche Balfour in her marriage-contract is not liable to succession-duty is that the payment of said annuity was an obligation undertaken by her husband, James Maitland Balfour, in favour of her. But I do not think that the obligation was either in form or in substance a donation of that character. It is true that James Maitland Balfour, by his will, gave possession of the estate of Whittinghame on the death of his father, James Balfour, accepted the disposition and deed of entail thereof executed by his father, and thereby became bound to pay the said annuity as heir of entail. But must look to the precise words of the Act as applicable to the legal relation constituted. 2. The lady's renunciation of her terce and jus relictæ was a valuable consideration in money or money's worth. The judgment of Lord Westbury in Floyer implied that if there had been present rights given up it would have been sufficient.

No. 126.

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this special case, and disposed of by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, is, whether a certain annuity of £3000 provided for the late Lady Blanche Balfour in her contract of marriage is chargeable with succession-duty? There are, I think, three separate grounds upon which a defender maintains that it is not so chargeable.

In the first place, it is contended that payment of the annuity was an obligation undertaken by the husband in the marriage-contract—an obligation by the husband in favour of the wife—in consequence of a deed of entail (as I understand it), which settled the estate upon him and the issue of the marriage. Now, I am clearly of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that that is not a good ground for holding the annuity free of charge; because the obligation undoubtedly was a personal obligation undertaken by the husband's father, and not by the husband himself, in the marriage-contract, and although there was security given for the payment of the annuity over the estate which the father then agreed to leave upon his son and the issue of the marriage that obligation never became binding upon the husband except in his character of heir of entail. It was not before an obligation undertaken by him in the marriage-contract in favour of his wife, and so the annuity cannot possibly be excepted from chargeability as being a succession by the wife to the husband.

Then it is contended upon two separate grounds that the annuity is not chargeable with succession-duty, because it is exempted under the provisions of the 17th section of the statute 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51. The provision of the Act applicable to the case is, that "no bond or contract made by any person in consideration of money or money's worth, for the payment of money or money's worth after the death of any other person, shall create a relation of predecessor and successor between the person making such bond or contract and the person to or with whom the same shall be made." It is contended that a valuable consideration was given for this annuity in money's worth, because Lady Blanche Balfour in the marriage-contract renounces her right of terce and jus relictæ. I am not prepared to say that a renunciation of rights may not under some circumstances be a consideration in money or money's worth for something that is given for such renunciation. If there was a presently existing right of terce and jus relictæ—a right of present value received in consideration of an annuity—that might be quite intelligibly maintained to be a consideration in money's worth. But Mr Maitland Balfour, the husband of Lady Blanche, at the time of their marriage was not possessed of any real estate, nor of any moveable estate, and therefore there really was no valuable right in the person of Lady Blanche Balfour which she could renounce at that time. It was something quite prospective and visionary, and therefore never came under the description of money's worth. In that respect also I am in agreement with the Lord Ordinary.

His Lordship has held that there was another consideration in this case—given for this annuity, which is a substantial consideration in money or money's worth, and that raises a question undoubtedly of considerable importance

No. 126. and of some novelty. The scheme of the marriage-contract was that the father of the husband, Mr Balfour of Whittinghame, undertook, in contemplation of the marriage then about to be solemnised between his son and Lady Blanche, to settle his estate—a very large landed estate—upon his son and the heirs of the marriage in entail. He also bound and obliged himself to make payment to Lady Blanche during all the days of her lifetime after the death of her husband of an annuity or jointure of £3000 a-year, and this, as I have mentioned already, was made a burden upon the entailed lands. These were the chief obligations undertaken by Mr Balfour, the father of the husband. On the other hand, the Marquis of Salisbury, the father of the bride, bound and obliged himself to grant a bond or other deed or deeds required by the laws of England, and in the English form, for payment of the sum of £10,000 sterling on the 15th day of May 1844, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after the celebration of the said marriage, to certain persons, as trustees for the lady and her children. Now, the question comes to be, whether this obligation to pay £10,000 and the proceeds for behoof of the lady and her children is a consideration in money or money's worth given for the obligation of Mr Balfour to provide and pay an annuity of £3000 to Lady Blanche? The nature of the settlement, expressed in popular language, may be this: The lady's fortune was settled upon herself and her children; it was not a fortune which belonged to her previously, but it was a marriage portion provided to her by her father in pursuance of some previous family settlement to which it is needless specially advert. And, on the other hand, the obligation of the husband's father was to pay an annuity to the bride in the event of her surviving her husband. It is a very important question undoubtedly, whether, when there is a provision of an annuity on the one side, and a provision of a sum of money on the other—it is to say, when each of the proposed fathers-in-law contribute in that way a capital sum of money and an annuity respectively—the one of these is what the meaning of the statute the consideration of the other? It seems to me that when one thing is under a contract the consideration of another, it necessarily follows that if the consideration fail the obligation of which it is the consideration fails also; and if that test be applied to the present case I am afraid the necessary conclusion is that the one is not the consideration of the other. Suppose that from any cause the Marquis of Salisbury had failed to pay the £10,000—suppose he had been unable to do so—a very wild supposition, without doubt, in the case of the Marquis of Salisbury, but it might have occurred with other people—if he had become bankrupt and the provision was not paid, would the annuity provided by Mr Balfour to his daughter-in-law have failed also? Most assuredly not. He would have been just as fully bound to provide and pay the annuity to his daughter-in-law as if the Marquis of Salisbury, on the other hand, had fulfilled his obligation to pay the £10,000. I do not think there can be any doubt about that. Then, is it possible, if that be the case, to hold that the one is the consideration of the other?

It was represented that the consideration of the obligation might be partly the counter obligation and partly the marriage, and that even in that case there was a consideration in money or money's worth, because although the marriage was one consideration, the money provision was the other, and there was an exemption from charge under the 17th section of the statute. Now, it does not appear to me that that is the true view of a contract of this kind at all. I think that every one of the marriage provisions which we find here has an propriate consideration under the contract, but one consideration only, and I think the consideration of each one of them is the marriage and nothing else. It appears to me that when the Marquis of Salisbury promises to pay £10,000 as the marriage portion of his daughter, he does that, not because of or in consideration of the provisions made on the other side, but because his daughter is going to be married, and for no other reason. And, on the other hand, when Mr Balfour makes his provision of an annuity for his intended daughter-in-law, he does that because she is to become his daughter-in-law, and for no other reason.

It may be that in conducting a marriage treaty a great deal may pass between the parties which in negotiation bears the appearance of giving money on one side, and consideration for money on the other. That is very true, and so, too, where parties differ about the amount of money to be given on the one side and on the other, there may be a failure of the treaty altogether. But suppose that one of the parties declines to give the money that is proposed—what is the result? Not that the other provision is withheld and that the marriage proceeds, but that the marriage does not take place. And here, again, we have a very clear indication of what lies at the bottom of the whole proceedings of the parties as the consideration upon which they are acting, and as the cause of everything that takes place. It is not because one man gives £10,000 on the one side that another man gives an annuity upon the other. The sole motive of the whole of the parties is the marriage which is about to be celebrated. And therefore I am of opinion that under this, as under most marriage-contracts, the sole consideration of each provision is the marriage; and if that be so, I am compelled to differ from the Lord Ordinary, because I hold it to be quite clear that the marriage is not within the meaning of the Act of Parliament a consideration in money or money's worth.

LORD DEAS.—By the contract of marriage of the Lady Blanche Cecil, afterwards Balfour, and James Maitland Balfour, in August 1843, the Marquis of Salisbury, father of the bride, bound himself, and his heirs, executors, and assignees, to grant a bond for payment, on the 15th May 1844, of £10,000 bearing interest from and after the celebration of the marriage), to trustees for purposes which I need not detail at length, but the result of which was, by relieving the intended husband and his father of their obligation to pay to Lady Blanche £500 per annum of pin-money, to give the husband the immediate benefit of the interest of the £10,000, and to provide the fee to the children, and, failing children, to carry that fee to the husband if he was the survivor, and a wife did not appoint otherwise. Lady Blanche, to the extent of any provision she might have claimed under her father and mother's marriage indenture, was a consenting party to the purposes of the trust thus created. Such is the money consideration on the one side. On the other hand, an annuity of £3000 a-year was, contingently, provided by James Balfour, the father of the intended husband, to the Lady Blanche, in the event of her surviving her husband,—which she did. The husband's father died in April 1845, and the husband himself died on the 23d of February 1856, when the lady's annuity of £3000 commenced to be payable, and the present claim for succession-duty, if it be well founded, became prestable. At the distance of twenty-one years payment that duty is now demanded.

The demand is founded upon section 2 of the statute 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51,

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

No. 126. upon the footing that section 17 is not applicable to money considerations, although mutual, if contained, as they are here, in an antenuptial marriage-contract. That was the substance of the argument upon which the Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick. in his reply rested the claim of the Crown, and it just comes to this, that whatever money provisions, or provisions of money's worth, may be provided upon the one side and the other, and whatever personal liability may be thereby created between the parties, these provisions do not come under section 17 of the statute if they are contained in an antenuptial contract of marriage, the marriage itself being, it is contended, to be regarded as the sole consideration for all such provisions.

No precedent to that effect was cited to us, and I am not aware that there is any such precedent. It is a question raised long after the passing of the statute but which does not appear to have been hitherto decided either in the one way or the other. The only case referred to in which anything really bearing on the point is to be found is the case of Floyer v. Bankes, decided by Lord Westbury, a very high authority, and in which he reversed the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. It was there decided, and I cannot doubt rightly decided, that the consideration of marriage is not money or money's worth in the sense of section 17 of the statute. But it does not follow that there may not be money or money's worth provided on one side and the other in a marriage-contract in such terms as to come within the operation of the section. In the present case we have substantial sums of money provided on the one side and the other. The £10,000 provided by the Marquis of Salisbury on behalf of his daughter Lady Blanche was immediately payable, and paid, and forthwith bearing fruits. The annuity provided to the lady by James Balfour and his son was large—£3000 a-year—but it was not absolutely provided, but only in the event of her surviving her husband. It might only therefore come into operation after a long period of years, or it might never come into operation at all. It has not been pleaded to us that there was any such inequality between these two provisions as to make an exceptional case, if section 17 of the statute can be applied to money provisions in a contract of marriage. The case has been pleaded as raising the important general question, that, be the pecuniary considerations upon each side what they may, they cannot fall under section 17 of the statute if contained in a marriage-contract.

That is the doctrine contended for and avowedly desired to be established by the Crown in this case, and properly so desired if the Crown can make it out. I have considered that doctrine very attentively, and I have not been able to persuade myself that it is sound. It is said that the marriage is to be held to be consideration for everything. But where is the authority for that proposition? It has not been so decided, and I do not even find any dicta to that effect. No doubt marriage is an onerous consideration. It is one of the considerations in this contract. Is it the sole consideration? I am not able to see that it is so. There are many marriages where there is no other consideration. It would be very sad if this were not so. But there are also many marriages where bargains or mutual purchases are made with reference to estates of importance and money of great amount. It is not a matter of course, in adjusting a contract of marriage, that either of the parties shall provide estates or sums of money; but if upon the occasion of the marriage they make a mutual bargain of that kind it is not the bargain as to money or money's worth that it is contained in a contract of marriage. Laying out of view all money provisions, the consideration of marriage is equally onerous on the part of each of the spouses. The one balances the other, No. 126. so far as that goes. The wife binds herself irrevocably to the husband, and the husband binds himself irrevocably to the wife. These mutual considerations are June 6, 1877. Lord Advocate v. Sidgwick.

equal to and satisfy each other. If to these there be superadded upon one side provision, say of £5000, in money, prestable on the death of one party, and a provision on the other side of £5000 in money's worth, prestable on the death of another party, shall there be held to be no bargain or purchase within the meaning of section 17 of the statute because the spouses have, in the same deed, contracted to become husband and wife? I find nothing to that effect in the words of the section. There is not a syllable in it to exclude the application of the enactment to marriage-contracts. The enactment is, on the contrary, general and absolute in its terms. Again, taxing enactments are not construed in favour of the Crown unless that is obviously their fair meaning. The rule is rather the other way. It is mere iteration to say that the sole consideration for all the mutual provisions is the marriage. That is the proposition to be proved.

It would be a waste of time to go into many of the cases which have been mentioned in the course of the argument, because they really come to nothing on this question. The case mainly requiring attention is the case of Floyer Bankes, to which I have alluded. The Master of the Rolls had there based his judgment on two grounds—1st, That the marriage itself was, in the sense of section 17 of the statute, a valuable consideration for the lady's annuity, requiring no money to be superadded to give it full force. Lord Westbury held that this ground of judgment was erroneous, and I think it plainly was so. 2d, That the lady's renunciation of dower, free bench, and the widow's right to one-third the personal estate of the husband on intestacy was money's worth. The answer to this was that, at the date of the contract, the rights renounced could be regarded as money's worth, because the husband had no estate out of which these rights could arise. The judgment was therefore reversed. But Lord Westbury indicated no opinion favourable to the contention of the Crown in his case—that whatever may be the mutual provisions in money or money's worth section 17 will not be applicable if these provisions are contained in a contract of marriage. The inference from all that he said is rather the other way. For, what had been his opinion, he had only to have said so, and it was unnecessary to have said more. That ground, if a good ground, would have been sufficient for judgment. In place of that, he is at pains to detail the grounds upon which he goes, not one of which implies a recognition of the doctrine in question.

He says—"The essential requisites of a contract which is not to create a succession are clearly defined by the 17th section. First, it must be a contract by which a person to pay money or money's worth to another; secondly, it must be one bona fide for valuable consideration existing in money or money's worth, and the contract creating personal liability between the contracting parties; and, thirdly, such a contract is prevented from creating a succession only as between the contracting parties, for all that the 17th section does is to declare that there shall be no relation of predecessor and successor between the person bound to pay and the person entitled to receive."—9 (English) Jurist, N. S., p. 1256.

He then goes on to say—"This reduces the matter to the inquiry, is there a contract by Henry Bankes and William John Bankes to pay these annuities to Miss Nugent on her becoming the widow of George? Were they, or was either of them, to be in any way liable for such payment? The answer must

No. 126. be that there is nothing of the kind ; This was because Henry Bankes and William Bankes had merely exercised a joint power of appointment which they had by indentures, dated in 1810 and 1821, entitling them to burden certain hereditaments with rent charges, which they did, in favour of Miss Nugent ; in case she should survive her husband George Bankes, but without themselves coming under or ever having been under any personal liability whatever for these rent charges or any part thereof.

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

The Lord Chancellor further says—" But if this could be held to be a contract to pay, which would be an abuse of language, a valuable consideration in money or money's worth would still be required ;" and as neither the marriage nor the renunciation of dower, &c., could be called such, and no other consideration on the lady's side was alleged, his Lordship came to the conclusion that section 17 of the statute did not apply to the case.

There is obviously, to say the least of it, nothing in all this to countenance the general doctrine that it is sufficient to exclude the applicability of section 17 that the provisions in money or money's worth are contained in a contract of marriage. If that doctrine is not to be set up by the judgment in the present case the case loses all its general importance. But while my opinion is against the soundness of that doctrine I do not say we can negative the pecuniary consideration of the Crown in the present case, unless the essential requisites pointed out by Lord Westbury are found to occur in it, viz., 1st, A contract by one person to pay money or money's worth to another ; 2d, a bona fide valuable consideration in money or money's worth, the contract creating personal liability between the contracting parties.

I am disposed, however, to think that both of these elements, which were wanting in the case of Floyer v. Bankes, are to be found in the present case.

1st, By the contract of marriage James Balfour and his son James Maitland Balfour bound and obliged themselves, and James Balfour bound and obliged the heirs under the entail, which he thereby undertook to execute, of the Whithorn estates, to make payment to Lady Blanche, if she survived her husband, of the annuity in question of £3000 a-year.

2d, On the other hand, the £10,000 provided by the Marquis, with the concurrence of Lady Blanche for her interest, for behoof of her husband and her and the issue of their marriage, in the terms already alluded to, was a bona fide valuable consideration in money or money's worth for the obligations undertaken by James Balfour and his son. The obligation of the Marquis is introduced by the words, " For which causes and on the other part "—the causes being the provisions made by James Balfour and his son along (I quite admit) with the marriage itself. The contract created, in the most express and absolute terms, a personal liability on the part of the Marquis to pay the £10,000 whatever might become of his wife's hereditaments and real estates, which were originally provided with £20,000 for provisions to their children by indenture made on the occasion of their marriage. The Marquis bound himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assignees to grant bond for the £10,000, payable at Whitsunday 1844, with interest from and after the celebration of the marriage. It is not stated in the case whether the bond was actually granted, but the principle applies that what should have been done is to be held as having been done. The stipulated interest was accordingly paid by the Marquis, and in 1860 he paid the capital itself to the trustees under the contract, whereupon the L

Blanche discharged all claim she might have had to a provision under the indenture just mentioned. No. 126.

In these circumstances it humbly appears to me that the conditions of section 17 of the statute must be held to have been satisfied, and I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

LORD MURE.—I concur in thinking this an important and difficult question ; but after giving it the best consideration in my power I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship in the chair, and substantially upon the same grounds. I shall therefore state my reasons very shortly.

It is not disputed that the duty here claimed is due under the 2d section of the Act, unless the succession is exempted in respect of the terms of the 17th section. Under that section it is provided that no bond or contract made by any person bona fide for valuable consideration in money or money's worth shall create the relation of predecessor and successor, so as to make the provisions of the 2d section applicable. Now, it seems to be settled in England, in the case of Floyer v. Bankes, that marriage itself is not a consideration in the sense of the statute, even where as here there is in the marriage-contract a renunciation of the dower or of all contingent legal rights on the part of the wife. That, no doubt, was not a judgment of the House of Lords, but it was a judgment of the Lord Chancellor of the day, altering a judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and therefore it is an interpretation of the statute which is entitled to great weight ; and I shall only say that I concur in the view which Lord Westbury there indicates, on the question whether marriage and a renunciation of the dower can, in the ordinary case, be held to be a consideration in the sense of this statute. I do not say that there may not be provisions so broad, and a contract of marriage entered into, as to fall under the provisions of the 17th section of the statute. But the question we have here to decide is, whether there is anything in this contract of marriage which can be said to be a consideration in money or money's worth in the sense of the Act?

Now, I can find nothing in the deed itself which says that the settlement of the annuity by Mr Balfour is to be dependent on the settlement of the £10,000 by Lord Salisbury. Looking at the contract in a general point of view it just comes to this, that the father of the gentleman undertakes to make a provision by way of annuity for his daughter-in-law on his son's death, and the father of the lady undertakes to settle a sum on her and the children of the marriage. The one does not appear to me to be given as an equivalent for the other, but because the son of the one party and the daughter of the other are about to enter into a contract of marriage. I therefore agree with your Lordship that it is in contemplation of the marriage that both these provisions were made, and I do not see anything in the terms of the marriage-contract to enable me to say that the one is a consideration in money or money's worth for the other. I think the language of the deed is not unimportant. It says that the said James Balfour, in contemplation of the marriage of his son, settles so and so. Now, it is not to be thrown out of view that in the ordinary case of marriage-contracts, where the one provision is intended to be a consideration for the other, there is generally to be found in addition to the words "in contemplation of the marriage," the words "and in consideration of the provisions made in her favour aftermentioned." These words are omitted here, and it is simply stated that the annuity is granted in contemplation of the marriage, without any reference

No. 126. to what may be done by the lady's father in the subsequent part of the deed. And when we come to the subsequent clauses we find that they simply provide certain things in contemplation of the marriage; but I do not see any words which lead me to suppose that the consideration which Mr Balfour had in view when he made that provision was the £10,000 which Lord Salisbury settled upon the children.

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

LORD SHAND.—The claim of the Crown in this case is resisted on two grounds—in the first place, on the ground that the lady who got the benefit of the annuity gave valuable consideration for it, in respect she renounced her right of terce and jus relicte; and, in the second place, on the ground that in return for the annuity she gave a present payment to trustees of £10,000. In regard to the first of these points I think the case is substantially in the same position as that of Floyer v. Bankes, to which reference has already been made, and in which Lord Westbury in delivering judgment said—"The Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that the implied agreement by Mrs Georgina Bankes to release her dower or free blench would be a consideration in money's worth within the meaning of the 17th section. This perhaps might be so if it were shewn, which it is not, that George Bankes was at the time of the contract possessed of or entitled to any estate out of which his wife might become dowerable, but a bare possibility of future dower or free blench in non-existing estate would not have been a subject of value at the time of the agreement, and the release of such a possibility would not, in my judgment, answer and satisfy the words 'valuable consideration in money or money's worth.'" It will be observed that there is no opinion here expressed that the renunciation of such a right even if the lady would by the marriage have acquired a right in existing estate would be a consideration in money or money's worth sufficient to bring the case under section 17 of the statute. The statement is carefully guarded: it is "perhaps" it might be so; and I am not disposed in this case to put it higher. Here, so far as the right of terce is concerned, it appears to have been of no value, because by the very contract with which we are dealing we find that the husband's father stipulated that he should only be bound to entail the estate subject to the condition that there should be no right of terce attached to the estate, and as to the jus relicte it was entirely problematical whether that right should be of any value whatever. So that the case, so far as the jus relicte is concerned, is precisely the same as that of Floyer. But I am not prepared to say that the possession of either of these rights, even if there were existing estate, would be sufficient to operate an exemption of succession-duty under section 17 of the statute, for I think that in that state of the facts a somewhat similar question to that which we have now to determine in dealing with the second point would arise—viz., the question whether that renunciation is really a giving of money or money's worth for the provision which is secured, or whether it is not given really in consideration of the marriage, the marriage being the true consideration in respect of which the right would be renounced. I am far from saying that I think a renunciation of rights of terce or jus relicte even where the husband is possessed of estate, would be sufficient. But the case being in the same position as that of Floyer, I am of opinion that here the renunciation cannot be regarded as a valuable consideration, in respect that there were no existing rights.

The next point that arises is, whether the sum of £10,000 provided under and by the lady's father can be regarded as a valuable consideration in money No. 126.

 money's worth, given for the annuity of £3000? And here a question might arise whether this sum was really given by the lady at all. If it was not given June 6, 1877.
 the lady, but was given by her father, the only result under the statute would Lord Advocate this, that as the lady's father in that view purchased the annuity by paying v. Sidgwick.
 £10,000, there would be no relation of predecessor and successor in reference to the annuity as between Mr Maitland Balfour and his daughter-in-law, that relation would still subsist as between Lord Salisbury and his daughter, Lord Salisbury in that view became the purchaser of this annuity by paying £10,000. It is plain from the concluding words of section 17 that while relation of predecessor and successor would not arise directly between the son granting the annuity and the person in whose favour it was made, yet as statute provides that "any disposition or devolution of the money payable under such bond or contract, if otherwise such as to create a succession within provisions of this Act, shall be deemed to confer a succession," it follows that there would be a succession as regards the annuity purchased between Lord Salisbury, the purchaser, and his daughter. I am not satisfied by the documents in this case that the money was advanced by the lady. It appears that under father's marriage-contract there were provisions to the effect that if there was child there should be a payment of £10,000, if two or more children 5,000, and if three or more £20,000, with a power of division in favour of parents or the survivor. So that if there were no division of this fund in case of the power, there having been five children of the marriage, this lady's share would have been £4000 only. The case does not state that there was any deed of division of the £20,000 in which the five children were each entitled to share. On the contrary, as I read it, the case is not only consistent with the view, but appears to me to bring out the view, that the father out of his own means very considerably supplemented what the lady was entitled to.
 In part of the marriage-contract does this money appear to have been put into possession as her own, and thereafter put by her into the common fund.
 The father undertakes a personal obligation to pay £10,000 on the marriage, as far as I can see, at all events to a very great extent, the fund provided was his own. Therefore I should have difficulty here in holding that this is a consideration in money or money's worth provided by the lady. It appears to me to be a consideration given by the father; and if that be so the only result in a question with the Crown would be, that if it could be regarded as a transaction of purchase of the £3000 annuity, that annuity having been so purchased would still be subject to succession-duty as being provided by Lord Salisbury, who had purchased it.

But I do not think it necessary to decide the case on that ground, for I am of opinion with the majority of your Lordships that this £10,000—even supposing it to have been paid by the lady—is not a consideration that comes within the provision of section 17 of the statute. Upon that matter I again concur with what Lord Westbury says in the case of Floyer as to the general effect of the Succession-Duty Act with which we are dealing. His Lordship says—"In framing the Act the word 'succession' was adopted for the purpose of denoting any property passing upon death from one person to another by virtue of any gift or descent, or of any contract, not being a bona fide contract, purchase or loan. Money or property, the right to receive or possess which arises upon death, under a contract made bona fide in return for other

No. 126. money or property, was not, as between the contracting parties, to be treated as a succession. But it was not intended to exempt property arising upon death under contracts for valuable consideration generally. Marriage is by the law of England a valuable consideration for a contract, and that of the highest kind; but property arising under a contract in consideration of marriage is not excepted even in favour of persons coming directly within that consideration. A contract to be excepted must be bona fide made in consideration of money or money's worth, words which appear to have been selected for the purpose of excluding the consideration of marriage." Now, taking that to be, as I have no doubt is, a correct view of the effect of the statute, the question is,—the marriage being a valuable consideration within the meaning of the statute, can the £10,000 be represented to be so?

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

Now, in the first place, at the best, and even on the argument maintained on behalf of the respondents, this payment of £10,000 is not represented as the sole consideration in respect of which the annuity was given. It is not admitted that the marriage was a very material part of the consideration. If it were disputed I think the argument would be a very hopeless one, for it is quite plain that the transaction was not a purchase of this annuity of £3000, and of the obligation of Mr Balfour to settle his estates, which were obviously of enormous value. It cannot be represented that the obligation for payment of £10,000 was a consideration at all equal in value to what Mr Balfour gave on the other side. The obligation was obviously given, in the view most favourable for the respondents, partly in consideration of money or money's worth and partly in consideration of the marriage; and if that be so, I am not prepared to say that section 17 of the statute applies. On the contrary, my opinion rather is that the section does not apply, for, I think, the general meaning and effect of the statute is, that money or estate, whether left by settlement mortis causa or provided by marriage-contract, if it be money settled upon parties to accrue to them after the death of the settlor, or some other person in life at the date of the deed, shall not be liable in duty, and that the exception is, where the right is a purchased right, such as a contract of insurance, in which a person pays full value for the obligation undertaken by the insurance company, or a bond of annuity in which full price is paid for the annuity. In short, it is, in my opinion, a bona fide purchase that is made the subject of exception. I am not prepared to hold that if it could be shewn that a certain consideration was given in money, and that the leading consideration, however, being the marriage, this section of the statute applies. My opinion, on the contrary, is, that the section only covers the case of a proper purchase of the right; and so I should not be prepared to hold that on the argument submitted to us on the concession (which cannot be withdrawn) that the marriage was at least partly the consideration here, that section applies.

But I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and generally on the grounds which have been already stated, in thinking further that it is not a sound view of the effect of this marriage-contract to hold that the annuity of £3000 given in consideration of the obligation by Lord Salisbury, or of the agreement by his daughter, to pay £10,000. No doubt the parties had met, and the preliminaries of the marriage had been arranged. In arranging those preliminaries the parties interested required to see where the funds on each side were to come from, and in order to bring about the marriage relatives on each side of the family agreed to put so much money into the common fund. But when they came on the marriage-contract and to grant the obligations contained in it, the money No. 126.

 obligations were truly granted, not by the one giving so much money because and in consideration of the other giving so much money, but in contemplation June 6, 1877.
 the marriage, and because of the marriage, and to provide a fund for the Lord Advocate married persons. The marriage is the true consideration in the minds of the v. Sidgwick.

tries; and it is clear on the statute that marriage is not a consideration to be taken into view. It would be remarkable if it were otherwise, for parties might then readily evade succession-duty on a great part of their succession. I suppose that almost as much money is dealt with and settled by marriage-contracts as by deeds of settlement, and at least an enormous amount of property is so dealt with.
 It is clear that it was not intended to exempt marriage-contract provisions from succession-duty. I think your Lordship applied a sound test on this point as to whether the marriage is not truly the consideration, by the question, Would it be an answer to one of the parties to this settlement when called on to fulfil the stipulations to pay so much money, that he should say he was not bound to pay it because the parent on the other side had been unable to fulfil his obligation or had not done so? If the one be a consideration of the other, he would necessarily be entitled to say that because no money was given on the other side he was not bound to fulfil his obligation. But the answer is, it is not in consideration of this other fund being given that you have granted your obligation undertaken to make a provision—the true consideration is the marriage itself that has taken place, and you are bound to pay the money.

It has been represented that the argument on behalf of the Crown here is, that because you find this stipulation in a marriage-contract the clause does not apply. I can only say that I do not understand that to be the contention of the Crown, and it is certainly not that contention that I adopt. It is not because the provision is in a marriage-contract that the clause of exemption does not apply, but because being in a marriage-contract, as we find the clauses there, the obligation to settle so much money on the one side is not the true counterpart of obligation on the other. The marriage is the counterpart of the obligation on both sides. The marriage is the moving cause and consideration. One might quite well suppose a case of an obligation occurring in a marriage-contract, where a wife purchased an annuity at so much money from a third person by a similar transaction of purchase and sale, and in the same deed—the marriage-contract—the parties concluded the transaction. Although the obligations were contained in the marriage-contract the clause of exemption would apply if the obligations were truly a proper transaction of purchase for money or money's worth, in which this is not.

I may notice, before concluding, the inconveniences to which the argument on the respondents would necessarily lead if it were sustained. It is said that obligations upon one side are to be regarded as a counterpart of the other, and therefore you have money's worth given for this annuity. Suppose a marriage takes place in which one of the parties has very little means indeed, and the other a large fortune,—it may be that all the husband offers is an insurance on his life as against £30,000 or £40,000 advanced and settled on the other side.
 The argument maintained here would be sound, then if the husband is able to advance £1000 only, or merely to effect an insurance on his life, it might just as well be said this is a valuable consideration given for the settlement of the larger of £30,000 or £40,000; and the settlement of that sum having thus been purchased, the amount shall be free from succession-duty. It would surely be

No. 126. very difficult to maintain that £2000 or £3000 was a valuable consideration for three times the amount. And so a Court might be put in every case to balance the considerations in each contract, and to say, is it or is it not the counterpart of the other—is it a valuable consideration in money or money's worth?

June 6, 1877.
Lord Advocate
v. Sidgwick.

Again, it is said, if you find obligations on one side and another, they are to be regarded as counterparts of each other. The father or the relative of the lady gives certain sums of money, the father or relative of the husband gives other sums of money, and these are to be regarded as purchased not from the contracting spouses themselves, but from relatives intervening. Observe what is the effect of that view if sustained under the statute: It is not to exempt these sums from duty, because if the purchase is made by a relative it is plain the result is to make what he purchases his estate, and that estate, so made his, still becomes the subject of succession-duty. An illustration of that occurs in the case re Jenkinson, 1856, 24 Beavan's Reps. 64; and it is plain that it is so from the statute. That view of the statute therefore leads to this anomalous, and, to my mind, extravagant result, that if you have counter provisions of that kind in a marriage-contract, the succession-duty is payable, not with reference to the degree of relationship of the person who settles the money, but with reference to the relationship of the other party, the person who has purchased the settlement and who has thus settled the money. That might make a very serious difference to the parties, depending on the degrees of relationship of the relations who have intervened. I cannot read the statute as introducing anything so roundabout the way of regulating the rules of succession, and providing what I should regard as a very remarkable element,—an element of chance in fixing the rate to be paid, because it varies according to the degree of relationship between the purchaser of the right and the person benefited. I think it is much more reasonable to hold the money or estate provided in a marriage-contract as money or estate settled by the person who gives it, not money or estate purchased. I think there is nothing in the statute to lead to a different result. On these grounds—and I cannot say I entertain any very serious difficulty about it—am of opinion that this annuity is liable to succession-duty.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find and declare that the annuity of £3000 per annum provided to the late Lady Blanche Balfour as in the special case stated is chargeable with succession-duty, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in accordance with the above finding," &c.

THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 127. ANDREW HEITON, Pursuer.—Lord-Adv. Watson—Guthrie Smith—Andrew
WAVERLEY HYDROPATHIC COMPANY (Limited), Defenders.—Frasers—
Balfour—Strachan.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

Sale—Contract—Revised Draft.—In an action concluding for declaration certain fields had been sold to the pursuer it was proved that after a long correspondence the parties were agreed on the subject sold, and the price, and the only question unsettled was what servitudes should be imposed on the subject to secure the amenity of the sellers' adjoining property, and that a conveyance prepared by the buyer's agent had been sent to the sellers' agent and returned revised, with a letter stipulating that the sellers should have an opportunity of going over and considering the draft, "in case we have over-conditions which should be inserted in it." Held that there was no concluded contract of sale. No. 127.

Joint Stock Company—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 50 and 51, 25 and 26 June 6, 1877.
Art. c. 89—Powers of Directors to bind the Company.—Opinions (per Lord Pre-Heiton v. Waverley sident and Lord Shand) that persons dealing with the directors of joint stock Hydropathic companies, although they must be held to have made themselves acquainted Company. with the provisions of the statutes and articles of association under which the companies are incorporated are entitled to assume that all notices of meetings and notices of resolutions to be proposed at such meetings have been properly given, and that shareholders cannot repudiate the actings of directors on the ground that no notice of a resolution conferring power on the directors had been given.

THIS was an action at the instance of Andrew Heiton, Esq. of Darnick 1st DIVISION.
 Melrose, against the Waverley Hydropathic Company (Limited), Heiton v.
 Melrose, concluding for declarator that the defenders had sold a field and Ld. Craighill.
 orchard adjoining their establishment to the pursuer, and for decree M. at the defenders should execute and deliver a conveyance of these lands to the pursuer, with entry at the date thereof. There was also an alternative conclusion for damages.

On 17th March 1874 the secretary of the Waverley Hydropathic Company (Limited), which was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862* and 1867, sent circulars to the shareholders, calling an extraordinary general meeting of the company to be held on 25th March. The notice stated that the meeting was called for the purpose of altering, amending, and revising the articles of association, and for certain other business. No mention was made of any proposal to sell any property of the company.

" 50. Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the conditions contained in the memorandum of association, any company formed under this Act may, at any general meeting, from time to time, by passing a special resolution in manner hereinafter mentioned, alter all or any of the regulations of the company contained in the articles of association or in the table marked A in the first schedule, where such table is applicable to the company, or make new regulations to the exclusion of or in addition to all or any of the regulations of the company; and any regulations so made by special resolution shall be deemed to be regulations of the company of the same validity as if they had been originally contained in the articles of association, and shall be subject in like manner to alteration or modified by any subsequent special resolution.

" 51. A resolution passed by a company under this Act shall be deemed to be a special resolution whenever a resolution has been passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths of such members of the company for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote as may be present, in person or by proxy (in cases where by the regulations of the company proxies are allowed), at any general meeting of which notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution has been duly given, and such resolution has been confirmed by a majority of such members for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote as may be present, in person or by proxy, at any subsequent general meeting of which notice has been duly given, and held at an interval of not less than fourteen days, nor more than one month from the date of the meeting at which such resolution was first passed: At any meeting mentioned in this section, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, a declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same: Notice of any meeting shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be duly given, and the meeting to be duly held, whenever such notice is given and meeting held in accordance with the regulations of the company."

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

At this meeting on 25th March a letter from Mr Heiton of Darnie Tower with reference to the purchase of the field and orchard was read when the meeting, as the minute bore, "remitted the whole matter to the directors, with power to sell or not the ground, and if a sale be resolved on by them the meeting unanimously empowered the directors to sell the ground at such a price and on such terms and conditions as the directors shall deem advisable."

The meeting also passed the following articles of association:—"Proceedings at general meetings.—36. Five days' notice at the least, specifying the place, the day, and the hour of meeting, and in case of special business, the general nature of such business, shall be given to the members in manner hereinafter mentioned, or in such other manner, if any, may be prescribed by the company in general meeting; but the non-receipt of such notice by any member shall not invalidate the proceedings at any general meeting." "40. All business shall be deemed special that is transacted at an extraordinary meeting, and all that is transacted at an ordinary meeting, with the exception of sanctioning a dividend, and the consideration of the accounts, balance-sheets, and the ordinary reports of the directors." "67. . . . With the consent of the shareholders at a general meeting they (the directors) may also sell, dispose, and convey the heritable property of the company, or any part thereof."

These articles were confirmed at an extraordinary general meeting, held on 9th April 1874.

The original articles of association gave the directors no power to sell the heritable property.

A meeting of the directors was held on 25th May 1874. The minute bore—"The sale of the fields to Mr Heiton was brought under consideration, and after explanations received from Mr Ferguson on the subject and his interview with Mr Heiton, the meeting agreed to sell the fields and instructed the law-agents to enter upon negotiations with the view to protecting the company's interests, and appointed the finance committee to meet and advise with the law-agents in carrying through the sale. The meeting were of opinion that there should be no higher price than £1650 asked from Mr Heiton."

On the following day, 26th May, Messrs Watt and Anderson, S.S., the agents of the company, wrote Mr Heiton, who referred them to the law-agents, Messrs Freer and Dunn. A long correspondence between the agents followed, at an early stage of which the price to be paid for the fields was fixed at £1650, but the question remained what services were to be imposed with a view of protecting the amenity of the establishment. A draft-disposition, in which the date of entry was the date of signing, was prepared by Messrs Freer and Dunn, and sent on 27th March 1875 to Messrs Watt and Anderson, who on 5th June returned and stipulated that they should have an opportunity of going over the draft, "in case we may have overlooked conditions which should be inserted in it." On 15th June 1875 Messrs Watt and Anderson wrote that the negotiations for the sale of the fields were suspended, and called upon Mr Heiton to remove certain sheep and trees, which they alleged had been placed in one of the fields without any authority from the company. The pursuer in reply stated that he had got possession with the knowledge and consent of the company. The correspondence and proceedings of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Deas.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the company, held on 6th June 1875, the shareholders passed a resolution instructing the directors to cease from all further negotiations with Mr Heiton.

Mr Heiton thereupon raised the present action against the company.

The pursuer averred that he gave power to two of the directors of the company, Mr Ferguson and Mr Maughan, to offer £1650 at a meeting of directors to be held on 25th May 1874, on condition that it should at once be accepted. "The offer of £1650 was accordingly made at the meeting of the defenders, and was then and there accepted by them, or on their behalf, and the offer and acceptance were duly minuted by the directors, it being understood and agreed to that the servitudes to be stipulated for over the fields should form matter for subsequent arrangement." (Cond. 4) That on 6th July 1874 the pursuer's agents sent a formal written offer of £1650. (Cond. 6) That a correspondence followed between the agents; that after a letter of Messrs Watt and Anderson, the company's agents, to the pursuer's agents, of 6th March 1875, in all material respects parties were agreed as to the provisions affecting the proposed servitudes. (Cond. 7) That at a meeting of directors on 2d March 1875 a draft disposition containing conditions as to the servitudes as approved of, and a resolution to sell, subject to these conditions, was agreed to. The finance and works committee were appointed to carry through the transaction, and the draft returned to the company's agents to have the transaction completed. (Cond. 8) "The transaction being thus arranged, the directors, or some of them, after some negotiations, induced the pursuer to agree to let the orchard to the company for a year at the rent of £7. On 31st March 1875 Mr Macpherson, the house steward at the said establishment, on behalf of the company, wrote the pursuer agreeing to take the orchard on the above terms. Mr Macpherson, in his letter, stated that he expected the orchard would be properly needed to keep out sheep. The pursuer thereupon, as was well known to the company and the directors and those acting on their behalf, caused a proper fence to be put up for that purpose at the orchard, and thereby incurred considerable expense." (Cond. 9) "At or about the same time, and with the knowledge of the company or the directors, or others acting for them, the pursuer let the fields to two tenants, Messrs Robert Lockie and Thomas Wight, at the rents of £18 and £5 respectively, for the year The fields are seen from the windows of the establishment, and the tenants' sheep were daily seen in the fields by the officials of the company."

The defenders denied that the directors gave any authority to Mr Macpherson to take the orchard from the pursuer, or that they had any knowledge that this had been done. They also denied that the tenants' sheep were seen by the officials of the company.

The pursuer further averred—(Cond. 10) In April 1875 he was assured the agents of the company that the servitudes had been arranged, and at the deed of conveyance was "waiting to be extended;" that he therefore, "with the knowledge and approval of the company, or the directors, or others acting for them," proceeded to plant trees, and to fence the fields and carry out other improvements. The defenders denied that the agents had given any such assurance, or that the planting, &c., was done without their knowledge or approval.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. In respect that there was a concluded and valid agreement for the sale and purchase of the lands in question, as between the pursuer and the defenders, they are bound to grant a conveyance in his favour in terms thereof. 2. Separatim, the contract of sale alleged is validated rei interventu. 3. The defenders having agreed to sell the said lands at the price offered by the pursuer, on the footing that the terms of servitudes should be afterwards arranged, and there being no dispute between parties regarding these terms, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

The defenders pleaded ;—1. There being no contract or agreement of sale of the subjects in question specified in the summons, the conclusions of the action cannot be maintained. 2. The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. 3. The resolution with reference to the fields in question, adopted at the meeting of the company on 25th March 1874, having been passed in violation of the provision of the statute and the articles of the association, anything done under the remit contained therein was ultra vires of the directors, and committee of directors, and is not binding on the company. 4. No concluded contract or agreement of sale having been entered into between the pursuer and defenders at the date libelled, or any other time, the action is groundless, and cannot be maintained. 5. The pursuer is not entitled to found to any extent or effect on any alleged possession of the said fields on his part, in respect (1) that there was no concluded contract or agreement between the parties, and (2) that such possession was taken by him at his own hand, and without the knowledge or sanction of the defenders.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof before answer.

The defenders reclaimed, and the Court granted a diligence for recovery of the documents on which the pursuer founded, and having heard counsel they recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof before answer, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the pursuer a proof before answer of the averments contained in articles 8, 10, 12, and 14 of the condescendence containing the pursuer's averments with regard to his possession of the ground, and to the defenders a conjunct probation.

The result of the proof appears from the opinion of Lord Mure.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor :—" In the first place, finds that the pursuer's statements on the record are insufficient as the averments of a concluded contract between the pursuer and the defenders for the sale to the pursuer of the lands described in the summons : In the second place, finds that the writs referred to on the record, in conjunction with those of which copies are in the print, No. 80 of process, assuming the latter to be authentic and the other writs which have been recovered since that print was prepared, do not prove a concluded contract for the sale to the pursuer of these lands, but on the contrary, shew that the negotiations for a sale which had been opened and so far carried forward, were stopped before a contract was concluded : In the third place, finds (1) that the pursuer did not get possession of said lands from the defenders ; (2) that the defenders neither expressly nor by implication consented to his taking possession ; (3) that the pursuer took possession not as under a completed contract, but, on the contrary, only upon the expectation that the negotiations then in progress would result in a contract which as already found was an expectation not realised : Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders, &c.*

* "NOTE.—The proof which was allowed by the Court by the interlocutor of 18th July last related only to rei interventus, and as it was before answer and the pleas on the record have till now been left untouched. The Lord Ordinary consequently felt a disinclination to deal with the constitution of the alleged contract as evidenced by writs which were founded on, although technically not proved. But his hesitation yielded to the desire expressed by both parties that the value of the writs referred to should be judged of on the assumption of their authenticity.

"1. The first question naturally is the relevancy of the pursuer's averments to set up, independently of rei interventus, a concluded contract. The Lord Ordinary

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) the documents proved a completed contract of sale ; the subject and the price were fixed ; the pursuer as willing to take the subject with the servitudes and restrictions imposed by the defenders ; the defenders were not entitled to rescind after having sent to the pursuer's agents a draft for his approval. (2) In all events, an informal agreement had been concluded which was validated by rei interventus.¹ (3) With reference to defenders' third plea

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.

Heiton v.

Waverley

Hydropathic
Company.

ry thinks that these, read in the light of the relative documents, are insufficient. In the first place, it is not said that the minute of directors of 2d March 1875, which in the end came to be relied on, was intimated to the pursuer ; and, in the second place, it is plain from the statements in article 7 of the condescendence, in which that minute is libelled, taken in connection with those in the immediately preceding article, that there were things, and material things too, on which, at the date of that minute, parties were not agreed.

"2. The next thing is the question whether there is a concluded contract. At there were negotiations, and that in some things there was an agreement, undoubted, but it is at least as clear that upon other things, neither at 2d March 1875, nor at any time afterwards, was there an agreement. What are called 'servitudes' remained matters of controversy. The ground in question had been bought by the defenders for the amenity of their establishment, and if they were to sell, it was of vital importance that conditions by which that amenity would be secured should be made articles of the contract. These, in fact, were more important than a little more or a little less in the way of price. Consequently, they were always in the front, and the very first letter which was written by the agents of the defenders to the agents of the pursuer, after receiving instructions consequent upon the proceedings of 2d March 1875, recapitulated the conditions upon which the defenders were to insist. That the matter was then open both the agents of the pursuer and the pursuer shew in their subsequent letters, and before there had been an agreement, the shareholders interfered, and put an end to the negotiation. These things, the Lord Ordinary thinks, are demonstrated by the documents, and hence the relative finding in his allocutor.

"3. The pursuer founds on his alleged possession for two purposes. The first of these is to make out that even if at the middle of March 1875, when, as he says, he began to act as proprietor of the ground, some of the conditions as to servitudes had not been arranged, these are to be held as swept away by the fact that he got possession. Whether the relaxation for which he asked, or whether the restrictions on which the defenders insisted, are the things to be thus got rid of was not explained to the Lord Ordinary ; but this omission is immaterial, because both parties so conducted themselves in their subsequent communications and correspondence as to shew that the pursuer had not taken, and certainly had not been given, possession on the assumption that thereby everything hitherto undecided was determined. This is one of the things which distinguishes the present case from Colquhoun v. Wilson's Trustees, March 20, 1860, 22 D. 1035 (Scot. Jur. 468). The Lord Ordinary may add that there is another distinction afforded by the warnings, repeatedly given by the agents of the defenders, till there was an official intimation that the contract had been concluded, to use the words which occur in a subsequent letter, till there was a written intimation of the terms offered by the defenders, 'there cannot be a concluded

As regards the exclusion of locus penitentie, which is the purpose for which efficacy of rei interventus is usually invoked, the Lord Ordinary thinks that this so-called possession is unavailing in the circumstances of this case. The effect of form or authentication in the writings might be made up by rei interventus, but the want of consent necessary to the completion of a contract could be thus supplied."

Colquhoun v. Wilson's Trustees, March 20, 1860, 22 D. 1035, 32 Scot. Jur. 468.

No. 127. in law, although there might be some informality in the notice calling the meeting of 25th March 1874, that was not a matter into which third parties dealing with the directors were bound to inquire; third parties were entitled to deal with directors of a company on the understanding that they were authorised to act for the shareholders, and all actings of the directors within the powers contained in the articles of association were binding on the company.¹

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) There was no completed contract of sale as the parties had never come to an agreement as to the servitudes which were to be imposed. (2) Possession was taken by the pursuer at his own hand, without the authority of the directors, and did not amount to interventus. (3) Before the meeting of 25th March 1874 the directors had no power under the articles of association to sell the heritage belonging to the association. The articles of association were amended at that meeting and power to sell heritage was conferred on the directors, but the power was only conferred under certain conditions. These were that the consent of the shareholders should be obtained, and that five days' notice of intention to propose such a sale should be given in the circular calling the meeting. No such notice was ever given before the meeting on 25th March 1874. The directors were merely the agents of the shareholders and could not bind them, except in so far as they were authorised by the articles of association.²

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—This is an action at the instance of Mr Heiton to have it found and declared that the Waverley Hydropathic Company, who have an establishment near Melrose, have sold to him certain fields adjoining that establishment and adjoining his estate. The negotiation took place with the directors of the company and the finance committee acting under their authority. I do not put in question the power of the directors nor the power of the finance committee to sell that property. The real question, I think, is whether there was or was not a concluded bargain? Now, it is matter of trite law that a bargain for the sale of heritable property in Scotland must be in writing. The writings of the directors or the writings of the finance committee are, in this case, quite sufficient in law if the import of them is clear. I do not think, however, that it is contended on the part of Mr Heiton that on the face of the writings there was a concluded sale. It is quite clear that there were points, and those of importance, in dispute to the end. These fields were of the greatest possible importance to the company for the amenity of their establishment, and it is not wonderful therefore that, from the first, there was a difference of opinion among the directors as to whether a considerable money price was a sufficient temptation to sell.

¹ Royal British Bank v. Turquand, June 2, 1855, 24 L. J., Q. B., 327; A. v. the Official Manager of the Athenæum Life Assurance Society, Jan. 26, 1853, 3 Scott's C. B. Reports, N. S., 725, 27 L. J., C. P. 95; Prince of Wales Assurance Society v. The Athenæum Life Assurance Society, 3 Scott's C. B. Reports, N. S., 756; in re The Athenæum Life Assurance Society, ex parte The Eagle Insurance Company, 9th July 1858, 4 Kay and Johnson's Reports, 549, 27 L. J., 829.

² Ernest v. Nicholls, Aug. 15, 1857, 6 Clark's House of Lords Cases, 44; Burns v. Pennell, June 16, 1849, 2 Clark's House of Lords Cases, 497; Id. v. Tamar, &c. Railway Company, June 8, 1867, L. R. 2 Exch. 158.

was of importance to them to have their reserved rights over the fields fixed, and it was likewise of importance that those reservations should go into the titles in such a way as to be binding in all time coming. This company might wish to give up the establishment to another similar company, or they might wish to sell it to a different kind of company—a lunatic asylum or an infirmary, or instance. There are various other kinds of establishments in selling to whom would make the greatest possible difference whether they could transfer, in a binding form, to the purchasers, the reservations in regard to the amenity of those fields. Now, it is quite clear upon the face of the correspondence that upon these reservations, in particular, the parties never came to be at one. On the contrary, they came to be quite opposed to each other upon the vital matter of some of these reserved rights, and as to whether they were to fly off or not in the event of a resale by Mr Heiton—reservations which were rightly regarded as of greater importance to the company even than the amount of the price. That was the state of matters when the agents came to think it might expedite matters to be preparing in the meantime the drafts of the deeds. I take it to be perfectly clear law that when parties come to this Court disputing whether there is or is not a concluded bargain, what we have to look at is not the drafts of the proposed deeds, but the documents themselves which formed the bargain. We must look to these, and according as we find these to stand we must direct the drafts of the deeds to be adjusted. That is the ordinary way. If that rule is most clearly applicable here, because we see, upon the face of the correspondence, that when it was proposed to have drafts of the deeds prepared it was not upon the footing that there was a concluded bargain, but simply at it might save time to be, tentatively, preparing drafts of the deeds in the meantime. And when those drafts were not finally adjusted, and were not proved of by the directors, as it was expressly stipulated in this correspondence that they should be before they were to be binding, I take it to be perfectly clear that what we have to do with is the question how the bargain stood on the face of the correspondence at the time when this tentative adjustment of the drafts was proposed and agreed to. If there was, at that time, a concluded bargain, we should order the deeds to be framed in conformity with that bargain; if there was then no concluded bargain, we are to find that there was none. As I have already said, Mr Heiton does not contend, and cannot contend, that upon the face of the documents when those drafts were proposed and prepared there was a concluded bargain. He cannot found upon those drafts as a concluded bargain, for the parties never came to one about them. They never were submitted to the directors of the company, and the only answer Mr Heiton makes to that is—"That is all very true, but I am in possession of the ground, and I must therefore be held to have conceded the disputed points in favour of the company." Now, to found that plea it is very clear to think, that he must have got possession from the parties entitled to give him possession, namely, the directors or the finance committee; but I do not think that he either got possession from the parties entitled to give him possession, or that those parties ever sanctioned that possession in a way to support that plea. What an individual director might do goes for nothing. The directors were by this time all at sixes and sevens on the subject. There were things not altogether adjusted in a bargain even of heritable property, in regard to which there may be an implication from the possession being in and taken that these had been conceded, but it would, to say the least of

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.

Heiton v.

Waverley

Hydropathic
Company.

No. 127.
June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

it, be a very serious question whether that could apply to things of such vital importance as were in dispute here. I only say that would be a question of difficulty, for the conclusive answer here is that possession was not given by those representing the company who alone could give possession, and therefore the question does not arise. With those views of the case, it is really not necessary to go into any great detail, but I may just glance over the documents in order to shew clearly that that is the result.

It is sufficient to begin with the letter of 6th July 1874, from Mr Heiton agents to the agents for the company, in which they say—"As we understand that the directors of the Waverley Hydropathic have agreed to sell to Mr Heiton the field he wishes at £1650, and have minuted a resolution to that effect on his behalf, we now beg to offer that sum, the conditions to be afterwards arranged, and we shall be glad to have your acceptance of this offer in connection along with a draft of the conditions which it is proposed by the directors to attach to the purchase." Now, it is perfectly plain that the offer of £1650 upon conditions to be afterwards arranged was not a binding offer at all, and that a mere agreement as to the price could not form a concluded sale. The conditions are everything in a bargain of this kind. The answer accordingly was (7th July 1874)—"The money consideration is not so important to our clients as the servitudes to be imposed over the field to prevent its being used to the prejudice of the Waverley Hydropathic Institution and grounds, and it has been suggested to us by one of the directors forming the committee having power to negotiate on this subject that a meeting should be held with the committee and Mr Heiton, whereat the various conditions, burdens, and servitudes may be considered and disposed of." Then we have another letter from the purchaser's agents, in which they say (8th July 1874)—"We have yours of yesterday, and understand from it that our offer of £1650 on behalf of Mr Heiton is accepted on conditions to be afterwards arranged." There is plainly no bargain there. Then the company's agents write to the purchaser's agents (22d July 1874)—"The price may be regulated by Mr Heiton's acquiescence or refusal of the other terms of sale, should it be effected; indeed every part of the bargain is still to be arranged, and it was with the view of more expeditiously knowing Mr Heiton's willingness to consent to terms that our clients wished a meeting with him in the first instance. It was irregular for any of the directors to inform you what had taken place at their meeting, and until you receive official information they may alter or annul any resolution which they may form. We do not agree with you therefore that the price has been fixed." Then we have the report of the directors on 29th September 1874—"The directors have agreed to sell the Darnick field to Mr Heiton at £1650, but the transaction has not been completed, as the servitudes to be retained in favour of the company have not yet been arranged." Then, again, the purchaser's agents write to the company's agents (18th December 1874)—"We understand that in the event of the establishment changing hands or being converted into other purposes these restrictions would cease." Then you have this letter (6th March 1875) from the agents for the company, in which they say they "may be disposed to modify the conditions and restrictions mentioned in the event of their selling the field to Mr Heiton." They do not say they do it, but only that they may be disposed to do it. Then you have this from the agents of the company (6th March 1875)—"All burdens, conditions, restrictions, and others shall be created in favour of the company, and of their successors and assignees, and also in favour of the and their foressaids, as proprietors of the Waverley Hydropathic Establishment, No. 127. and of the grounds surrounding the same, and parts and pertinents." That is the understanding and conditions made by the company. Then you have the matter about the orchard brought in. I may just dispose of that at once by observing that it is perfectly clear that Mr Macpherson, who is said to have taken that lease, had no authority whatever to interfere in that matter, whatever he may have done. Now, in the letter of 25th March 1875 Mr Heiton's agents write—"When Mr Heiton was here the other day, on his way to Edinburgh, we advised him to call on you, and try and adjust in an interview the outstanding points, instead of prolonging a correspondence, and he writes us to-day that this has now been done." Thus there were admittedly outstanding points at that time, and it is for Mr Heiton to shew that these were ever finally adjusted. The agents for the company say (26th March 1875)—"We have your letter. Mr Heiton has given no acceptance of the terms of sale as contained in our several letters to you, and perhaps it will be better that a written acceptance be sent." That implies that there must be writing before the bargain is concluded, or they say—"You can, however, go on with the preparation of the draft disposition by the company to Mr Heiton, and send it to us with the titles in order that we may prepare the draft disposition by you to the company. Of course, until there be a written acceptance there cannot be a concluded sale." It is clear that this proposal to go on with the preparation of the drafts was a mere tentative proceeding, and not a proceeding upon the footing of a completed sale, or they say distinctly—"Of course, until there be a written acceptance there cannot be a concluded sale." Was there any written acceptance given? It was not only not given, but it was declined to be given, as we see from the next letter from Mr Heiton's agents to the agents for the company, in which they say (27th March 1875)—"We do not send a written acceptance of the terms of sale as asked for in your letter of yesterday, as we are not at one evidently as to the clause regarding the obligation to plant clumps of trees, having understood from Mr Heiton's last letter that the stipulation was departed from, and that all that our client was to be taken bound to do was to keep the obliquely-shaded portion in permanent grass. We have written him on this point to-day, and meantime you can be revising our disposition and drafting your own." Then you have Macpherson's letter about the orchard, which, as I have said, goes for nothing, he having no authority. Then the agents for the company send the drafts of the deeds, and say (5th June 1875)—"We return the whole titles and documents you sent us, and likewise draft disposition in favour of Mr Heiton and relative draft inventory, revised. We stipulate, however, that the Waverley Hydropathic Company (Limited) shall still have an opportunity to go over and consider the draft disposition now returned before being attended, in case that we may have overlooked conditions which should be inserted in it." That is the way in which matters stood when we come to the minute of meeting of the finance committee on 15th June 1875, which bears—"Mr Davie stated that trees had been planted in the Darnick fields, and that sheep had been grazing in them for several days, and considered that this use of the fields was illegal and without authority, because there was no concluded sale of them." And then—"The meeting consider that as the servitudes had not been finally arranged, and that there was no sale of the fields, and also in respect of the foressaid requisition, it would not be prudent to proceed further in the matter of the sale of the Darnick fields." They instruct their agents that the

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

No. 127. negotiations should not be further proceeded with, but they agree that an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders should be called to consider the propriety of selling or not selling the Darnick fields, and to authorise certain proposed additions and alterations to be made upon the company's establishment at Skirmish Hill. That extraordinary general meeting was called accordingly but before that meeting was held there is another letter (15th June 1875) from the company's agents to Mr Heiton's agents, in which they say—"With reference to the negotiations for the sale of these fields to Mr Heiton we are instructed by a committee of the directors of the Waverley Hydropathic Company (Limited) to intimate, as we now do, that in the meantime these negotiations are suspended." And then they ask if the trees have been planted, &c., in accordance with Mr Heiton's orders, and so on. Then the agents for the company again write on 16th June 1875—"The essential parts of the proposed sale, viz, the conditions, servitudes, &c., have not been considered by the company, and are not finally adjusted. How you can say that the formal parts of the sale have only to be adjusted we do not understand." Then they say that the draft must be returned to them before it is extended on stamp in order that they may get the approval or disapproval of it by the company, or any alterations on it which the company may require. Then you have the result of this extraordinary general meeting, at which a motion is made—"That this meeting disapproves the whole proceedings of the directors as to the fields in question, and also disapproves of the proposed servitudes as being insufficient, and hereby cancels the apparent authority under which they—the directors—have been hitherto acting, and instruct them to cease from all further negotiation with Mr Heiton. And that is the end of the matter. Now, if according to the law of Scotland a concluded sale of heritable property can be spelled out of that, it is more than I can see or understand. I think it is perfectly clear that there was no concluded sale, and therefore that Mr Heiton cannot succeed in this action.

LORD MURE.—The only difficulty I have had in this case has been relative to the question of possession. I have felt no difficulty as to the power of the directors to sell in the circumstances here disclosed; and having regard to the minutes of meetings of the directors, and to the correspondence that followed relative to what were to be the conditions of the contract, it appeared to me that the directors, so far as they were concerned, had come under an agreement to sell. But then the conditions under which the sale was to be made were not first fixed, and until those conditions were fixed, or there had been some acceptance in writing on the part of Mr Heiton of the undertaking made to him in the resolution of the directors, there could be no concluded sale. Now, I think that in the correspondence the greater part of those conditions were arranged. But on the other hand, it is clear that at the end of March there were still some proposals outstanding as to which the parties were not at one. Because the two letters referred to by Lord Deas—one from Messrs Watt and Anderson on the 26th March, and the other from Messrs Freer and Dunn on the 27th of the same month—each allude to the fact of there having been no written acceptance of the proposal the directors had made; and Messrs Freer and Dunn give us the reason why they did not send a written acceptance, that the parties were not at one as to some of the conditions. It was, however, maintained to us that ultimately the parties came to be substantially at one, and that the pos-

sion which had been had by Mr Heiton was sufficient to get the better of the No. 127.
want of any written acceptance.

Now, I am very clear upon the correspondence that there was here no written agreement of sale. There is the defect of there being no acceptance on the part of the company. In his own evidence he says

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

Mr Heiton of the proposal of the company. In his own evidence he says that subsequent to the 26th March he had some communications with Messrs Watt and Anderson, and made some proposals to accept the offer, but that these were not carried out. If the matter had stood here it is quite clear there was no concluded transaction. The only difficulty, as I have said, which was raised in my mind, was with reference to the question of possession—as to whether there had been such possession as could be held to be rei interventus, and to show that a concluded contract had in that way been established. But when one looks at the nature of this possession, and at the way in which it was taken by Mr Heiton—not given by the directors as a body—I do not think it is sufficient to validate the agreement. The directors of the company no doubt authorised the carrying out of the transaction on the 2d March; and the finance committee were instructed to carry it out, as appears from the meetings of 2d March and 15th June. But three members of the committee never acted at all, and they never appear to have met together as a committee to consult as to what could be done in the matter. I think that the import of the evidence therefore regarding possession simply comes to this, that Mr Ferguson, one of the finance committee, but without the authority of that committee as a body, and without the authority of the directors as a body, seems to have arranged with Mr Macpherson, who had no power to do so himself, that he should take a lease of this land from Mr Heiton, and that Mr Heiton was allowed by Mr Ferguson to plant some shrubs. But I think that the possession and occupation so had by Mr Heiton cannot be held to have been possession given by the directors or given by the committee, so as to import that there was a concluded contract. The possession remained with the defenders in all essential respects, and upon that ground I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Deas.

LORD SHAND.—In answer to the contention on behalf of the reclaimer that there was a concluded contract of sale, it has been maintained by the respondents that the directors had no power to conclude a sale and, in the next place, that on the documents that passed between the parties there was no concluded sale. Upon the first of these points, viz., as to the power of the directors to conclude a sale, I have, as your Lordships have, no doubt. The argument for the respondents finally came to this, that although it was part of the constitution of this company, as finally fixed by the resolution at the meeting of the 25th March 1874, and approved of at the meeting of 9th April 1874, that the directors might, with consent of the shareholders, “sell, dispose, and convey the heritable property of the company,” and although it was conceded that the consent of the shareholders was given at the same meeting at which this power was made a part of the constitution of the company, yet the sale could not be carried through, because in the notices calling the meeting at which the power was given there was no intimation given to the shareholders that such a sale was to be the subject of consideration. I am clearly of opinion that that is not a good ground for challenging this sale, if it was made. The directors, with the consent of the shareholders, had the power to sell, and the shareholders had given their consent. The

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

objection taken amounts to this, that a party dealing with a joint stock company of this kind is bound not only to look at the constitution of the company, and at the resolution which the company may have come to, but to investigate all the details with reference to the calling of the meeting at which the resolution was arrived at, and to see whether due notices have been given and circulars sent to the proper parties. I think that persons dealing with companies of this kind are entitled to assume that in matters of this description everything has been properly done. It would be a very serious thing if in regard to a company such as this the law were otherwise. I do not think it would lead to the disability of such companies to contract; but, if persons dealing with them were bound to examine into all these minute matters of detail before they could be satisfied that they had made a binding contract, it would be almost impossible to deal with such companies in safety; and it would be the worst result possible for such companies themselves, and a great injury to them, that the law should be declared in terms of the argument which we had at such great length from the respondents in this case. There is no doubt that there was power on the part of the directors to conclude contracts in those fields; but I agree with your Lordships in holding that there was here no concluded contract.

It is settled by the case of Colquhoun v. Wilson's Trustees, 22 D. 1035, on the principles of reason and expediency, that where you have open possession, followed in that case the possession was, by a number of actings of the parties, the person who has taken possession must be held to have passed from minor stipulations that he had made in the course of the negotiations for the contract, but which had been left open. But here the case is quite otherwise. We have to look at the correspondence, and I think also at the drafts of the deeds, which passed between the parties, in order to see what was the state of the negotiations between them. I quite agree with what has been said by Lord Deas that the drafts themselves, even though they come nearly up to a concluded contract, cannot be taken as finally closing it, but, on the other hand, they may be looked at to see how the parties were at one, and how far they differed from each other. In this case I think the drafts are useful, and shew that the parties had never come to a

I do not mean to go into detail on points which have been already gone over, but I may say that I am satisfied from the correspondence, in the next place, that the proposed sellers, through their agents, made it a condition of sale that there should be a formal written acceptance of the offer made. The pursuer's agents were made fully aware of this, and in one of their letters to the defenders' agents they say that they cannot send such a written acceptance because they were not agreed as to one of the stipulations. I think it would be extremely difficult to hold that the bargain had been concluded without such a written acceptance. But, in the next place, I think the documents shew that upon a matter which was of vital consequence to this company—the question of servitudes which were to be made burdens upon the ground to be sold—there was an important difference between the parties. I refer particularly to a piece of ground delineated upon the plan, upon which the pursuer wanted the liberty to put up buildings subject to restrictions. It appears from the correspondence to the last moment parties were directly at variance—the defenders insisted that any contract to be entered into must contain a stipulation that the buildings to be put up on that ground must be according to plans which they should approve of, while the pursuer, on the other hand, maintained that he should be at liberty put down villas without either having plans submitted to or approved of by the defenders. I therefore take it that upon these two points, if there were nothing else—the absence of the acceptance stipulated for and the non-agreement with reference to the servitudes—there was no concluded bargain. I may further say that I entirely adopt the views stated by Lord Deas as to the alleged possession. I do not think there was here such possession given by the company taken by Mr Heiton as could make any contract between the parties on the footing that Mr Heiton abandoned all points on which he had differed in the negotiations.

No. 127.
June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We had a very elaborate and earnest argument on the part of the defenders in support of their third plea in law, which is that “the resolution with reference to the fields in question, adopted at the meeting of the company on 25th March 1874, having been passed in violation of the provision of the statute and the articles of the association, anything done under the remit contained therein was ultra vires of the directors and committee of directors, and is not binding on the company.” Now, although I agree with all your Lordships holding that that plea is unfounded, I think it is necessary to take some notice of it in giving our judgment, because if the doctrine embodied in that plea were held to be sound or received any countenance, even by the appearance of its not being distinctly rejected by the Court, I think it might lead to very inconvenient and dangerous consequences. The fundamental doctrine of the law of partnership in the case of ordinary mercantile companies is, that every individual partner of the company may bind the company in all ordinary transactions, and each partner has an implied mandate to that effect. But in the case of a joint stock company, whether depending upon the common law or upon statute law, whether limited or unlimited, there is no room for such a presumption as that, because the very nature of the association renders it indispensable that there should be a directorial body to carry on the business of the company, and the constitution of the body of directors of course takes away at once the power of any individual member of the company to bind the company. But it does more than that, for it creates a presumption of a different kind—a presumption that the whole of the business of the company is to be done by the directors and by nobody else, and in no other way; and the public are entitled to expect that anything that the directors do shall be valid and binding upon the company. No doubt, in the case of statutory companies in particular, this presumption must yield to fact, and it may be made a fundamental condition of the company's contract of settlement, and a part of its constitution, that the directors shall have certain powers, and shall not have certain other powers, either by themselves or with the consent of a general meeting of the shareholders of the company. And there can be no doubt that it is right that a third party dealing with such a company is bound to make himself acquainted with the conditions of the contract of that company in so far as they are made public; and under the Companies Act, 1862, a third party dealing with such a company is bound to make himself master, not only of the statute under which the company is incorporated, but of its articles of association, which are registered for the very purpose of being made public. If, therefore, he finds in these articles of association that the directors have not the power to contract, he is given notice of that, and will contract at his own risk. Now, how does this matter stand in regard to the company in question? In

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

the first place, it is provided by the articles of association that the directors may do everything in conducting the affairs of the company that the company itself could do at a general meeting, unless it be such things as are specially reserved to be done by the incorporation. That is the leading provision. But then it is said there is an exception to this in the case of a sale of heritable property, and an article of association is referred to in which the directors are given power to borrow and re-borrow within certain limits; and then these words follow—"And with the consent of the shareholders at a general meeting they may also sell, dispose, and convey the heritable property of the company, or any part thereof." I think it is very doubtful whether that regulation was in operation at the time when this sale was made, or at least when the authority was given for it. But assuming that it was so, the question comes to be whether the directors had not such authority; and when we come to the minutes of the extraordinary general meeting of shareholders on 25th March 1874 we find that that meeting expressly and unanimously empowered the directors to sell this ground at such a price and on such terms and conditions as they should deem advisable. The directors proceeded at their next meeting to take the matter into consideration. They fixed the price at which they were to sell, and they appointed a finance committee to meet and advise with the law-agents in the carrying out of the same. Now, the directors were entitled to act by a committee in carrying out the details of a transaction of this kind, having thus resolved to sell, and I think this remit empowered the finance committee to proceed with the adjustment of details.

But it is said the whole of this rests upon an unsound basis, because the extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was not duly summoned, and in particular, that the notices calling the meeting did not specify that this business was to be taken up by the meeting. Now, that is no doubt in violation of one of the regulations of the company, and one of the regulations which form an article of association, and which is published to the world. But although third parties know that an extraordinary general meeting of the company may be summoned in that particular way, the question remains whether they are bound to inquire and to satisfy themselves whether a particular general meeting for the purpose of passing the resolution under which the directors are acting was so summoned. I hold it to be perfectly clear law that they are not bound so to inquire, but, on the contrary, that they are entitled to presume that everything has been regularly done in the summoning of the meeting of the company at which such resolution is passed. I think any other conclusion upon such a question as that would be attended with the most monstrous and inexpedient results. Therefore I am very clearly of opinion that the defence founded upon the want of due summoning of the extraordinary general meeting is entirely without foundation.

Upon the other question, whether there was a concluded contract made by the parties so empowered to contract, I entirely agree with all your Lordships. I think, in the first place, that the correspondence and the minutes do not themselves make a concluded written contract of sale, because some of the conditions subject to which that sale was to be made were not finally agreed to by both sides. I think, in the second place, with Lord Deas, and I understand with all your Lordships, that the mere attempt to adjust a draft disposition which was never finally approved of by both, could not have any such effect. I think, in the third place, that no possession of the ground was ever given by e company, and that even such kind of possession as the pursuer took without the assent of the company, or anybody authorised by the company, was of far more equivocal a character to get the better of the imperfection of the written contract, even if it had been given by the company to the pursuer.

No. 127.
June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but I think it right to suggest that there is one finding in the interlocutor, viz., the finding, which is quite unnecessary for the judgment, and with regard to which I confess I entertain some little doubt—in which his Lordship finds that the statements of the pursuer are not relevant. There may be a doubt about that, but it is not in the least degree necessary for the judgment. I think, therefore, we had better recall that part of the finding, and assoilzie.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the finding, in the first place in the said interlocutor: Recall the said interlocutor also in so far as it sustains the defences; and in place thereof sustain the defenders' fourth and fifth pleas: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor: Find the defenders entitled to additional expenses, allow an account," &c.

ALEX. MORRISON, S.S.C.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ADAM HOGG, Pursuer.—Asher—Moncreiff.
MRS ELIZABETH JAMIESON OR HAMILTON AND OTHERS, Defenders.—
Trayner—Rhind.

No. 128.
June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

Succession—Trust—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Reconversion.—The testator conveyed his estates, consisting of heritable and moveables, to trustees, who were directed, after payment of debts and a legacy, to divide the residue equally among the testator's four unmarried sisters. Power was given to the trustees to sell the heritable or make it over at a valuation to one of the beneficiaries. The eldest sister was the sole accepting trustee. The heritable was never sold, and the sisters possessed it in common, the eldest drawing the rents and dividing them. When one of the sisters was married a valuation of the heritable was made and one-fourth of the value was paid to her as her share, conveying to the others her whole interest in the estate. One of the unmarried sisters having died, held that her share of the heritable was heritable—Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure holding that there had been no conversion, Lord Shand (concurring with Lord Adam, Ordinary), holding that the deed implied conversion, but that the actings of the beneficiaries operated reconversion.

WILLIAM JAMIESON, surgeon, Bellshill, died in 1858, leaving a trust-ment by which he conveyed to Margaret Jamieson, his sister, in event of her surviving and remaining unmarried, whom failing, to other unmarried sisters, Jane, Maria, and Jessie, in succession, and two other trustees, who did not accept, the sister being a trustee sine non, a plot of ground at Bellshill, containing 1 rood 27 falls, and all other property, heritable and moveable. After directing payment of debts, and a legacy to an old servant, the deed proceeded,—“Lastly, I do hereby instruct, and enjoin my said trustees, . . . to divide and they shall divide the whole free residue of my means and estate equally amongst the said Margaret, Jane, Maria, and Jessie Jamieson, my unmarried sisters, share and share alike: . . . Farther declaring that my said trustees shall have power to sell and dispose of my heritable property, whether by public roup or private bargain, or they may have it valued by a competent person, and either of my said unmarried sisters, and who shall be unmarried at the time of my death, having priority of choice according to seniority, shall have a right to purchase the same at such valuation.”

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
B.

No. 128.

June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

All the sisters were alive and unmarried at the date of the testator's death, and Margaret, the eldest, accepted the trust. The moveable estate amounted to about £1200, and was immediately divided among the beneficiaries. The heritage consisted of a villa and garden at Bellshill, and a tenement of workmen's houses. These subjects were let, and the rents were drawn by Margaret and divided among the beneficiaries till her death in 1866. In 1860 Jane was married. On that occasion a valuation was made of the heritage. It was valued at £2000. £500 was paid to Jane as her share, and a deed was executed by all the sisters, by which Jane, on the narrative of all that had taken place, granted a discharge for £500 as in full of her share of the heritage, and disposed, assigned, conveyed, and made over to her three sisters all her share, interest, right, and title in and to her brother's heritable and moveable estate. Jessie died unmarried and intestate in 1861.

Maria was married in 1864 to Adam Hogg, and died in 1873.

Margaret died in 1866, having shortly before her death assumed two additional trustees.

Adam Hogg having acquired right to the shares of his wife and of Margaret, and having also come to be in right of Jessie's heir in heritage, brought this action against Elizabeth Jamieson and others, her next of kin, and the trustees, concluding for declarator that he had the sole beneficial interest in the subjects, and that the trustees were bound to denude in his favour.

He pleaded;—(1) on a sound construction of the trust-settlement of the said William Jamieson, Jessie Jamieson's interest in the heritable subjects therein disposed was heritable, and on her death passed to her heir-at-law; and (2) esto that the said interest was originally moveable, it became heritable by reconversion, and was so quoad the said Jessie Jamieson's succession on her death, in consequence of her having elected to allow her share of the said heritable subjects to remain and be dealt with as heritage throughout her lifetime.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) On a sound construction of the trust-deed, and in the circumstances of the case, the interest which, at the time of her death, Jessie Jamieson had in her brother William's trust-estate, was moveable.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, and decerns; and quoad ultra continues the cause: Finds the defenders, Elizabeth Jamieson and Hamilton, &c., and Robert Brown Tennent and Alexander Pollock trustees of the deceased William Jamieson, liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The object of this action is to have it found and declared that the pursuer has the sole beneficial interest in, and right and title to, the heritable estate which belonged to the deceased William Jamieson, and to have his trustees decerned and ordained to denude thereof in his favour.

"It is not disputed that the pursuer is now in right of three-fourths of the heritable estate left by the truster, and the question at issue relates to the remaining fourth which was bequeathed by him to his sister Jessie Jamieson. The competition is between the pursuer, who is in right of the heir in heritage, Jessie Jamieson, and the defenders (other than the trustees), who are her next of kin. It is not disputed that if Jessie's share be heritable it now belongs to the pursuer.

"Two questions have arisen—1. Whether the heritable estate left by the truster is by force of the terms of his settlement to be treated as moveable quoad his succession; and, 2. Whether, assuming this to be so, his residuary legatee, of whom Jessie Jamieson was one, so dealt with the property left to them nevertheless, to make it heritable quoad their succession?"

(After narrating the facts)—"Had the case rested on the construction of the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—Although there was no express direction to sell, an estate of the description left by the truster could not be divided, as directed by the trust-deed, without sale. Therefore sale is indispensable to the execution of the trust. There was therefore conversion, and the legal result was not affected by the fact that the truster did not carry out the directions of the truster.¹ The provision that one sister might take the property at a valuation shewed that the truster contemplated that the shares should be paid in money. The pursuer argued ;—The estate was heritage in the person of the truster, and it continued to be so after his death, and has never been converted. It therefore lay on the defenders to shew how conversion was effected. There was no direction to sell. Therefore it must be shewn that it was necessary to sell in order to carry out the purposes of the trust.² But that was not the case. It was settled that a conveyance pro indiviso might satisfy a direction to divide.³ Conversion was a question of intention. And the preservation of the estate as heritage in the way that had actually been done was quite in conformity with the truster's intention as expressed in his deed. It is not advising.—

No. 128.
June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—Certain things are very clear on the face of the deed. The sisters who were unmarried at the date of the truster's death were to have equal shares. The trustees have power to sell, but there is no direction to sell. Then there is an imperative direction to divide the estate equally among the unmarried sisters. That is the only part of the deed which disposes of the estate as above, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that its terms would have operated as a conversion of the truster's heritable estate into moveable quoad his succession. There is no direction to sell, but the trustees are directed 'to divide' the residue of his means and estate equally among our sisters. Having regard to the amount and condition of the means and estate which fell to be divided, the division could not have been made, except by the conversion of the heritable estate into money. A conveyance of the heritable estate to be held by the residuary legatees pro indiviso would not appear to be sufficient compliance with the truster's direction 'to divide' the residue—Ervingham's Trustees v. Paterson, July 2, 1873, 11 Macph. 848 ; and the truster therefore must be held to have intended a sale of the subjects—Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 Macqueen, 374.

But it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the residuary legatees, who were only parties interested, elected that the heritable estate should not be sold but divided among them. When Jane was married in 1860, and required payment of her share, the necessity then arose of dealing with the heritable estate, of selling it and dividing the proceeds. The estate, however, was not sold ; in order to avoid a sale the other three residuary legatees bought up Jane's share in it. It appears therefore to the Lord Ordinary that the estate was not sold because the three remaining residuary legatees resolved, as they had a right in being the only persons interested, that it should remain invested as it was. In question therefore as to their succession the Lord Ordinary thinks that it should be regulated according to the nature of the subject, and, being heritable, Jessie's right to a share went to her heir in heritage, whom the pursuer represents—Williamson v. Paul, December 15, 1849, 12 D. 372 ; Grindlay v. Grindlay's Trustees, Nov. 9, 1853, 16 D. 27."

Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 M'Q. 374, 34 Scot. Jur. 502 ; Advocate-General v. Blackburn's Trustee, Nov. 27, 1847, 10 D. 166 ; Fotheringham's Trustees v. Paterson, July 2, 1873, 11 Macph. 848, 45 Scot. Jur. 578. Grindlay v. Grindlay's Trustees, Nov. 9, 1853, 16 D. 27, 26 Scot. Jur. 29 ; Wighton's Trustees, Jan. 9, 1874, ante, vol. i. 358. Wald v. Anderson, Dec. 8, 1876, supra, p. 211.

No. 128.

July 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

requires construction, and it must be taken in connection with the power of sale, which might or might not be exercised, and might be exercised in different ways. The property might be sold to a third party by private bargain, or by auction to the highest bidder, or it might be valued over to any one of the sisters, the eldest for the time being having a preference.

Now, it is contended, in substance, that where there is an imperative direction to divide a mixed estate, that necessarily implies conversion of the heritage because it is impossible to operate a complete and equal division without the heritage being previously sold. I do not think the term "divide" has such a restricted meaning. It admits of the same kind of construction as the term "pay," which is often read in settlements of this description as equivalent to "convey" or "transfer," according to the nature of the property, and may often mean "dispose" in the case of heritable estate. Accordingly the word "divide" settles nothing by its mere use as to the testator's intention in the matter of conversion. It is merely equivalent to pay or transfer to a plurality of beneficiaries, and that may be done not only by converting the property into money, but by giving shares of equal value to the beneficiaries or in other ways. The term divide advances one a very little way in solving the question whether it was the intention of the testator to convert his heritage into moveables by the operation of his trust.

If that be so, the only element left for consideration is the power of sale. That has never been held to operate conversion. There must either be a direction to sell or some equivalent, such as that the general provisions of the trust and the circumstances of the estate create a necessity to sell in order to carry out the purposes of the trust. As there is no direction to sell here, the plea of conversion for conversion must shew a necessity to sell.

In dealing with that matter a great deal of light is afforded by what was actually done by the trustees and by the beneficiaries. The only accepting trustee was Miss Margaret, and she and the other beneficiaries all lived together. They divided the moveables among them; but how did they deal with the heritage? They did not sell it; they simply kept it and lived on the rents, which Margaret collected and divided among herself and her sisters in equal shares. And when one of the sisters was married in 1860, two years after their brother's death, they entered into an arrangement by which any necessity for selling the heritage was easily avoided. They took a hint from the trust-deed itself, which provided that with a view to ascertaining the respective interests valuation might be resorted to. They found the value to be £2000, and they said to Jane—We shall pay you £500, and you convey to us your whole right and interest. And the deed was executed by Jane and accepted by the other three upon that footing.

From that time forward the three sisters go on to possess the estate, and becomes, so far as I can see, their heritable estate in every sense of the term. It matters little that one of them was a trustee. It would have been easy for her, if she desired it, to divest and convey to herself and her sisters. But the practical effect was the same as if she had done so. They enjoyed the property just as three joint proprietors. Now, was there anything in that inconsistent with the settlement of their brother? On the contrary, I think it was in perfect conformity with his wishes and intentions.

I am therefore not disposed to divide the case into two parts as the Lord Ordinary has done. The estate was not directed to be sold, and was not necessarily converted by the terms of the deed, and that was practically shewn ut was done. I therefore hold that there was no conversion, and that in No. 128.

 int of law as well as fact the estate remained heritable in the persons of the ee sisters after Jane had executed the deed of 1860. We are dealing here ^{June 7, 1877.}
 Hogg v.
 Hamilton, &c.
 h the succession of Jessie, that part of it which still remained under the trust
 r the moveable estate was divided, and, I think there is not the least doubt t nothing has been done to alter its character as it descended from the ster. It was then heritage, and never ceased to be so, and was so in the son of Jessie.

ORD DEAS.—The late William Jamieson died without issue on 25th June 8, leaving a mortis causa disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed villa of Bellshill, in which he resided, and generally his whole property, table and moveable, to trustees, for the following purposes :—(1) Payment of ts ; (2) payment of a legacy of £10 to his servant, Margaret Pettigrew ; and ly, he desired, instructed, and enjoined his trustees “to divide, and they i divide, the whole free residue of my means and estate equally amongst”
 four maiden sisters, Margaret, Jane, Maria, and Jessie Jamieson, “share and e alike, declaring that should any of my said sisters predecease me or be ried at the time of my death then the share or shares of such decesser or asers, or of such as may be married at the time of my death, shall be sible equally amongst the survivors who shall be unmarried at the time of leath, or if only one shall survive me and be unmarried then she shall be ded to the whole of the free residue of my whole means and estate : Farther ring, that my said trustees shall have power to sell and dispose of my heritproperty, either by public roup or private bargain, or they may have it ed by a competent person, and either of my said unmarried sisters and who be unmarried at the time of my death, having priority of choice according ority, shall have a right to purchase the same at such valuation, the purr always paying the expense of the conveyance, so that the share in my sion may not be thereby diminished.”

he only heritable estate left by the truster besides Bellshill consisted of some plots of ground purchased by him subsequent to the date of his deed of ment, with workmen's houses erected thereon. The moveable estate,— to have amounted to £1200 or thereby,—was divided equally among the sisters who survived him, after removing the furniture from Bellshill to a ent house, in which they lived in family together. The heritable subjects ined unsold, but in 1860, the second sister Jane being about to be married, d of agreement was entered into by the whole four, whereby, on the narra-
 that a valuation had been obtained of the heritable estate, which shewed s fourth share to be worth £500, Jane, in consideration of that sum then to her, disponed and assigned her share and interest in the heritable and able estate to her three sisters, each to the extent of one-third, Jane binderself to grant all deeds necessary for carrying out that agreement, and arging all farther claims, except an eventual claim to a share of the furni-if the family arrangement thereby sanctioned, that those of the sisters who ned unmarried were to have the use of it rent free, should afterwards be n up.

sie Jamieson died unmarried and intestate on 1st December 1861. Mar-died, likewise unmarried and intestate, on 28th December 1866. John son, the truster's brother, was heir-at-law to both of them, and as such ob-

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

negotiations should not be further proceeded with, but they agree that an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders should be called to consider the propriety of selling or not selling the Darnick fields, and to authorise certain proposed additions and alterations to be made upon the company's establishment at Skirmish Hill. That extraordinary general meeting was called accordingly but before that meeting was held there is another letter (15th June 1875) from the company's agents to Mr Heiton's agents, in which they say—"With reference to the negotiations for the sale of these fields to Mr Heiton we are instructed by a committee of the directors of the Waverley Hydropathic Company (Limited) to intimate, as we now do, that in the meantime these negotiations are suspended." And then they ask if the trees have been planted, &c., by Mr Heiton's orders, and so on. Then the agents for the company again write on 16th June 1875—"The essential parts of the proposed sale, viz, the conditions, servitudes, &c., have not been considered by the company, and are not finally adjusted. How you can say that the formal parts of the sale have only to be adjusted we do not understand." Then they say that the draft must be returned to them before it is extended on stamp in order that they may get the approval or disapproval of it by the company, or any alterations on it which the company may require. Then you have the result of this extraordinary general meeting, at which a motion is made—"That this meeting disapproves the whole proceedings of the directors as to the fields in question, and also disapproves of the proposed servitudes as being insufficient, and hereby cancels the apparent authority under which they—the directors—have been hitherto acting, and instruct them to cease from all further negotiation with Mr Heiton. And that is the end of the matter. Now, if according to the law of Scotland a concluded sale of heritable property can be spelled out of that, it is more than I can see or understand. I think it is perfectly clear that there was no concluded sale, and therefore that Mr Heiton cannot succeed in this action.

LORD MURE.—The only difficulty I have had in this case has been relative to the question of possession. I have felt no difficulty as to the power of the directors to sell in the circumstances here disclosed; and having regard to the minutes of meetings of the directors, and to the correspondence that followed relative to what were to be the conditions of the contract, it appeared to me that the directors, so far as they were concerned, had come under an agreement to sell. But then the conditions under which the sale was to be made were not first fixed, and until those conditions were fixed, or there had been some acceptance in writing on the part of Mr Heiton of the undertaking made to him in the resolution of the directors, there could be no concluded sale. Now, I think that in the correspondence the greater part of those conditions were arranged. But on the other hand, it is clear that at the end of March there were still some proposals outstanding as to which the parties were not at one. Because the two letters referred to by Lord Deas—one from Messrs Watt and Anderson on the 26th March, and the other from Messrs Freer and Dunn on the 27th of the same month—each allude to the fact of there having been no written acceptance of the proposal the directors had made; and Messrs Freer and Dunn give us the reason why they did not send a written acceptance, that the parties were not at one as to some of the conditions. It was, however, maintained to me that ultimately the parties came to be substantially at one, and that the po session which had been had by Mr Heiton was sufficient to get the better of the want of any written acceptance. No. 127.

Now, I am very clear upon the correspondence that there was here no written agreement of sale. There is the defect of there being no acceptance on the part of Mr Heiton of the proposal of the company. In his own evidence he says that subsequent to the 26th March he had some communications with Messrs Watt and Anderson, and made some proposals to accept the offer, but that these were not carried out. If the matter had stood here it is quite clear there was no concluded transaction. The only difficulty, as I have said, which was raised in my mind, was with reference to the question of possession—as to whether here had been such possession as could be held to be rei interventus, and to show that a concluded contract had in that way been established. But when one looks at the nature of this possession, and at the way in which it was taken by Mr Heiton—not given by the directors as a body—I do not think it is sufficient to validate the agreement. The directors of the company no doubt authorised the carrying out of the transaction on the 2d March; and the finance committee were instructed to carry it out, as appears from the meetings of 2d March and 15th June. But three members of the committee never acted at all, and they never appear to have met together as a committee to consult as to what could be done in the matter. I think that the import of the evidence therefore regards possession simply comes to this, that Mr Ferguson, one of the finance committee, but without the authority of that committee as a body, and without the authority of the directors as a body, seems to have arranged with Mr Macnab, who had no power to do so himself, that he should take a lease of this orchard from Mr Heiton, and that Mr Heiton was allowed by Mr Ferguson to plant some shrubs. But I think that the possession and occupation so had by Mr Heiton cannot be held to have been possession given by the directors or given by the committee, so as to import that there was a concluded contract. The possession remained with the defenders in all essential respects, and upon that ground I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Deas.

LORD SHAND.—In answer to the contention on behalf of the reclaimer that there was a concluded contract of sale, it has been maintained by the respondents that the directors had no power to conclude a sale and, in the next place, that on the documents that passed between the parties there was no concluded sale. Upon the first of these points, viz., as to the power of the directors to conclude a sale, I have, as your Lordships have, no doubt. The argument for the respondents finally came to this, that although it was part of the constitution of this company, as finally fixed by the resolution at the meeting of the 25th March 1874, and approved of at the meeting of 9th April 1874, that the directors might, with consent of the shareholders, “sell, dispose, and convey the heritable property of the company,” and although it is conceded that the consent of the shareholders was given at the same meeting at which this power was made a part of the constitution of the company, yet the sale could not be carried through, because in the notices calling the meeting at which the power was given there was no intimation given to the shareholders that such a sale was to be the subject of consideration. I am clearly of opinion that that is not a good ground for challenging this sale, if it was made. The directors, with the consent of the shareholders, had the power to sell, and the shareholders had given their consent. The

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

objection taken amounts to this, that a party dealing with a joint stock company of this kind is bound not only to look at the constitution of the company, and at the resolution which the company may have come to, but to investigate all the details with reference to the calling of the meeting at which the resolution was arrived at, and to see whether due notices have been given, and circulars sent to the proper parties. I think that persons dealing with companies of this kind are entitled to assume that in matters of this description everything has been properly done. It would be a very serious thing if in regard to a company such as this the law were otherwise. I do not say it would lead to the disability of such companies to contract; but, if persons dealing with them were bound to examine into all these minute matters of detail before they could be satisfied that they had made a binding contract, it would be almost impossible to deal with such companies in safety; and it would be the worst result possible for such companies themselves, and a great injury to them, that the law should be declared in terms of the argument which we had at such great length from the respondents in this case. I have no doubt that there was power on the part of the directors to conclude a sale of those fields; but I agree with your Lordships in holding that there was here no concluded contract.

It is settled by the case of Colquhoun v. Wilson's Trustees, 22 D. 1035, on principles of reason and expediency, that where you have open possession, followed as in that case the possession was, by a number of actings of the parties, the person who has taken possession must be held to have passed from minor stipulations that he had made in the course of the negotiations for the contract, but which have been left open. But here the case is quite otherwise. We have to look at the correspondence, and I think also at the drafts of the deeds, which passed between the parties, in order to see what was the state of the negotiations between them. I quite agree with what has been said by Lord Deas that the drafts themselves, even though they come nearly up to a concluded contract, cannot be taken as finally closing it, but, on the other hand, they may be looked at to see how far the parties were at one, and how far they differed from each other. In this case I think the drafts are useful, and shew that the parties had never come to one.

I do not mean to go into detail on points which have been already so fully gone over, but I may say that I am satisfied from the correspondence, in the first place, that the proposed sellers, through their agents, made it a condition of the sale that there should be a formal written acceptance of the offer made. The pursuer's agents were made fully aware of this, and in one of their letters to the defenders' agents they say that they cannot send such a written acceptance because they were not agreed as to one of the stipulations. I think it would be extremely difficult to hold that the bargain had been concluded without such a written acceptance. But, in the next place, I think the documents shew that upon a matter which was of vital consequence to this company—I mean the servitudes which were to be made burdens upon the ground to be sold—there was an important difference between the parties. I refer particularly to a piece of ground delineated upon the plan, upon which the pursuer was to have liberty to put up buildings subject to restrictions. It appears to me that up to the last moment parties were directly at variance—the defenders holding that any contract to be entered into must contain a stipulation that the villas to be put up on that ground must be according to plans which they should approve of, while the pursuer, on the other hand, maintained that he should be entitled put down villas without either having plans submitted to or approved of by No. 127.

defenders. I therefore take it that upon these two points, if there were no-ing else—the absence of the acceptance stipulated for and the non-agreement th reference to the servitudes—there was no concluded bargain. I may fur-er say that I entirely adopt the views stated by Lord Deas as to the alleged session. I do not think there was here such possession given by the company d taken by Mr Heiton as could make any contract between the parties on the ting that Mr Heiton abandoned all points on which he had differed in the otiations.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We had a very elaborate and earnest argument on the part the defenders in support of their third plea in law, which is that “the resolu-a with reference to the fields in question, adopted at the meeting of the comy on 25th March 1874, having been passed in violation of the provision of statute and the articles of the association, anything done under the remit coued therein was ultra vires of the directors and committee of directors, and is binding on the company.” Now, although I agree with all your Lordships holding that that plea is unfounded, I think it is necessary to take some ice of it in giving our judgment, because if the doctrine embodied in that were held to be sound or received any countenance, even by the appearance its not being distinctly rejected by the Court, I think it might lead to very onvenient and dangerous consequences. The fundamental doctrine of the law partnership in the case of ordinary mercantile companies is, that every indivi-l partner of the company may bind the company in all ordinary transactions, and each partner has an implied mandate to that effect. But in the case of a joint k company, whether depending upon the common law or upon statute law, whether limited or unlimited, there is no room for such a presumption as that, ise the very nature of the association renders it indispensable that there uld be a directorial body to carry on the business of the company, and the stitution of the body of directors of course takes away at once the power of individual member of the company to bind the company. But it does more that, for it creates a presumption of a different kind—a presumption that whole of the business of the company is to be done by the directors and by dy else, and in no other way; and the public are entitled to expect that ything that the directors do shall be valid and binding upon the company.
doubt, in the case of statutory companies in particular, this presumption t yield to fact, and it may be made a fundamental condition of the com-r’s contract of settlement, and a part of its constitution, that the directors l have certain powers, and shall not have certain other powers, either by selves or with the consent of a general meeting of the shareholders of the pany. And there can be no doubt that it is right that a third party dealing such a company is bound to make himself acquainted with the conditions he contract of that company in so far as they are made public; and under Companies Act, 1862, a third party dealing with such a company is bound ake himself master, not only of the statute under which the company is in-orated, but of its articles of association, which are registered for the very ose of being made public. If, therefore, he finds in these articles of associathat the directors have not the power to contract, he is given notice of that, will contract at his own risk.
ow, how does this matter stand in regard to the company in question? In

No. 127.

June 6, 1877.
Heiton v.
Waverley
Hydropathic
Company.

the first place, it is provided by the articles of association that the directors may do everything in conducting the affairs of the company that the company itself could do at a general meeting, unless it be such things as are specially reserved to be done by the incorporation. That is the leading provision. But then it is said there is an exception to this in the case of a sale of heritable property, and an article of association is referred to in which the directors are given power to borrow and re-borrow within certain limits; and then these words follow—"And with the consent of the shareholders at a general meeting they may also sell, dispose, and convey the heritable property of the company, or any part thereof." I think it is very doubtful whether that regulation was in operation at the time when this sale was made, or at least when the authority was given for it. But assuming that it was so, the question comes to be whether the directors had not such authority; and when we come to the minutes of the extraordinary general meeting of shareholders on 25th March 1874 we find that that meeting expressly and unanimously empowered the directors to sell this ground at such a price and on such terms and conditions as they should deem advisable. The directors proceeded at their next meeting to take this matter into consideration. They fixed the price at which they were to sell, and they appointed a finance committee to meet and advise with the law-agents in the carrying out of the same. Now, the directors were entitled to act by a committee in carrying out the details of a transaction of this kind, having thus resolved to sell, and I think this remit empowered the finance committee to proceed with the adjustment of details.

But it is said the whole of this rests upon an unsound basis, because the extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was not duly summoned, and in particular, that the notices calling the meeting did not specify that this business was to be taken up by the meeting. Now, that is no doubt in violation of one of the regulations of the company, and one of the regulations which form an article of association, and which is published to the world. But although third parties know that an extraordinary general meeting of the company may be summoned in that particular way, the question remains whether they are bound to inquire and to satisfy themselves whether a particular general meeting for the purpose of passing the resolution under which the directors are acting was so summoned. I hold it to be perfectly clear law that they are not bound so to inquire, but, on the contrary, that they are entitled to presume that everything has been regularly done in the summoning of the meeting of the company at which such resolution is passed. I think any other conclusion upon such a question as that would be attended with the most monstrous and inexpedient results. Therefore I am very clearly of opinion that the defence founded upon the want of due summoning of the extraordinary general meeting is entirely without foundation.

Upon the other question, whether there was a concluded contract made by the parties so empowered to contract, I entirely agree with all your Lordships. I think, in the first place, that the correspondence and the minutes do not themselves make a concluded written contract of sale, because some of the conditions subject to which that sale was to be made were not finally agreed to by both sides. I think, in the second place, with Lord Deas, and I understand with all your Lordships, that the mere attempt to adjust a draft disposition which was never finally approved of by both, could not have any such effect. I think, in the third place, that no possession of the ground was ever given by the company, and that even such kind of possession as the pursuer took without the assent of the company, or anybody authorised by the company, was of far too equivocal a character to get the better of the imperfection of the written contract, even if it had been given by the company to the pursuer.

I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but I think it right to suggest that there is one finding in the interlocutor, viz., the first, which is quite unnecessary for the judgment, and with regard to which I confess I entertain some little doubt—in which his Lordship finds that the statements of the pursuer are not relevant. There may be a doubt about that, but it is not in the least degree necessary for the judgment. I think, therefore, we had better recall that part of the finding, and assoilzie.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the finding, in the first place in the said interlocutor: Recall the said interlocutor also in so far as it sustains the defences; and in place thereof sustain the defenders' fourth and fifth pleas: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor: Find the defenders entitled to additional expenses, allow an account," &c.

ALEX. MORRISON, S.S.C.—WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ADAM HOGG, Pursuer.—Asher—Moncreiff.

MRS ELIZABETH JAMIESON OR HAMILTON AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Trayner—Rhind.

No. 128.

June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

Succession—Trust—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Reconversion.—The testator conveyed his estates, consisting of heritage and moveables, to trustees, who were directed, after payment of debts and a legacy, to divide the residue equally among the testator's four unmarried sisters. Power was given to the trustees to sell the heritage or make it over at a valuation to one of the beneficiaries. The eldest sister was the sole accepting trustee. The heritage was never sold, and the sisters possessed it in common, the eldest drawing the rents and dividing them. When one of the sisters was married a valuation of the heritage was made and one-fourth of the value was paid to her as her share, she conveying to the others her whole interest in the estate. One of the unmarried sisters having died, held that her share of the heritage was heritable—Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure holding that there had been no conversion, Lord Shand (concurring with Lord Adam, Ordinary), holding that the terms of the deed implied conversion, but that the actings of the beneficiaries did operated reconversion.

WILLIAM JAMIESON, surgeon, Bellshill, died in 1858, leaving a trust-settlement by which he conveyed to Margaret Jamieson, his sister, in the event of her surviving and remaining unmarried, whom failing, to his other unmarried sisters, Jane, Maria, and Jessie, in succession, and two other trustees, who did not accept, the sister being a trustee sine a non, a plot of ground at Bellshill, containing 1 rood 27 falls, and all his other property, heritable and moveable. After directing payment of debts, and a legacy to an old servant, the deed proceeded,—“Lastly, I desire, instruct, and enjoin my said trustees, . . . to divide and they all divide the whole free residue of my means and estate equally amongst the said Margaret, Jane, Maria, and Jessie Jamieson, my unmarried sisters, share and share alike: . . . Farther declaring that my said trustees shall have power to sell and dispose of my heritable property, either by public roup or private bargain, or they may have it valued by a competent person, and either of my said unmarried sisters, and who shall be unmarried at the time of my death, having priority of choice according to seniority, shall have a right to purchase the same at such valuation.”

1st Division.
Lord Adam.
B.

No. 128.

June 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

All the sisters were alive and unmarried at the date of the testator's death, and Margaret, the eldest, accepted the trust. The moveable estate amounted to about £1200, and was immediately divided among the beneficiaries. The heritage consisted of a villa and garden at Bellshill, and tenement of workmen's houses. These subjects were let, and the rents were drawn by Margaret and divided among the beneficiaries till her death in 1866. In 1860 Jane was married. On that occasion a valuation was made of the heritage. It was valued at £2000. £500 was paid to Jane as her share, and a deed was executed by all the sisters, by which Jane, on the narrative of all that had taken place, granted a discharge for £500 as in full of her share of the heritage, and disposed assigned, conveyed, and made over to her three sisters all her share, interest, right, and title in and to her brother's heritable and moveable estate. Jessie died unmarried and intestate in 1861.

Maria was married in 1864 to Adam Hogg, and died in 1873.

Margaret died in 1866, having shortly before her death assumed two additional trustees.

Adam Hogg having acquired right to the shares of his wife and of Margaret, and having also come to be in right of Jessie's heir in heritage, brought this action against Elizabeth Jamieson and others, her next of kin, and the trustees, concluding for declarator that he had the sole beneficial interest in the subjects, and that the trustees were bound to denude in his favour.

He pleaded;—(1) on a sound construction of the trust-settlement of the said William Jamieson, Jessie Jamieson's interest in the heritable subjects therein disposed was heritable, and on her death passed to her heir-at-law; and (2) esto that the said interest was originally moveable, became heritable by reconversion, and was so quoad the said Jessie Jamieson's succession on her death, in consequence of her having elected to allow her share of the said heritable subjects to remain and be dealt with as heritage throughout her lifetime.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) On a sound construction of the trust-deed, and in the circumstances of the case, the interest which, at the time of her death, Jessie Jamieson had in her brother William's trust-estate, was moveable.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, and decerns; and quoad ultra continues the cause: Finds the defenders, Elizabeth Jamieson, Hamilton, &c., and Robert Brown Tennent and Alexander Pollock trustees of the deceased William Jamieson, liable in expenses," &c."

* "NOTE.—The object of this action is to have it found and declared that the pursuer has the sole beneficial interest in, and right and title to, the heritable estate which belonged to the deceased William Jamieson, and to have his trustees decerned and ordained to denude thereof in his favour.

"It is not disputed that the pursuer is now in right of three-fourths of the heritable estate left by the truster, and the question at issue relates to the remaining fourth which was bequeathed by him to his sister Jessie Jamieson. The competition is between the pursuer, who is in right of the heir in heritage of Jessie Jamieson, and the defenders (other than the trustees), who are her next of kin. It is not disputed that if Jessie's share be heritable it now belongs to the pursuer.

"Two questions have arisen—1. Whether the heritable estate left by the truster is by force of the terms of his settlement to be treated as moveable quoad his succession; and, 2. Whether, assuming this to be so, his residuary legatees of whom Jessie Jamieson was one, so dealt with the property left to them as nevertheless, to make it heritable quoad their succession?"

(After narrating the facts)—"Had the case rested on the construction of the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—Although there was no express direction to sell, an estate of the description left by the truster could not be divided, as directed by the trust-deed, without sale. Therefore sale was indispensable to the execution of the trust. There was therefore no conversion, and the legal result was not affected by the fact that the trustee did not carry out the directions of the truster.¹ The provision that one sister might take the property at a valuation shewed that the truster contemplated that the shares should be paid in money. The pursuer argued ;—The estate was heritage in the person of the truster, and it continued to be so after his death, and has never been converted. It therefore lay on the defenders to shew how conversion was effected. There was no direction to sell. Therefore it must be shewn that it was necessary to sell in order to carry out the purposes of the trust.² But that was not the case. It was settled that a conveyance pro indiviso might satisfy a direction to divide.³ Conversion was a question of intention. And the preservation of the estate as heritage in the way that had actually been done was quite in conformity with the truster's intention as expressed in his deed. It is not necessary to advise the court in advising,—

No. 128.

June 7, 1877.

Hogg v.

Hamilton, &c.

THE LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating the facts)—Certain things are very clear on the face of the deed. The sisters who were unmarried at the date of the truster's death were to have equal shares. The trustees have power to sell, but there is no direction to sell. Then there is an imperative direction to divide the estate equally among the unmarried sisters. That is the only part of the deed which disposition and settlement above, the Lord Ordinary is inclined to think its terms would have operated as a conversion of the truster's heritable estate into moveable quoad his succession. There is no direction to sell, but the trustees are directed 'to divide' the residue of his means and estate equally among the four sisters. Having regard to the amount and condition of the means and estate which fell to be divided, the division could not have been made, except by the conversion of the heritable estate into money. A conveyance of the heritable estate to be held by the residuary legatees pro indiviso would not appear to be sufficient compliance with the truster's direction 'to divide' the residue—Gringham's Trustees v. Paterson, July 2, 1873, 11 Macph. 848 ; and the truster therefore must be held to have intended a sale of the subjects—Buchanan Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 Macqueen, 374.

But it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the residuary legatees, who were only parties interested, elected that the heritable estate should not be sold and divided among them. When Jane was married in 1860, and required payment of her share, the necessity then arose of dealing with the heritable estate, of selling it and dividing the proceeds. The estate, however, was not sold ; in order to avoid a sale the other three residuary legatees bought up Jane's share in it. It appears therefore to the Lord Ordinary that the estate was not sold because the three remaining residuary legatees resolved, as they had a right, being the only persons interested, that it should remain invested as it was. The question therefore as to their succession the Lord Ordinary thinks that it must be regulated according to the nature of the subject, and, being heritable, Jessie's right to a share went to her heir in heritage, whom the pursuer represents—Williamson v. Paul, December 15, 1849, 12 D. 372 ; Grindlay v. Grindlay's Trustees, Nov. 9, 1853, 16 D. 27."

Buchanan v. Angus, May 15, 1862, 4 M'Q. 374, 34 Scot. Jur. 502 ; Advocate-General v. Blackburn's Trustee, Nov. 27, 1847, 10 D. 166 ; Fotheringham's Trustees v. Paterson, July 2, 1873, 11 Macph. 848, 45 Scot. Jur. 578. Grindlay v. Grindlay's Trustees, Nov. 9, 1853, 16 D. 27, 26 Scot. Jur. 29 ; Wight v. Wighton's Trustees, Jan. 9, 1874, ante, vol. i. 358. Wright v. Anderson, Dec. 8, 1876, supra, p. 211.

No. 128. requires construction, and it must be taken in connection with the power of sale, which might or might not be exercised, and might be exercised in different ways. The property might be sold to a third party by private bargain, or by auction to the highest bidder, or it might be valued over to any one of the sisters, the eldest for the time being having a preference.

July 7, 1877.
Hogg v.
Hamilton, &c.

Now, it is contended, in substance, that where there is an imperative direction to divide a mixed estate, that necessarily implies conversion of the heritage, because it is impossible to operate a complete and equal division without the heritage being previously sold. I do not think the term "divide" has any such restricted meaning. It admits of the same kind of construction as the term "pay," which is often read in settlements of this description as equivalent to "convey" or "transfer," according to the nature of the property, and may often mean "dispose" in the case of heritable estate. Accordingly the word "divide" settles nothing by its mere use as to the testator's intention in the matter of conversion. It is merely equivalent to pay or transfer to a plurality of beneficiaries, and that may be done not only by converting the property into money, but by giving shares of equal value to the beneficiaries or in other ways. The term divide advances one a very little way in solving the question whether it was the intention of the testator to convert his heritage into moveables by the operation of his trust.

If that be so, the only element left for consideration is the power of sale. That has never been held to operate conversion. There must either be a direction to sell or some equivalent, such as that the general provisions of the trust and the circumstances of the estate create a necessity to sell in order to carry out the purposes of the trust. As there is no direction to sell here, the party contending for conversion must shew a necessity to sell.

In dealing with that matter a great deal of light is afforded by what was actually done by the trustees and by the beneficiaries. The only accepting trustee was Miss Margaret, and she and the other beneficiaries all lived together. They divided the moveables among them; but how did they deal with the heritage? They did not sell it; they simply kept it and lived on the rents, which Margaret collected and divided among herself and her sisters in equal shares. And when one of the sisters was married in 1860, two years after their brother's death, they entered into an arrangement by which any necessity for selling the heritage was easily avoided. They took a hint from the trust-deed itself, which provided that with a view to ascertaining the respective interests valuation might be resorted to. They found the value to be £2000, and they said to Jane—We shall pay you £500, and you convey to us your whole right and interest, and the deed was executed by Jane and accepted by the other three upon that footing.

From that time forward the three sisters go on to possess the estate, and it becomes, so far as I can see, their heritable estate in every sense of the term. It matters little that one of them was a trustee. It would have been easy for her, if she desired it, to divest and convey to herself and her sisters. But the practical effect was the same as if she had done so. They enjoyed the property just as three joint proprietors. Now, was there anything in that inconsistent with the settlement of their brother? On the contrary, I think it was in perfect conformity with his wishes and intentions.

I am therefore not disposed to divide the case into two parts as the First Ordinary has done. The estate was not directed to be sold, and was not necessarily converted by the terms of the deed, and that was practically shewn by that was done. I therefore hold that there was no conversion, and that in int of law as well as fact the estate remained heritable in the persons of the ne sisters after Jane had executed the deed of 1860. We are dealing here with the succession of Jessie, that part of it which still remained under the trust er the moveable estate was divided, and, I think there is not the least doubt it nothing has been done to alter its character as it descended from the ster. It was then heritage, and never ceased to be so, and was so in the son of Jessie.

No. 128.
 June 7, 1877.
 Hogg v.
 Hamilton, &c.

LORD DEAR.—The late William Jamieson died without issue on 25th June 18, leaving a mortis causa disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed villa of Bellshill, in which he resided, and generally his whole property, table and moveable, to trustees, for the following purposes :—(1) Payment of ts ; (2) payment of a legacy of £10 to his servant, Margaret Pettigrew ; and
 ly, he desired, instructed, and enjoined his trustees “to divide, and they
 I divide, the whole free residue of my means and estate equally amongst”
 four maiden sisters, Margaret, Jane, Maria, and Jessie Jamieson, “share and e alike, declaring that should any of my said sisters predecease me or be ried at the time of my death then the share or shares of such decessor or asers, or of such as may be married at the time of my death, shall be sible equally amongst the survivors who shall be unmarried at the time of death, or if only one shall survive me and be unmarried then she shall be led to the whole of the free residue of my whole means and estate : Farther ring, that my said trustees shall have power to sell and dispose of my herit-
 property, either by public roup or private bargain, or they may have it ed by a competent person, and either of my said unmarried sisters and who be unmarried at the time of my death, having priority of choice according uiority, shall have a right to purchase the same at such valuation, the pur-
 r always paying the expense of the conveyance, so that the share in my sion may not be thereby diminished.”

he only heritable estate left by the truster besides Bellshill consisted of some plots of ground purchased by him subsequent to the date of his deed of ment, with workmen's houses erected thereon. The moveable estate,— o have amounted to £1200 or thereby,—was divided equally among the sisters who survived him, after removing the furniture from Bellshill to a ent house, in which they lived in family together. The heritable subjects ned unsold, but in 1860, the second sister Jane being about to be married,
 d of agreement was entered into by the whole four, whereby, on the narra-
 that a valuation had been obtained of the heritable estate, which shewed a fourth share to be worth £500, Jane, in consideration of that sum then to her, disposed and assigned her share and interest in the heritable and ble estate to her three sisters, each to the extent of one-third, Jane binderself to grant all deeds necessary for carrying out that agreement, and rying all farther claims, except an eventual claim to a share of the furni-if the family arrangement thereby sanctioned, that those of the sisters who ned unmarried were to have the use of it rent free, should afterwards be n up.

sie Jamieson died unmarried and intestate on 1st December 1861. Mar-died, likewise unmarried and intestate, on 28th December 1866. John son, the truster's brother, was heir-at-law to both of them, and as such ob-

No. 128. tained a decree of general service on 16th April 1867. He conveyed his right by disposition and assignation, dated 29th February 1868, to the pursuer and his wife, Maria Jamieson (to whom he had been married in 1864), and the survivor of them. Maria died on 1st December 1873, and the pursuer thus became entitled to the whole outstanding estate, if it was heritable, and in May 1874 he brought this action against the trustees under the deed of settlement to have them ordained to convey the estate to him. The trustees stated in defence that Jessie Jamieson's next of kin had interpellated them from complying with the demand, on the footing that her interest in the estate was moveable, and had passed to them and not to the heir-at-law. Jessie Jamieson's next of kin were thereupon called into Court by a supplementary action, and the direct question at issue (as explained by the Lord Ordinary) thus came to be tried with them as to Jessie's original fourth share and one-third of her sister Jane's share made over to her by the deed of 1860. In the meantime the title to the estate continued to stand, in an heritable form, in the persons of the trustees, and latterly in the eldest sister, Margaret, as sole trustee, and it does not appear to be disputed that, up to a recent date before the pursuer raised this action, the rents had been distributed and paid over upon the footing that the rights of the beneficiaries were of an heritable nature.

The Lord Ordinary has decided in favour of the pursuer, but it appears from his note that he has done so on the footing that the residuary legatees, who were the only parties interested, had elected, by the deed of 1860, that the estate should not be sold, and that if the question had depended on the construction of the trust-settlement his Lordship would have held that its terms operated conversion from heritable to moveable. It is important to the law that the ground of judgment, in a case of this kind, should not be doubtful, and I therefore think it right to express my opinion that, without an actual sale, there could in this case, be no conversion.

The deed contains a power of sale, but not a direction to sell. Such a direction would have been conclusive in favour of conversion. No doubt there is a direction to "divide." But a direction to divide admits of construction more clearly, I should say, than a direction to "pay over," which, in Buchanan v. Angus (4 Macqueen, 372) was held, in the House of Lords, to admit of being construed as a direction to transfer the subjects as they stood at the date of the truster's death. If at the date of the truster's death the estate is heritable in its nature the words used as to what is to be done with those subjects are, I think, to be construed with a presumption in favour of keeping them in their then existing form rather than of changing them into personalty.

As we held in the recent case of Auld v. Anderson (4 Rettie, 211), there may be various ways of dividing heritable subjects without a sale, a pro indiviso conveyance being one of these ways if the circumstances raise no special objection to that course being adopted. As to the case of Fotheringham (11 Macph. 542) that was a very special case. The truster there directed the rents of a specified subject to be paid to Andrew Richardson and his wife, and the survivor of them during life, and the rents of another specified subject to be paid to James Thomas during his life. He then directed his trustees to divide the residue of his heritable and moveable property into nine equal shares or divisions, and to dispose, assign, and pay over one of these shares to his sister, Catherine Hay, for life, and one to each of eight other persons named, in fee, and their heirs, executors, and assignees respectively. He farther directed his trustees, on the ath of the said Andrew Richardson and his wife, and of the said James No. 128.

 homas respectively, to dispoⁿe, assign, and pay over to his own and his wife's lations "the parts of my heritable property so severally liferented by the said June 7, 1877.
 atherine Hay, Andrew Richardson and his wife, and James Thomas." A Hogg v.
 use was added, empowering the trustees, after payment of the debts and of a Hamilton, &c.
 quest to the Perth Infirmary, and the falling in of the above liferents, "to ing the whole or such part of my heritable property to sale as they may think oper, and to grant absolute dispositions to the purchasers should they be of ion that such sale is advisable for more effectually carrying the purpose of is settlement into execution."

In these circumstances the Second Division held that there was a practical cessity for a sale in order to carry out the will of the truster, and it must be mitted that the management of the subjects, in a pro indiviso form, in the nds of a liferenter and eight fiars, without the concurrence of all of whom thing could be done, could hardly be expected to go on advantageously hout a trust or the appointment of a judicial factor, and might reasonably igh be regarded as not in accordance with the intention of the truster.

But that a pro indiviso conveyance is not an incompetent mode of complying h a direction to divide must be held, I think, to have been substantially blished by the case of Buchanan v. Angus. The direction in that case was to ay over" the residue of the truster's means and estate, or the prices and duce thereof, to Major Archibald Smith, the truster's brother, and Mrs rgaret Smith or Heugh, his sister, equally betwixt them, share and share e, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever." That was just a direction to ide the residuary estate, or the prices and produce thereof, equally betwixt se two parties, and to which the observation I have already made was applice, that it would have been more difficult to construe the words to "pay r," as meaning "to transfer," than it is to construe the words divide qually betwixt them, share and share alike," as having that meaning. The d Chancellor (Westbury), however, spoke of what was directed there as e division to be made between his (the truster's) brother and sister," and further said expressly that the words "equally betwixt them share and share e" are "words which would be clearly applicable to a disposition of the pro-y when given to two persons in the character of tenants in common," (4 Mac-en, 382), which words just correspond to what we would call in Scotland position to two persons pro indiviso. Accordingly, the judgment proceeded the footing that what Archibald Smith and Mrs Heugh would have been end to if both had been alive would have been to have obtained from the tees a conveyance pro indiviso of the heritable subjects equally betwixt
 n. Mrs Heugh survived her brother Archibald, but as she made up no title is heir it was found and declared that no right to his pro indiviso half ever ed in her, but that it remained in hereditate jacente of Archibald, and went er cousin, Archibald Buchanan, as his heir-at-law.

The heritable estate in the present case stood, I think, at the truster's death, position precisely similar to that in which the heritable estate stood at the ter's death in the case of Angus v. Buchanan. There was a power of sale, no direction to sell, and no necessity for a sale. The direction to divide lied no such necessity. There were ample funds to pay the debts and the uniary bequest, leaving a substantial sum for division among the four sisters.
 ollows that unless and until some necessity for a sale should arise, or some-

No. 128. thing was done to operate conversion, there was no conversion of the heritable estate.

June 7, 1877.

Hogg v.

Hamilton, &c.

The law applicable to such a case cannot be better expressed than in the words of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Buchanan v. Angus. After observing that an absolute and unconditional trust for sale, either expressed or necessarily implied, operates conversion, he says (4 Macqueen, p. 379),—"But if, instead of an absolute and unqualified trust or direction for sale the right to sell is made to depend on the will or discretion of the trustees, or is to arise only in the case of necessity, or is limited to particular purposes, as, for example, to pay debts, or is not, in the appropriate language of Lord Fullerton in the case of Blackburn, indispensable to the execution of the trust, then, in any of these cases, until the discretion is exercised, or the necessity arises and is acted on, or after the particular purposes are answered, or if the sale is not indispensable, there is no change in the quality of the property, and the heritable estate must continue to be held and transmitted as heritable."

In the case we are now dealing with no necessity for a sale ever emerged, and nothing was done to effect conversion. On the contrary, until August 1866 the four sisters having continued to live together as the truster had intended them to do, the rents were divided among them or applied for their common purposes, the feudal title made up by the trustees was continued in the person of the eldest sister Margaret, as the accepting and surviving trustee, and the successive trustees and beneficiaries treated the subjects in all respects as heritable estate. The same principle was acted on and carried out in August 1866 when one of the sisters, Jane, being about to be married, she expressed a wish to be paid out of the trust, and accordingly discharged her interest in it on receiving the value of her share of the heritable estate in money.

But this transaction did not proceed upon the footing of conversion of the heritable estate, but only on the footing of diminishing the number of beneficiaries interested in that estate. In place of resorting to a sale the four sisters, one of whom (viz., Margaret), by that time, as I have said, held the title to the subjects as trustee, acting upon the spirit of the clause, which I have quoted from the trust-deed, as to valuation and purchase, obtained a valuation of the heritable estate, which shewed Jane's fourth share to be worth £500, and having paid her that sum they all subscribed a formal deed, whereby the subjects were disposed and conveyed to the three other sisters, and survivors or survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor, as trustees for themselves and their respective heirs, executors, or assignees, each to the extent of one-third.

